"BO-PEEP."

It was October—and into our home one morn,
Came a quaint little rogue, "all shaven and shorn,"
As funny an elf as ever was born!

With a puckered face and dot of a nose,
And such wee little turned up tips of toes,
And blushing all over red as a rose.

For never a bit of raiment brought he;
But, as fate would have it, a drawer had we Piled full of wee clothes as a drawer could be.

So we daintily dressed the sprite and fed—
Tenderly hushed him and laid him in bed,
And wond'ringly watched o'er the tiny head.

And, when he awoke from his blossom-like sleep,
He so won our hearts we concluded to keep
The dear little fellow and call him "Bo-peep!"

For he brought with him glimpses of Eden most fair;
And sweet blessings like perfumes pervaded the air,
Upwafting our thoughts from the labor and care.

And daily in stature and beauty he grew,
Renewing his freshness each morn with the dew,
Till earth, in his being, seemed created anew.

And, now that he's been with us three years or more,
We wonder how e're we existed before
He came, that October morning, and knocked at our door.

As, down through the dasies, he trips at my side,
And holds up the blossoms with dimples of pride,
I shudder lest ill should my darling betide.

My heart, in its fullness of passion and love,
Goes yearningly out to the Father above,
And prays Him, from evil, to shelter my dove.

NEVER DELIVERED.

THE STORY OF A VALENTINE.

CHAPTER I.—THE MESSENGER WHO BORE IT,

And who never delivered it. Perhaps it would have been too much to expect of him that he should do so; too much to expect that the little packet, carelessly taken and thrust a way amongst others, would ever enter his head again. At a ny rate it did not. He was a young man still, though he had been for some years a widower; and he had fallen in ove, and was on the way to learn his fate.

It cannot be flattering to a young lady, if she knows it, that her suitor should be capable of taking thought for any one besides herself; but certainly Sir Hugh Rainham tried to believe that he was not making his own happiness altogether the first consideration. There was the well-being of his little girl to be thought of—and what did he know about bringing up little girls? He had heard sensible people say, and he was ready enough now to accept the dictum, that the wisest thing a man in his position could do would be to marry again; wisest both for his own future and his child's. He said this to himself as he stood in Evelyn Neville's drawing-room, hat in hand, waiting, looking out upon the bare branches which were soon to be green again, and wondering, in a desultory fashion, if this February day would bring him another spring-time, or only the desolate branches, the dead leaves whirling about, or the cold sky beyond. He had not long to wait. When she came into the room, and that thrill went through his heart which the presence of one we love alone can bring, it must have left some mark upon his face; for she knew why he had come, and in a few rapid arguments had decided upon her answer. He was rich, but she did not care so much about that, not knowing what it was to be anything else; he was sir Hugh Rainham, but she didn't care for that either, her pride being of another sort; he was good, generous, and devoted—these things she did not care for. He loved her; and he came when that same pride of hers was smarting under a sense of neglect. In the few seconds allowed her before he spoke. Evelyn Neville made her decision. She had thought that he knew, and was jealous of, her friendship with that cousin Frank, whom she fancied might one day be nearer than a cousin. But that was over. The cousins had kept up a childish habit of exchanging valentines; and to-day there was nothing from him, while her own had gone as usual. That was the humiliating part of it. If she had broken through the custom it would have been well; but that he should be first! and when, too, he had given her cause to expect that his would be no ordinary valentine! Here, within her reach, was the means of punishing him—at any rate of letting him know that she did not care. Evelyn listened to Sir Hugh with a forced attention,, but he knew nothing of that. When he spoke of his little girl, falteringly, she roused up and saw the strong earnestness and anxiety in the man's face; and strange to say, this touched her more just then, than any passionate lover's pleading from his lips would have done. She turned towards him suddenly, and put her hand into his, and said, speaking of the small Cecilia—

"She shall be very dear to me, and precious. I will care for her, as much as you could desire."

And when Sir Hugh had left her, she did not repent. It is true that there came upon her a certain sense of being bound—of having done what could not be undone—and that half rebellious desire to be free, which is almost always inseparable from an act that seals one's own fate. And then the drawing-room was rather lonely; the trees outside the window got a ghostly look, and seemed to wrap themselves up tighter as the fog gathered round them; and—altogether, she thought she would just go and tell her brother, by way of convincing herself that the thing was finally settled.

When she told him, he lifted his eyebrows and stared at her.

"Is it true?—You look as if it were. Rather scared, and that sort of thing. Not that there is anything to be scared about; only I suppose it's proper. Hem! I might have thought of Frank Neville; but this is wiser."

She bit her lip, but never answered him. She wished he had not said that about Frank, and she didn't like the word "wiser." What had wisdom to do with it?

She started from her sleep that night, with a mist before her eyes and a great throbbing at her heart, for Frank's voice was in her ears. Would he care?

But what use to ask, now that it was too late? And that it was too late no one knew better than herself; for to her, having once decided publicly as it were, change would have been impossible.

And on her wedding-day she was to Sir Hugh a radiant princess, far away above him, stooping to crown him with the blessing of her love. Any one who had seen him that day might have doubted about its being altogether, or even very much for his daughter's sake that he took this step.

"I have reason to be grateful," he said to his new brother-in-law, when the speechifying was over, and the bride was going away to change her dress.

George Neville looked at her and nodded.

"She's a good girl enough; a little self-willed, perhaps; but then she has always had her own way."

"And will have it still, I hope," said Sir Hugh. "If I don't make her happy, I shall deserve to be a miserable man all my life."

In years to come he recalled the speech, and wondered whether some strange misgiving had moved him to utter it.

Just then Frank Neville was saying to Evelyn, "So you did not think me worth an answer!"

She was passing through the throng toward the door, and she never faltered or raised her head. No one knew that the words fell upon her with a sudden chill, like a cold hand grasping her heart. She had seen her cousin amongst the guests, and knew that he was looking miserably ill, but she had been too much occupied to think about that.

"What do you mean, Frank?"

"Oh, not much. Valentines don't require answers in a general way; but I think you might have given me a few words last February. However, you'll keep my secret. No one knows it but you, unless it is your husband. What's the matter, Evelyn? You look as if you didn't understand."

"I don't."

"You must have had it. I missed the post over-night, and gave it to Rainham, there, as I knew he would see you the next day."

"To—my husband?"

"Yes; I'll ask him——"

"Frank," she said, with a heavy hand on his arm, "forget all this. Never speak of it—for my sake."

He looked at her with a perplexed expression of inquiry, but he saw that she was white and flurried, and gave up the point.

"Well, we have always been friends; have we not? I would ask you yet for your good wishes, as you have mine; but the doctors say there's something amiss here," touching his chest; "and I may not live to——never mind! God bless you, Evelyn!"

CHAPTER II.—ITS MARK ON THE YEAR TO COME.

Sir Hugh brought his wife home: and his hair was not gray, neither had any premature wrinkles marked his face. To his servants there appeared no change in him, either for better or for worse. He was just the same grave, silent, rather deliberate master they remembered. They did think, indeed, that he was dreadfully polite to his lady; but perhaps that was proper—before servants.

Sir Hugh, taking Evelyn to the drawing-rooms, which he had caused to be altered and brightened for her, turned and said to her, "Welcome home."

And as he said it, the memory of his own dreams of that home stung him so bitterly that he half put out his arms to take into them the Evelyn he had once known. But she never saw the movement; and would not have heeded it if she had seen. She passed on into the room, the brilliant light of which seemed to hurt Sir Hugh's eyes, for he put his hand over them suddenly; and for a moment he stood at the door, irresolute; then closed it gently, and went to see after his little girl.

That was natural enough, they said—those gossips down stairs who were always on the watch. But why didn't he take his new wife with him? And why did he stay with the child, hour after hour, till none of the evening remained? The first evening, too! Above all, why, when the household had retired, and all was quiet, did a tall, slight figure, which rustled a little as it passed, go into the nursery and kneel down beside the sleeping child and sob?

The nurse saw, for she was not asleep, and my lady fancied; and she was not likely to keep it to herself, either. These and such things were puzzling. At first they formed a constant source of whisperings and shakings of wise heads; but gradually the gloss of newness wore away from them; the dull days swept on, and something of the grimness of the stone heads that guarded the sweep of steps at the hall-door seemed to have crept into the house. It was so still and silent; so monotonous. But for the small Cecilia, it would have been unutterably dismal. But she was a child, and had childish ways, which remained unchecked. She was quite young enough to take very kindly to the new mamma, who was so beautiful and so good to her.

"Not like nurse said she would be—ugly and cross," she said to her favorite playfellow—"but good. I think she could have brought the little princess to life again, as well as the fairy did. You never saw such eyes in your life as she has got; just like the pool under the willows, where we are not to go, Charlie, you know; down, as if you couldn't ever see the bottom; ever so deep. And she kisses me, too."

To which the boy replied, with decision, that she couldn't be a fairy in that case, for fairies never kissed anybody; it wasn't lucky, that was unless they were wicked fairies. And it was all very well now, but when Cecil married him, he shouldn't allow her to kiss anybody.

By and by, however, as Cecil grew older, she used to wonder in her wise little head what made her father and mother, when they were alone, talk to each other, if they did talk, so like "company." That was her idea of it. She jumped up from the piano one day, and waltzed round to the foot-stool at Lady Rainham's feet, with a sudden thought that she would find out.

"Well," said Evelyn, looking at the pursed-up lips, which evidently had a question upon them, "what's the matter? Is your new music-lesson too hard?"

"My new music-lesson is—is a fidgetty crank," said Cecil, hesitating for an expression strong enough; "but it's not that. I was just wondering why you and papa——"

Sir Hugh let his book fall with a sudden noise, and went out of the room, passing the child, but taking no notice of her.

"Why you and papa," went on Cecil, reflectively, "are so odd, like grand visitors. When there's any one here I know I have to sit still, and not tumble my frock, nor cross my feet; but when there's no one, it's different."

"Your papa and I are not children," said Lady Rainham. "Grown-up people must be steady, Cis."

"Then I don't want to be grown up. And I'm sure, quite sure, that I'll never be married, if one is to do nothing but sit—sit all day long, and have no fun."

Lady Rainham bent down to kiss the resolute lips that uttered this bold decision, and then her face grew sad. There were times when even to her pride the life she led seemed almost too hard to bear—times when she was mad enough to think she would tell Sir Hugh that the act which stamped him in her eyes as base and dishonored was no secret from her, as he doubtless believed it to be. But she could not do it. It seemed to her as if the consciousness that she knew would only make him more contemptible in his own eyes as well as in hers. It would but widen the gulf, and make what she was able to bear now utterly intolerable. For she never doubted that the purport of the letter was known to him, and he had suppressed it for his own ends. And the poor boy who wrote it was dead. There was the great mischief of it all. If he had been living and well, so tender a halo might not have rested over the past, and all in the past connected with him; so bitter a resentment might not have been nursed in silence against the wrong which her husband had done them both. But Frank had lived but a few months after her wedding, and she never saw him again. He was dead, and she had killed him—no, not she, but Sir Hugh.

She was thinking such thoughts one day when something made her look up, and she met Sir Hugh's eyes fixed upon her. There was so peculiar an expression in them that she could not prevent a certain proud, antagonistic inquiry coming into her own. He went toward her with his book open in his hand. He bent down and put his finger on a line in the page, drawing her attention to it.

"'How much the wife is dearer than the bride.' This struck me rather, that's all," he said, and went away.

Evelyn sat on by the window, with the book dropped from her fingers, and she covered her face. What did he mean? If he had only not gone away then!

"How could he do that one thing?" she said to herself. "He meant the line as a reproach to me. And I would have loved him—is it possible that I do love him, in spite of it? Am I so weak and false? I want so much to comfort him sometimes that I half forget, and am tempted. But I never will—I never must. I used to be strong, I shall be strong still."

And so the same front of icy indifference met Sir Hugh day by day and year by year, and he knew none of her struggles. But he wrapped himself up more and more in his books and his problems and writings. New MSS. began to grow out of the old ones, for he had various subjects. In these days a little fairy used to come in from time to time with a pretence of arranging them for him. She would open and shut the study door with a great show of quietness, seat herself on a big chest which was full of old papers, and in which she meant to have a glorious rummage some day; and begin folding up neat little packages; stitching loose sheets together; reading a bit here and there, and looking up now and then with a suggestive sigh till he would lay aside his work and declare that she was the plague of his life. This was the signal always for the forced gravity to disappear from Cecil's face; for her to jump up, radiant and gleeful, and just have one turn round the room—to shake off the cobwebs, as she said.

"But you know you couldn't do without me, and I do help very much. What do you know about stitching papers together? And you are a most ungrateful man to say I am a plague, only you don't mean it. I wonder what you'll do when I am married."

"Married!" echoed Sir Hugh. "Go and play with your last new toys, and don't talk nonsense."

But the word worried him, and made him thoughtful. When he came to consider it, the fairy was no longer exactly a child, though she was as merry as a young kitten. He did a little sum on his fingers in sheer absence of mind, and found out that in a few weeks she would be eighteen. It was twelve years since he went, that February day, to plead her cause and his own with Evelyn Neville. He used to go now sometimes to the window and look out, and remember the day when he had stood at that other window watching bare branches and wondering about his future. He knew it now. If only he could find out why it was thus. What had changed her all at once, on her wedding day, from the very moment, as it seemed to him, that she became his wife?

Sir Hugh pushed his hair away from his forehead and sighed. He was getting gray by this time, but then he was past forty, and Evelyn, his wife, must be two-and-thirty at least. It occurred to him that he had noticed no alteration in her. She was as beautiful as ever, with the beauty of a statue that chills you when you touch it. He thought he would look at her that evening and see if he could trace no change, such as there was in himself. He did look, when the room was brilliant with soft light, and she sat languidly turning over a book of engravings with Cecil. They formed a strange contrast; the cold, proud, indifferent beauty of the one face and the eager animation of the other. The girl's one hand rested on Lady Rainham's shoulder, caressing, for the tie between these two was more like the passion of a first friendship than the affection of mother and daughter. Suddenly Cecil pointed down the page and said something in a whisper, and Lady Rainham turned and looked at her with a smile.

As he saw the look, just such a thrill went through Sir Hugh's heart as he had felt when she came to him twelve years ago to give him his answer. No, time had not done her so much wrong as it had to himself, and there was one hope in which she had never disappointed him—her care for his daughter.

"For her sake," he said that night when Cecilia was gone, "I am always grateful to you."

But he did not wait for any reply. He never did. Perhaps he might not have got one if he had; or perhaps he thought the time had gone by for any change to be possible.

Lady Rainham looked from the window the next morning and saw Cecil under a tall laurel reading something. And the sun had come out; there was a twittering of birds in the shrubbery, and the sky was all flecked with tiny white clouds. It was Valentine's Day, and Lady Rainham knew that the girl was reading over again the one which Sir Hugh had handed her with such a troubled face at the breakfast table. What did that unquiet expression mean; and why did Cecil, when she saw it, look from him to herself, Lady Rainham, fold up her packet hurriedly and put it away?

It meant, on Sir Hugh's part, that he knew what it was and didn't like it; that he could not help thinking of his life, doubly lonely, without the child. But this never occurred to his wife. Presently some one joined Cecil in the laurel walk, and though of course Lady Rainham could not hear their words, she turned instinctively away from the window.

Cecil was saying just then, "No, it isn't likely. Who should send me valentines? They're old-fashioned, vulgar, out of date. Charlie, mind I won't have any more."

"Why not?"

"Because—I'm serious now—for some reason or other they don't like my having them," said Cecil, motioning toward the house. "And it's a shocking thing to say, but I'm sure there's something not straight between papa and Lady Rainham, some misunderstanding, you know. I'm sure that they are dreadfully fond of each other, really; but it's all so strange; I do so want to do something that would bring it right, and——I shall have nothing to say to you till it is right."

"Cecil!"

"I mean it. I am a sort of go-between; no, not that exexactly; but they both care for me so much. They don't freeze up when I'm there. I cant fancy them without me; it would be terrible."

"But Cecil, you promised——"

"No I didn't. And if I had, I shouldn't keep it, of course; that is, you wouldn't want me to. It would kill pa to lose me, and as to Lady Rainham, why I never cared for any one so much in all my life. I didn't know it was in me till she woke it up. You remember what I used to say about her eyes. They are just like that; like a beautiful deep pool; all dark, you know, till it draws you close and makes you want to know so much what is underneath."

Here Lady Rainham came to the window again, but the two figures had passed out of the laurel walk, and she saw them no more.

In the afternoon Cecil went as usual to her father's study, but he was stooping over a book and did not notice her. He was, in fact, thinking the thought that had troubled him in the morning, but Cecil fancied he was busy, and looked round to see what mischief she could do. It flashed through her mind that there was a fine opportunity for the old chest, and so she seated herself on the carpet and began to rummage. Presently Sir Hugh, hearing the rustle of papers, looked round.

"I should like to know who is to be my fairy Order," he said,, "amongst all that mess."

"I will, papa. I shall give a tap with my wand, and you will see it all come straight. But look here. Isn't this to mamma? It has never been opened, and it's like—a valentine."

Sir Hugh looked at the large "Miss Neville" on the envelope, and knitted his brows in a vain effort to remember anything about it. He couldn't,. It was very strange. He fancied he knew the writing, but yet could not tell whose it was—certainly not his own—nor recollect anything about the packet. He considered it a little and then said, "You had better take it to her."

He took a pen and wrote on the cover, "Cecil has just found this amongst my old papers. I have no idea how or when it came into my possession, neither can I make out the hand, though it doesn't seem altogether strange. Perhaps you can solve the mystery."

CHAPTER III.—ITS MESSAGE—AFTER MANY DAYS.

It was in verse, as Frank's valentines had always been; halting, and with queer rhymes and changes of measure. It was full of the half humorous tenderness of quiet friendship; and it ended with a hope that she would make "old Hugh" happier than his first wife did; that was if she accepted him; and with a demand for her congratulations upon his own approaching marriage; since he was the "happiest fellow alive" and couldn't keep the news from her, though it was a secret from all besides.

And the evening grew old; the white flecked sky turned colder, and the moon came out. But Lady Rainham sat with this voice from the dead in her hand, motionless; full of humiliation and remorse. And she was thinking of many years of bitterness and sorrow and pride; and of a heavy sacrifice to a myth, for she had never loved him. And her husband—whom she did love—whom she had so wronged—how was she to atone to him?

By and by the door opened and Cecil stole in. And she saw Lady Rainham's face turned towards the window with the moonbeams lighting it, and thought she had never seen anything so beautiful in her life.

"Mamma," she said softly, "why don't you come down? We are waiting, papa and I; and it's cold up here."

"I will come," said Lady Rainham; but her voice was strange. Cecil knelt down beside the chair and drew her mother's arm around her neck.

"How cold you are! Dear mamma, is anything the matter? Cannot I comfort you?"

Lady Rainham bent down and held her in close embrace.

"My darling, you do always. I cannot tell whether I want comfort now or not. I am going down to your father, and Cecil, I must go alone; I have something to say."

She went into the drawing room, straight up to where her husband sat listlessly in his chair at the window. He started when he saw her, and said something hurriedly about ringing for lights, but she stopped him.

"It will be better thus, for what I have to say. Hugh, I have come to ask your forgiveness."

Sir Hugh did not answer. The speech took him by surprise, and she had never called him Hugh before since their marriage. He had time enough to tell himself that it was only another mockery, and would end in the old way.

But standing there with Frank's letter in her hand, she told him all, not sparing herself, and then asked if he could ever forgive her. She was not prepared for the great love which answered her; which had lived unchanged through all her coldness and repulses; and which drew her to him closer now perhaps than it might have done if her pride had never suffered under those years of wretchedness.

Cecil never knew exactly what had happened; but when her father put his arm around her and called her his blessing, she looked up at him with an odd sort of consciousness that in some way or other the old valentine found in her rummage amongst his papers had to do with the change she saw. And it was her doing.

ADVENTURE ON MONT BLANC.

A TRAVELER'S NARRATIVE.

Five mountaineers, including the chief guide, decided to accompany me; and, securing ourselves to each other by long ropes, so that a slip or mis-step of one might not prove fatal to him, we set out, each carrying his knapsack of provisions strapped to his back, and in his hand a long balancing pole, with a hook at one end and a steel point at the other, to assist his footing along dizzy ledges and over yawning chasms, whose awful depths could not be penetrated by human eye.

We were already in a region of peril. Around and above us towered mountains of ice and snow, whose slippery and dazzling summits we must gain.

At length we came to a perpendicular wall of ice, some twenty-five or thirty feet in height, over which we must pass direct, or abandon our purpose. We examined it on all sides, but found nothing better than that which directly faced us.

How could we surmount the difficulty?

"If we go forward, we must climb this precipice of ice—there is no alternative!" at length said the chief guide, turning to me. "Can it be done?" I enquired.

"That is a question best answered by trying," he replied. "It is difficult and dangerous, but I think it possible."

He then held a short consultation with his companions, and proceeded to the work. He cut places for his hands and feet, and climbing up by these, cut others still higher, his comrades steadying him and supporting him as long as they could reach. He then came down, and had one of the poles fastened to his dress, so that they could keep him from loosing his balance. In this manner he slowly worked his way up, till the pole became too short, when he came down and rested while another was being made fast to it. Once more he returned to the work, and soon after he accomplished the bold feat, and stood upon the slippery summit.

The rest of us now disengaged ourselves from the rope, by which, as I have mentioned, we were all connected together, and two others ascended in the same manner as the first, one of them taking the rope up with him. They now told me it was best for me to go up while there were some below and some above to assist me; and prevent any accident happening through my inexperience, the rope was lowered and fastened around my body, and as fast as I ascended the slack was taken in by those above. When a little more than half-way from the base to the top one of my feet suddenly slipped, and my body partly swung round. I grasped firmly with my hands; and the tightening of the rope, with the assistance of the pole pressing it between my shoulders, kept me from swinging clear, and consequently from dashing my bones on the rough ice below—for the pole could not have supported my weight, and those above would have been compelled to let go the rope to save themselves from being dragged over the precipice. The event gave my nervous system a fearful shock, and in an instant I was in a perspiration, cold as it was.

We now set forward again, and for some time met with only minor obstacles, which were readily overcome. Towards sunset we came in sight of two sharp-pointed rocks, lifting their bare heads in solemn grandeur above the surrounding snow and ice. These were called the Grand and Petit Mulets, and occupied a position a little more than half-way up the mountain.

"There is the spot," said Gougjon, the principal guide, pointing to the larger of these two rocks, "where, if heaven favors us, we shall pass the coming night."

As we drew near this rock, I was led to think heaven would not favor us in reaching that dangerous point; for we were suddenly stopped by a wide, black chasm, that made me giddy to look into. This ran along the base of the rock, and completely cut off our approach—nor could we discover any means of getting over it. We could not descend into it and come out alive, and nowhere could we perceive the usual bridge of ice or snow by which we had crossed other similar gulfs.

"The last time I was here," said Gougjon, "there was a narrow wall of ice sloping upwards across this chasm, on which I cut steps and advanced, at a great risk of life; but now even that is gone—melted away, perhaps—and so, for all that I can see, our upward journey terminates here."

I was disappointed, I confess, for I had set my heart on standing upon the very pinnacle of Mount Blanc, and feeling that nothing in this world had ever gone up higher.

"As constant changes are going on," remarked the chief guide, "perhaps by this time next year this gulf will be bridged over." "Ay, perhaps!" I answered, moodily.

As it was now too late in the day to retrace our steps before dark, the next important thing was to find some sheltered spot where we could pass the cold night. We went back some distance, to a crevice which ran around under a huge rock that was in turn heavily overlaid with snow and ice.

Wrapping myself up as warmly as I could, I passed the first half of the night in walking up and down along a little narrow ledge, occasionally exchanging a word with some of the guides, but most of the time brooding, in sullen silence, over my disappointment. At last, feeling very much fatigued, I went away some distance from the others, and sat down; but finding, after a few minutes, that I was becoming very drowsy, and likely to fall suddenly asleep, which I did not think was prudent, I arose, with the intention of returning to the guides, and keeping myself awake with conversation.

But scarcely had I taken one step forward, when I stopped, and felt my hair rise with horror. I heard a strange sound, more like the distant purring of some animal than anything else I can liken it to, and at the same moment there was a slight vibration or quiver of the ground under me. I cannot tell why, for I had never experienced anything of the kind before, but at once, as if by instinct, I seemed to know it was a descending avalanche, and descending, too, from far above, probably to overwhelm and bury me for ever.

Quickly the sounds changed, and deepened in volume, and soon became a hissing roar, fairly shaking the ground beneath me; and then my mind was whirled away to the dearly-beloved ones at home.

Suddenly there was a strange rush and oppression of air—a cloud of darkness seemed to settle over me. The hissing roar ended with a terrible crash, and a silence succeeded, so deep and deadly, that it appeared more awful than a thousand thunders.

But the appalling crisis was over, and I was still alive. I thanked heaven for it, and shouted to my companions in peril. No answer! I shouted again. No response! I started to go to them, and three paces brought me against a wall of ice and snow. I recoiled in horror, and comprehended that they might be no longer among the living. I turned and ran the other way, trembling with fear. Six paces brought me against another wall of ice and snow! It was over me—around me—on every side of me! I was buried alive! I shrieked at the dreadful conviction—my brain reeled, and I fell.

It would be useless for me to attempt to paint the horrors of that night, after recovering my consciousness.

When morning once more dawned, to my great surprise, and, I scarcely need add, rapturous joy, I beheld the light stream into my little chamber through an apperture about the size of my body, and only a few feet above my head. I readily climbed to it, crawled through, and once more stood in the living world.

A tremendous avalanche had fallen; but I had only been caught by a light portion of the extreme left, had been saved by the overhanging rock, which fortunately had not been displaced in the downward rush of this mountain of ice and snow. Not so the poor guides. They were further to the right, and they were probably crushed to death. At least, they were gone, and no mortal ever beheld them more.

How I found my way down that awful mountain, alone and unaided, I hardly know. Even now, I can scarcely realize that I actually went through so many dangers and escaped with life. On three occasions, in sliding down the hills of ice, I was sent to the very verge of an awful gulf, and saved, as it were, by a miracle; and three times, in lowering myself down the slippery precipices, I lost my hold. And yet not a bone was broken. I was much bruised, however; and once I was so stunned that I knew nothing for an hour. But heaven, in its mercy, saw proper to give me back to the world, and save me from the awful fate of my companions in peril.

THE UTAH MAGAZINE.

Intellectual, Social, Political and Theological.

SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1869.

ORIGINAL MATTER IN THIS NUMBER.

We desire to make the Magazine in every sense a representative of the talent of the community. With an eye to this object we open the present volume with a first-class home-made serial story, entitled The Hebrew Maiden, or, Not all Dross. A small portion of this story has been composed for some time, but it is now reconstructed and completed for The Utah Magazine.

We also take pleasure in drawing attention to the following, among other original articles in this number: "The History of the World Illustrated in its Great Characters," and "Our Woman's Platform," both prepared in this office expressly for the Magazine; "How the World has Grown," by Eli B. Kelsey; "A Humorous Discourse on Railroad Matters," by Saxey, together with a Batchelor's song, "by Jingo," of keep-a-pitchin'-in fame; an Ode to the Steam Horse, by Jabez Woodard, also to our dramatic and musical articles, prepared respectively by the editors of those departments.

We also present, in this number, an original piece of music by Prof. Tullidge, being the first sheet of music, in the old notation, ever published in the Rocky Mountains.

To fully carry out our purpose of making this magazine "the Home Journal of the People," we invite contributors on science or other interesting subjects, from all our thinking men who wish to aid in the intellectual and social growth of the people.

Literary and Debating Societies, throughout the Territory, are requested to forward their questions. Reports of Lectures are invited.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Music and the drama properly belong to magazine literature. We have, therefore, designed in this enlarged edition of the Utah Magazine, which a contemporary has honored with the name of the "Blackwood of the Rocky Mountains," regular editorial departments for these branches of art. For the one we have engaged friend E. W. Tullidge, whose reviews of the characters of Shakspeare and lives of famous historical personages obtained a distinction in the American Phrenological Journal; and for the musical department we have engaged, as editor Prof. John Tullidge. Prof. Tullidge, in his youth, was a favorite pupil of the great English master, Hamilton, and for years was a teacher and conductor of Catholic choirs. We therefore take the liberty to respectfully invite correspondence from the musical profession at home and abroad, with confidence that questions upon theory and music generally, both vocal and instrumental, will be competently answered by him.

OUR WOMAN'S PLATFORM.

NO. 1—THE WOMEN'S MOVEMENT.

The editress of the Revolution has seen a live "Mormon" publisher—considers his head a cheering spectacle for a phrenologist, and being reflectively stirred up by the sight, exclaims, in effect, "What if, after all, the Mormons should lead in the assertion of the rights of women!" A very suggestive remark, anyway, and one which, we believe, despite present appearances to the outside world, will be found in due time to have contained the germ of a correct propheey.

It is with us on this "woman's rights" question as with other strong themes now agitating the public mind; we believe there is a germ of a great truth in it, and an inspiration working to a good end, but it seems as if no truth necessary for human happiness was ever yet established in this world, without being at first arrayed in garments vastly too magnificent for it. Before a truth can ever tell on the public mind, it does appear as though it must be preached up as being about six times its real size; and then in due course of God's Providence it will get accepted for what it really is. A twenty-five cent truth must come calling itself a dollar, and fight furiously for its rights as such, depreciating all such small values as fifty or seventy-five cents as vastly inferior amounts; when after sufficient struggling, it will settle down into its place in the world of coins really allowed and credited as twenty-five cents—having obtained its friends, inflamed their zeal, and received their indefatigable labors in its behalf, simply on the ground of its dollar-ish pretensions.

This is the history of the success of all truths, and the mainspring and strength of all great movements. Their advocates are impressed with the conviction that along-side of their special truth there is no truth worth talking about; and by no possibility an opposite side, or a draw-back to their picture. Believing, as we do, that Providence—manipulating men like pawns on the chequer-board of humanity—is in all this, we see, special wisdom in such impressions; for men will fight and die for a truth, if they believe it to be the grandest in existence, when they would not suffer the pricking of a pin's point for it, if they thought it was merely a truth and nothing more, It may sound as an irreverent expression, but this philosophy has created martyrs and reformers in all ages, by the score.

It appears to us to be precisely so with the question of womanly privileges. Women, we consider, have clearly been withheld from manifest rights. Their importance in society has been vastly underrated, and their capabilities unappreciated. They have been the victims of masculine lust, and false codes of society. Now has come the reaction—now the sufferers steer for the other extreme. Women should be eligible for everything; they should be bound by no consideration which the experience of past ages has confirmed; the more unlike women of the past, they can get to be in every respect, the better for them, the more glorious for society. This extreme view of the case would not, of course, be advocated by many individual ladies of the "Woman's Rights" order, but this is the soul of the movement—the inspiration of the hour. And, harmless enough, too, it allows plenty for clipping and paring; it contains hugeness enough to glorify it in the imaginations of its disciples, and make them enthusiastic, till they gain—as they should—a hearing. Experience, solid sense and the true instincts of womankind will trim and square the proposition to about its right shape in due time; and although, when gained, it will not make earth a paradise or take the "skeleton" out of everybody's cupboard, it will—like all God's movements in society—result in lifting humanity one little step nearer to their destined condition.

Music.

[Correspondence on musical subjects is invited.]

Musical development is very much the index of civillzation, and its variations of qualities the signs of national character. Nations highly advanced and refined have fine musical taste, such as the Germans, the Italians and the English. Their educated classes cannot endure crude compositions. Nothing less than exquisite strains of melody, and the grandest harmonies will satisfy the soul attuned to the beautiful and the sublime. On the other hand the Chinese, the American Indians, and the races generally who are crude in their natures, and unprogressive in their national characters have very poor perceptions of sweet melodic strains or harmonic grandeur. Kettle drums, and noisy discordant instruments would afford them more delight than the matchless oratorioes of Handel and Haydn, or the solemn majesty of the Masses of Mozart.

In the growth of the arts music springs up among their first outshoots, taking the precedence, in the unfolding of civilization, of every genius but that of poetry —as the second born of the Muses—she starts out with her divine mission. In her first stages she takes the form of simple song. Like as poetry, when far advanced, brings to its aid writing and printing, with their magician like powers and agencies, so music, in her advancement, arranges her alphabet, notation, and her art becomes elaborated into science. Like also as poetry from the crude body of verse receives a massive and infinitely capacitated transformation into universal literature, so music rises from her primitive form of simple song and clothes herself in grand gigantic harmonies. No longer a hymn or a ballad from untutored voices and inartistic votaries, but a volume of Creation from the creator Haydn, from the harmonic Handel a Messiah bearing the almighty majesty of his Hallelujah chorus to the Lord God Omnipotent, and from Mozart a consecrated mass to Deity. The genius of music develops capacities and forms for all the expositions of the harmonies of nature and the human soul, and for her interpretations she is no longer dependant on unlearned composers, nor upon uncouth utterances from untutored voices.

The history and schools of music agree with the stages of civilization. In cathedral times we have cathedral music. Their solemn, massive forms and ecclesiastical sublimity resemble the religious service of the age to which they belong. Masses, Anthems, and Luther's hymns show their quality. The Oratorio resembles the epic poem translated into another tongue of art, with the same principles, the same style, the same majestic elaboration. It is, however, Hebraic and not Grecian in its spirit, prophetic and not heroic in its themes. As yet the Oratorio is the best form and style that has been given in modern times of music suitable for Temple service. It is more Hebraic in its quality than the Masses of the Catholic, there is in its composition the declamatory moods, and bursts of bold inspirations that so wonderfully characterized the Jewish prophets, while the choruses describe the lofty exultation of the congregations of Israel when they were the people of Jehovah's special care. The mass music of the Catholics is, it is true, very imposing and seductive, but it is burdened with the superstitions of a church rather than with the bold inspirations of Prophets and Psalmists. Even its Gloria in Excelsis is more like choruses performed by priests and virgins of Heathen temples than the wondrous exultations in music of the vast congregations of the Zion of God. However near they may approximate to it in classical forms and treatment, there are no Mass compositions burdened with such pure Hebrew subject nor breathing so much divine theme as the Oratorio of the Mesiah, and no Gloria in Excelsis equals the triumphant majesty of Handel's Hallelujah for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth, in which one can imagine when Zion from above comes down to unite in worship with the Zion of all the earth, unnumbered millions of mortals and immortals will take their parts to swell the mighty theme.

Hail, Beautiful Spring.—We present in this number an original composition under the above title. Our reason for publishing Trios and Duets in this simple style is, because there exists a want for compositions of this class for the use of such as are unlearned in the art of reading classical music at sight. The part-music generally published is what is termed by the profession "set duettos" and glees, that is they are mixed with different forms of construction, and cannot be said to belong to any simple form. These compositions are only fitted for musicians well practiced in the vocal art, and in fact they are not appreciated by the mass. Ballads, in general, are composed in the duplex form of two capital periods, the first modulating to the dominant, or some key of close connection which is easily caught by the hearer. Others are composed in the grand triplex form, which contains three capital periods, and would require a twelve line verse. We think the best construction of this form is the da capo, that is, the third movement is the return to the first, which constitutes the final one, and the composition by this can be remembered quickly. However, we cannot always select this form for the want of poetry that will fit. "Hail, Beautiful Spring," is of this class.

We shall endeavor to give a sheet of music with every other number of the Magazine, including the composition of our best home musicians. Productions from the pens of Professors Thomas, Careless, and others, will be given in due time. We shall be happy to publish any composition of real merit.

Class-Teaching in Utah.—Class-teaching in Salt Lake City is entirely suspended at present. Some years ago Mr. David O. Calder raised large classes of the youthful portion of this city and gratuitously taught them the art of singing and Mr. Curwen's system of musical science. For years Mr. Calder labored to educate the people of Utah in the "divine art," and sought to establish classes and Philharmonic Societies throughout the Territory. In this he succeeded beyond a fair expectation of what one man could accomplish, and he founded the "Deseret Musical Association, which several years ago was quite a representative institution. Mr. Calder, however, was forced to discontinue his untiring labors for the cause of music in Utah to save his health, which had been almost sacrificed to his mission, and the burden of his duties as chief clerk in the President's office.

Class-teaching, however, in the settlements South of this city has been flourishing during the past year, under the direction of Professors Charles Thomas and John Tullidge, and a number of concerts have been given by the latter.

We hope also to see soon a Philharmonic Society again in Salt Lake City.

Handel.—A review of some of this great composer's works, with a brief biographical sketch of his life, and anecdotes of his peculiarities, selected from personal reminiscences of the author, written expressly for this magazine by the editor of this department, will shortly appear.

The Drama.

A New Play.—One leading feature of the season has been the presentation of a new dramatization, by Mr. John Lindsay, for his own benefit. There was considerable merit in the literary execution, and considering that Mr. Lindsay lays no pretentions to professional authorship, his effort deserves to be considered a decided success.

Miss Annie Lockhart.—This very interesting actress has been running a successful engagement in the Salt Lake Theatre. She came to us not in the rank of one of the world's great stars, but her general usefulness and fitness would please the public during a long engagement, when actresses of more lofty pretensions would exhaust themselves in their specialties and grow stale to their audiences. The management has been happy in the engagement of Miss Annie Lockhart.

Mr. Herne and Lucille Western.—Our enterprising managers, in addition to Miss Annie Lockhart, have also engaged Mr. Herne and the celebrated Lucille Western. The first appearance of Mr. Herne was in his great specialty of "Rip Van Winkle." His touches of nature and his easy, unconstrained rendering make an audience forget that he is the actor and regard him as the veritable "Rip." Notwithstanding that it is almost impossible for a play to run more than two or three times in a city where an audience is weekly limited to about the same persons, Mr. Herne has again and again reproduced his unique Dutchman to the delight even of those who have seen the character three or four times.

East Lynne.—Lucille Western made her first appearance on the Salt Lake stage in East Lynne. We have no liking for this class of plays, nor do we consider them chaste, or even moral. The time was when even the classical part of Mrs. Haller was repudiated by the critics, and it only held its place upon the stage because of its pathos, fine texture of subject, and the scope that it gave great actresses. But now we can have a wretched woman, with her seducer, paraded before our very eyes and the play be called "highly moral." So might the deep damnation of a prostitute's life be "highly moral," as a frightful warning to virtuous women not to fall into the like perdition. But the innate dignity of Julia Dean sanctified to the mind of the Salt Lake public the play of East Lynne, and Lucille Western made her first appearance in it here with great success. She did not, however, blot from our mind our lamented friend, nor do we think there is a lady on the stage who can happily follow Julia Dean as Camille or in the double character of Isabelle and Madame Vine. In the plays of Green Bushes and Flowers of the Forest, Miss Western surpassed the lady who, in the hearts of the people of Salt Lake, will live much in the character of High Priestess of their Temple of Art. Miss Western, coming to us with a national name, has very generally provoked comparison between herself and Julia Dean, and it is saying much in favor of both ladies that they have neither of them lost by the comparison.

One of Miss Western's great hits during her engagement was in Leah, the Forsaken. Another of her triumphs was in the character of the "Child Stealer," a sensational play of considerable power and illustration. It is a picture of the lower phases of society, with its marked vices and mannerisms in the delineations of which both Miss Western and Mr. Herne were very effective.

On Thursday evening, April 15th, this popular and powerful actress took a "farewell benefit" in Victor Hugo's famous historical play of—

Lucretia Borgia. The character of the Satanna of Italy, we think, is of too high a class for Miss Lucille Western. There is an imperial casting in the type of the original as marked as the genius of Victor Hugo himself, who has been very aptly characterized as the Michael Angelo among authors. To illustrate the grand poetic quality of Victor Hugo's genius, and the dark splendor of Lucretia Borgia, whose awful character is like Night in her profoundest majesty, with but one lone flickering star to guide her, is beyond the sphere of Miss Lucille Western. It is a character for a Siddons, a Ristori or a Julia Dean. Nevertheless, though Lucretia Borgia was not rendered by the beneficiare with that imperial classicality which we should have seen in the personations of those great artistes, she played the part very successfully; for her style, if not of the rarest quality, is exceedingly forcible. Mr. Herne sustained the lady as Genarro, a young soldier of fortune. We would advise Miss Western never to choose this excellent actor to mate her in heroic parts again. No touch of "Rip Van Winkle" should have been seen in Genarro, nor should the audience even remember that the same gentleman represented these two very dissimilar parts. Mr. Herne does himself an injustice in thus sacrificing his reputation for the purpose of playing the leading character to the heroine.

After the performance of Lucretia Borgia, our artistic visitors came before the curtain, and Mr. Herne, after the lady had retired, returned thanks in a pertinent little speech, in which he expressed the hopes of himself and professional companion soon to appear before a Salt Lake audience on a second visit.

Miss Fanny Morgan Phelps.—This lady is the last novelty offered to our theatre-going public. She has made a decided mistake in presenting herself before a Salt Lake audience as a Star. It is a task even for a good actress to run a successful engagement here.

Review of Books, &c.

The last birth of American magazines is "Appleton's Journal." It is a weekly paper devoted to literature, science and art. These well-known New York publishers have laid out for their journal a popular design, but the term "popular," as they use it, has a very select interpretation. Their Weekly is of the same class and tone as the Galaxy, a monthly with which our readers are familiar. The Galaxy, which gave a new phase to "popular" literature, has since become one of the first magazines of America, and the Appletons have now made a further advance in their issue of a weekly of the same class. Indeed we recognize among its corps of writers some of the Galaxy names. It is not so heavy in its literature and forms as the Atlantic Monthly, but it is more classical than any of the weekly magazines that we have yet seen till now, either of England or America. Its essays are from the pens of the best writers, and it opens with a splendid pictorial supplement—"The Grand Drive at Central Park." The first number contains the commencement of the new story of Victor Hugo, entitled "The Man Who Laughs," for which the French Publishers paid the author 300,000 francs. It is said to have been for twenty years in the author's workshop, and that its conception was in his mind contemporaneously with that of "Les Miserables." A fine, full length engraving of the author accompanies his work in a chaste biographical article and review of the genius of the illustrious French patriot. The writer says, "The power, the struggle, the sublime, and the colossal that we contemplate in Michael Angelo, and the grotesque sculptures of the middle ages, we contemplate in Victor Hugo's works. As Michael Angelo is alone among sculptors, Victor Hugo, by many of the same traits, is alone among writers. The grand, the bold, the complex elements of life and nature are in his writings; everything but the fused and fluent harmonies of thought and emotion which charms us in the expression of Lamartine, of De Musset, of George Sand."

Editor's Notice.—Owing to the great amount of original matter in this number, several of our regular departments, including Extracted Humor, Gems from the Poets, Scientific Notes and Household Receipts are crowded out.

Correspondence, Etc.

In this department we insert small original compositions, the authors of which make no pretensions to literary ability, but desire to aid in giving variety and a home-character to our columns.

In the following pithy effort of friend Senex, we think we discover the hand of an old fellow-traveler in the London Conference. Many of his efforts are worth a higher classification than the above:

SELF-RULE.

Are you old? Learn how to mould
Your will.
Are you young? Control your tongue
With skill.
He who can rule his will can speech control—
He who controls his tongue can rule his soul.

Are you rich? Gold gives the itch
For more.
Are you poor? Toil and endure
The sore.
The rich—disease is often hard to cure;
Thought, time and industry will heal the poor.

Are you great in mind's estate?
'Tis lent.
Are you small? See you they all
Well spent.
Right use of talents, not results, will guage
Your worth, and rightly estimate your wage.

Young, or old, nor wit, nor gold,
Will tell
Who are wise without disguise,
So well
As he who learns with skill himself to rule—
His wit, his wealth, to use in Wisdom's school.—Senex.

An Ode on the Death of Rolin—Puzzles us; we cannot tell what the author means. It appears to be a burlesque of some kind. There is some wit in the production, but very crude. It wants digesting.

A. Metcalf—Has thanks for his excellent selection.

R. C.—Has something to learn in respect to "feet." He expresses our ideas exactly in the following sentiment—tremendously so.

Give your employer all that's due,
In time and work that seemeth just;
He should be honest, too, with you,
If not in this world, in the next he must.

We should think so.

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

CHAPTER I.—THE PROPOSITION.

I propose to examine biblical and profane history for facts that shall prove how deep and fervent are the instincts in man, in his rudest and most primitive condition:

1st. To worship that which he esteems stronger and more powerful than himself—with him might being right; and that he naturally endows his Deity with the passions which rule and govern himself.

2d. That in proportion as he advances in intelligence and overcomes, in a measure, the rude barbarism of his nature, he looses a portion of his sectionality, and creates divinities that rule, not only a tribe or clan, but a section of the universe; the attributes of which deities are yet, however, clothed by him with a greater or less degree of the imperfections of his own nature.

3d. That man, in a still more advanced condition, even after God has revealed Himself as the creator of all things, and the only true God by manifestations that he could best understand—namely: manifestations of irresistible power—could still only comprehend so much of the true character of God as he had developed within himself, and continued to clothe Deity with his own sectionality and vengeful and unforgiving nature.

4th. That with the multiplied experiences of a procession of ages, man has gradually advanced and become more liberal in his views; that God has continued to lead him along by giving him "line upon line and precept upon precept" towards the full development of all that is cosmopolitan in his nature, that he may be prepared for the revealment of a universal faith which will embrace within its ample provisions all mankind, in every age, in every nation and in every clime, from the burning sands of Arabia to the ice-bound shores of the Arctic Sea.

CHAPER II.—RESEMBLANCE OF MEN TO THEIR DEITIES.

At a very early period of the Noachian dispensation, mankind, with a few noble exceptions, began to create unto themselves gods, whose attributes should not be a standing rebuke to themselves in the license they gave to their passions and lusts. As their traditions—unguided by divine revelation—multiplied, the gods of their first creation became farther and farther removed from them; their attributes were so magnified and mystified by the lapse of time, until, in the imagination of their worshippers, they could no longer act as the immediate controlers of the destinies of mankind; hence, other and lesser deities, both male and female, sprang out of, or were begotten by the primary or higher gods. Imagining things always in harmony with their own characters, these gods again, mankind supposed, by a gratification of their lusts to have surrounded themselves with a progeny of demi, or half gods—a class of deities well adapted to the wants of the mass, who by their close relationship with mankind could the better act as mediators between man and the highest class of deities.

The god a man worshipped—then as now—was simply a projection of his own nature; and as men's conceptions of glory, greatness and power are as varied as their local circumstances and intellectual status, the worship of a plurality of gods is a marked feature in the exercise of the devotional instincts of all barbarous and semi-barbarous tribes and nations. War, rapine and plunder was the rule, and not the exception, in the barbarous polity of the ancients; therefore it was impossible for them to conceive of, or to worship deities who acted always in accord or always dwelt together in peace —it was necessary with the gods of their worship—as with themselves MIGHT WAS THE RULE OF RIGHT, and the stronger ruled the rest by his superior strength and by the superiority of his weapons of offense and defense. And, as the electric force was the most wonderful and least understood of all the heavenly phenomena, and yet, with irresistible voice and effect, was so often heard and seen, they clothed the ruling deity with the power of the thunderbolt—in awe of which they supposed all the hosts of heaven stood.

Each tribe or nation had its own particular deity, who, though associating with the other gods, and consulting with them in matters of unusual concern, was nevertheless bound to protect the fortunes and forward the interests of the tribe or nation whose titular or peculiar deity he happened to be.

In those times no undertaking of importance was ever entered into by any tribe without first consulting their augurs, or priests, of their special deity. If war with a neighboring people was in contemplation, and their god, through his augurs, gave his approval of the expedition, he was expected to take charge of the interests of his people and make war, if necessary, upon the gods of the tribe or nation against which they were marching. If he was as powerful as he professed to be and his people believed, they were sure of success, for after he had subdued the opposing god himself, he, by his great power, could thwart and render abortive all the plans of defense made by the people attacked.

On the other hand, if he came in contact with a god stronger than himself, and was well thrashed, his people were overthrown and returned in shame and defeat to their own land, in which case woe to the augurs or priests of the poor beaten god—unless, indeed, the priests succeeded in convincing the exasperated chiefs and people that themselves were the transgressors, through their having neglected to offer some portion of spoil at the shrine of their deity, which they but seldom failed to do. In proof of much that is here written, read Rabshaketh's boast, warning the Jews not to resist his master, "Sennacherib."

Xerxes, King of Persia, is looked upon as a madman because he tried to bind the Hellespont with fetters thrown into its bosom, and caused it to be beaten with rods for its turbulence. He is pronounced insane because, upon his return home, badly whipped and terribly scared, from his unfortunate expedition against Greece; he demolished all the temples of the gods of Asia Minor, and Lybia, and wound up by utterly destroying the temple of Belus at Babylon. I ask, why should he not have done so? To his view of the case, Belus, through his priests, had accepted rich and costly presents from him, and promised him success in his enterprise against Greece, and had promised him power over the seas that it should obey him. The oracles of the gods of Lybia and the cities of Asia Minor, had received his rich offerings and promised him the fulfilment of all that the great god Belus had said. Acting in good faith, he had gathered together his immense hosts, exhausted his treasures, and impoverished his people. Instead of gaining the victory and enriching himself with the spoils of all Greece, he experienced a sad overthrow and a large portion of his army had perished in a foreign land—the prestige of his name and of the greatness of his kingdom was lost forever.

What would have been the result had Moses, after leading the Israelites on an apparently wild goose chase around the borders of Egypt; instead of marching straight out into the wilderness and making his escape before Pharaoh could have gathered his hosts and pursued him—been forsaken by his god. Had the sea refused to obey him when he stretched his rod over it? Would not the Israelites have arisen in their wrath and destroyed him and all his house?

Would not the Jews have handed his name down to latest times as that of a vile imposter, and death have been esteemed too good for him? If this would have been the case with the Jews let us not blame the heathen for visiting with wrath and destruction the temples and the priests of the god who had been the means of bringing such dire calamities on a whole people.

Xerxes was undoubtedly a man in advance of his times. No wily subterfuge of the oracles of the gods of his country could blind him to the fact of their utter helplessness to save in time of trouble, or to the fatality of spending millions of treasure at the shrines of gods who were not able to cope with the gods of the "barbarous Greeks."

The bloody and vindictive characteristics of ancient barbarism was but a reflex of the characters of the gods of their worship. How low must have been the value set upon human life by a people whose deities required the sacrifice of the purest and most innocent of human beings. It was not the blood of the hoary headed sinner, nor of the malefactors that was required to appease their wrath when offended, but the blood of childish innocence. King David in his 100th Psalm —3d verse—charges Israel with sacrificing their children to the gods of the Philistines, and King Ahaz in his idolatry offered up seven of his children as a sacrifice to appease the wrath of a heathen deity. No wonder then, that in those dark and bloody days "it was an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," and that mutilation and death was the penalty attached to almost every degree of crime. How low must have been the moral status of a people whose gods and goddesses were supposed to indulge in illicit pleasures? The orgies enacted in the worship of certain deities by the ancients, are too horrible to be named. We can imagine something of what they must have been, when during the palmiest days of civilization in Greece, the temple of Venus, the titular divinity of the city of Corinth contained one thousand Courtezans, who were at the service of all male worshippers at the shrine of that goddess. When the staid matrons and maidens of Rome, in the highest of her civilization, esteemed it no shame to walk through the streets of the Imperial City, to and from the shrines of some of their deities, in a state of nudity. And when by sacerdotal law, no enquiry was permitted of husband, wife, daughter or sister as to their conduct on certain feast days, of some of the gods, and goddesses of the "mistress of the world."

THE STEAM HORSE IN SALT LAKE VALLEY.

Through cuts in the mountains,
And over the fountains
He rides on a rail
With smoke for his trail,
And that's how the monster comes into our vale.

By day he is steaming,
By night he is gleaming,
His music is rough,
With a snort and a puff,
There never was steed that was neighing so gruff.

And banners are waving,
Yet wild is his raving;
And over the snows
Away he goes,
While whistles sound shrill and his furnace heart glows.

With cannons to greet him,
And thousands to meet him,
How proud was his look!
When the earth he had shook
There seemed a new page in the world's mighty book.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY

Illustrated in Its Great Characters.

INTRODUCTION.

The world's history is God's epic. We find the harmonies of His providence in its every theme. The unfolding of the divine subject and plot are ever in keeping with the progressive phases of the human race. As we seek to trace God in the rise and fall of empires and the unfolding of civilizations, we feel that to this day history is as a sealed book. The inner meanings are not seen; the divine footsteps, in the course of nations, not yet found out. History will neither be written properly nor read aright until the powers above are recognized in the overruling of human affairs, and the providence of the world acknowledged in all its great issues. The conception of Shakspeare, "There is a soul of goodness in things evil," is more than a mere poetic truth; and the epics of the Homers of Greece and the Virgils of Rome, whose inspirations reveal the dramas of immortals and mortals as the inner and outer circles—two worlds in one manifested in the same great action—are something better than mere mythological fancies. Moreover, this conception of a divine epic, worked out in the rise and fall of empires and the destiny of the human race, is also Hebraic. It is the theme of Moses and the Prophets. Jove and Jehovah alike rule the spheres. The being who most represents in his own nature infinite love, and the ultimate of whose mission is to bring to pass peace on earth and good will among men is the type of a God, manifested in the flesh, and the perfected state of man. In these leading views the philosophy of all ages and all nations agree.

History, then, we shall treat as a divine epic, and the world's great characters as its chief actors. Illiads performed on the earth, now under the walls of Troy, now in Rome and Jerusalem, next among the empires of Christendom, finally in the East and the West and the North and the South in a universal dispensation. They cannot be rightly understood in a thousand disconnected fragments. There is a thread running through them from the earliest ages. The principal actors, though separated by a hundred generations, hold relative parts, and spite of the discords made, there is in the performance of the whole a theme of grandest harmony.

The design of the work before us is to trace this harmony in the progressive movements of the world as illustrated in the lives of its great characters, and to mark the lessons which God, through history, has revealed to man. The work will not be essayic but biographical, and its actors will be chiefly those after the opening of the fifteenth century. But we must first give historical epitomes to that period. They will not be all saints. Harry the Eighth must come with the rest to break down popes with the might of his passions, Cromwell to behead kings, and Napoleon with his splendid genius to startle imperial heads with new ideas and shake with his tremendous impulses the consolidations of ages. Catherine De Medicis, Anna Boleyn, Elizabeth of England and Mary of Scots will afford our readers enough of romance, tragedy and crime. Among the imperial and heroic will come Charles the V. of Germany, William the First of Orange, founder of the United States of the Netherlands, and his great-grandson William the Third Prince of Orange, and King of England, who matched the great Prince Conde on the battle field, checkmated the mighty Louis XIII. of France in his policies and combinations, pushed from the throne the last of the Stuart kings and confirmed England's greatest revolution. America will culminate the theme. We shall aim to dramatically arrange the parts and characters that the great epic of the Christian era may impress the reader with the development of its divine and human action.

CHAPTER I.

JESUS, THE CHRIST.

Jesus is the light and the love of the world. "God is Love," was the beginning and the end—aye, the very volume of his revelation to man. As far as Christendom in its churches, its empires, and in the hearts of its peoples have represented the quality of Love, it has represented Christ and his Father. All good and wise men, even to the Unitarian and Deist, have looked upon Jesus as the type of our ultimate humanity—as the standard of man perfected and purified in his nature in the immortality to come. At the very least, the enlightened soul readily confesses that in effect Christ is God-Man—the Father manifested in the flesh.

Though we design neither a biography nor a sermon upon Jesus, it is fit that we should bring him in to lead the epic of his own dispensation, that in tracing the lives of the world's great characters after him we may properly appreciate how much they severally in the history of churches and empires have illustrated the spirit and theme of Him who rules the play divine.

His own words will best illustrate his gospel and the nature of his kingdom in that day:

"Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence.

"Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a king then? Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a king. To THIS end was I born, and for THIS cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice."

Take another illustration:

"Then came they and laid hands on Jesus and took him.

"And behold, one of them which were with Jesus, stretched out his hand and drew his sword, and struck a servant of the High Priest, and smote off his ear.

"Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into its place; for all they that take the sword shall perish by the sword.

"Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?"

Now for a theme of his gospel:

"Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy.

"But I say unto you, love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you;

"That ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

"For if ye love only them which love you, what reward have you? Do not even the publicans the same?"

When humanity embodies this spirit then will it be truly Christian; but never till then shall we have the Christ-state—the love-state of the world.

HIS DISCIPLES.

It was during the pontificate period of St. Linus, the second bishop of Rome, that the Christians separated themselves from the Jewish Synagogues and scattered through Rome, Greece, Egypt and all Asia, having been excommunicated three times on the Sabbath by the Hebrew priesthood. From this time the Jews and the Christians became as separate races, notwithstanding that Jesus and his disciples were selected from the chosen of Abraham's seed. The dispensation of Christ had now fairly passed to the Gentiles and the day of desolation to Jerusalem was nigh at hand. But a few years passed before Titus marched his victorious troops against the holy city, the history of the siege of which strikes horror to the heart even to this day. At length the walls of Jerusalem were leveled to the ground, the inhabitants put to the sword, the temple and city utterly destroyed and the plowshare of the Roman tore up and mangled the sacred soil. The prophecy of Jesus, whom they had rejected and crucified, was fulfilled, and of the glorious temple of Solomon not one stone was left upon another. Thenceforth the Jews were no longer a nation. But shall we say the Lord forsook Israel when He cast him out among the Gentiles to be, for well-nigh two thousand years, a hiss and a by-word in the earth? Nay, there was a Providence in this as there is in all great events. It has enlarged Jacob a hundred fold, and by his wealth to-day he holds the world in his balances and can dictate unto empires.

In the progress of the first century, while the dispensation of providence and of their nationality, were passing away from Judah, it was fast opening to the despised Christians, and empire over the dominant races of the earth, was near in the future for the outlawed and crucified son of Mary. Yet much over zeal, much of a fierce intolerant spirit—so incompatible with the loving universalian nature of Jesus, was manifested by his early disciples in working out a kingdom for him even to his own Apostles. To confess the truth these Former-day Saints were very much like the Latter-day Saints in their history and character. They were cast out of the Synagogues of their nation, persecuted and crucified everywhere, and it made them stern and uncompromising. The early Christians hid themselves in the catacombs of Rome and wandered about in villages and caverns, but they grew in numbers and waxed strong in spirit. Indeed they felt their destiny. The Christians were to become the dominators of the world. They were obscure sectarians then in the eyes of the Roman, but they dared to spit upon the images of his gods and cast down his statues, and then the Prefect of Rome gave them up to the axe. Then came the monster Nero, and the Romans, who were usually tolerant of religionists, massacred the Christians by thousands. The uncompromising zeal with which they enforced their mission upon the world reacted upon themselves, and the bloody Nero took advantage of the bad name which they had obtained in Rome and sent them to the slaughter. It is seldom remembered by the acceptable churches of the day that the early followers of Christ were more obnoxious to the world in the first century, not for their virtues, it was assumed, than are the Saints of the nineteenth century. These facts should be suggestive to us all.

A DISCOURSE ON RAILROAD MATTERS, &c.

BY SAXEY.

"Gentle Reader." Who was it that invented the term "Gentle reader?" we don't know, nor do we particularly care; we only know, and warn the community, that the term is not original with us, having been used in one or two instances heretofore, and is used here only as a quotation, hence we say "gentle reader." Before expatiating upon matters and things the above undersigned pulls off his cap to the public, "roaches" back his beautifully raven colored hair over his intellectual forehead, curves up his neck like a "give out" freight mule (the near one on the off side of the wheelers in the swing team on the lead), and with eyes soaring heavenwards—towards Ogden City, executes, in imagination, one of his highly finished, brass-mounted bows, feeling confident the public will all attend his "benefit," to be given when men get all they deserve if not more; the tickets complimentary, "additional ladies" nothing, children in arms not admitted.

Gentle reader, please examine the paper upon which this article is printed, you perceive it has the body to it equal to the "wear and tear." The last volume of the MAGAZINE was printed on very thin, shabby material; but it was not the editor's fault by any means. There was no one to blame as the paper was all right and thick enough when it left the States, but was eaten down twice by the grasshoppers on the plains. Such an event is warranted not to occur again as Ashley from Ohio, having "served out the measure of his creation" in Congress, is reported to have the contract for herding the "hoppers" next summer to prevent them from eating up the U. P. R. Road. The hoppers did a great amount of damage last year, and by some strange twist or other wherever the hoppers did any damage the people were not benefited. I heard of one man whose farm had gone to wreck for two or three years, the proprietor thinking an imaginary gold ledge in the immediate vicinity a better investment. The hoppers came and camped on the farm over night but left early next morning. A neighbor met the proprietor of the deserted farm afterwards and informed him that the insects had "played out" his crop. The shabby farm owner replied, they took possession of his place one night and if they had but stayed one night longer he thought his farm would have played the hoppers out. That man has sold his farm now and is running a saw mill; he gave "a party" a third to attend the mill and another party two thirds to stock it with logs. The last I heard of him he was almost insane—poor man—because he could n't find the office of the Internal Revenue to pay his ten dollars license on the mill.

Gentle reader thou hast doubtless heard the railroad is in Ogden and past Ogden. Yea, verily, such is the truth. Notwithstanding all the wireworking of the "Mormons" to prevent it, notwithstanding President Young has had Echo Cañon, Weber Valley, and Weber cañon, jammed, crammed full of DANITES for the last ten months—still, in the face of all this, the Iron horse has bunted everything out of his way, including the "bull off the bridge," and to day is screaming towards the Promontory, like an insane Camanche chief after an Indian Agent. Some persons are foolish enough to leave their farms, and notes, at twenty days to go up and see the cars. Now, there is no occasion for this, as I am credibly informed that the Company design leaving a portion of their railroad in the vicinity of Ogden, where it can be seen any time during the coming summer; but people, as well as women, have a curiosity to gratify, and cannot be blamed for wishing to see the sights. It may satisfy many, and save them a trip if I here give a little description of the railroad, which I never should have attempted had the editors done their duty, the fact is the people demand something on railroads, especially the payment of certain checks bearing the signatures of sub-contractors.

Many have an idea that the railroad travels very fast which is not the case; the railroad does not travel at all neither does the grade any more than any other road, it is the locomotive and the cars that do the going. The supposition also that the cars run on the bare ties is incorrect, that was the old style and is found to be too rough now; iron rails about as long as a medium sized stick, and as thick as a pine pole, are laid parallel on the ties and the wheels of the cars run on the rails. If a rail should be left out, or stolen from anywhere on the road, the engineers on the first train in the rear generally find it out, and so do all the passengers; those engine-drivers are very sagacious about little matters of that kind, and, no matter what their hurry may be, will always stop at such places till the necessary repairs are made. Instances have been known where two locomotives have tried to pass each other under full head of steam on a single track, but of late years railroad men have concluded the experiment is useless, as it has never been successfully performed yet, though occasionally engineers will give it another trial.

The locomotive is called the "Iron Horse" because it snorts like a "bronco" with the distemper, and can't be held by the tail. The cars are tied on to the locomotive with buckskin strings, or something tough, the iron horse's bowels are then filled with cold water, and a big fire is built under his belly. When the water begins to boil, the thingimagig under the main driving wheel comes in contact with a couple of concave thingumbobs, which strike a parallel what-you-call-it, connecting with an intermediate turbine convex, which forces the piston-rod through the second gudgeon of the left hand water tank, bringing the center of gravity exactly in the rear of the side lever controlling the three quarter angle attached to the "push-and-pull-it." The engineer then jerks a perpendicularly horizontal crank, the horse gives an outrageous scream, and zip they go. I have been somewhat particular about describing the machinery of the locomotive, as I am aware there are many who have been raised in these valleys who are totally ignorant about engines, and I feel desirous of giving a plain description in order that incorrect impressions may not be adopted by the rising generation with regard to these matters.

THE GAY OLD BACHELOR.

DEDICATED TO THE (UNCOMMON FEW) BACHELORS OF UTAH.

BY JINGO.

[Note.—The following piece was never intended for publication. How it got to this office the author cannot explain. It never would have been written at all, but the writer (an amiable bachelor) was exasperated into composing it by receiving from a lady a satirical communication entitled "The Mournful Old Bachelor." We will publish the cruel epistle next number, being overcrowded at present. In the meantime, "you that have tears prepare to shed them"—then.]

What a cheery old soul, the gay bachelor is!
With his pleasant ways and his beaming phiz,
On bitter cold nights, when fierce winds blow,
When all the earth is covered with snow,
How he stirs up the fire and rolls into bed,
And laughs at the troubles of those who are wed.

How he revels in peace—
From Benedict fled—
As he muffles himself
In his cosy bed.

No children are squalling the livelong night;
No babies to dress and no fires to light;
No cows to be milking—no wood to chop,
No baskets to take to the butcher's shop;
But the warmest nook and the easy chair,
For the bachelor's welcome everywhere.

Then at morn, when the breakfast bell tolls out,
He can tumble and turn himself about
Without hearing his wife, in accents wild,
Sing fearfully out, "my child! my child!"
Can tumble up early, with life alert,
For no one lies on the tail of his s——rt.

The Benedict sits and sucks his thumbs,
Or, taking the child, wet-nurse becomes,
Then the constant strain on the purse's strings,
For the feminine folks' all sorts of things,
Ribbons and pins, and of tapes no end,
Including the frightful Grecian Bend.

The bach's life is free from care,
His cheerful face beams everywhere,
Always happy and always gay,
His pleasures wax from day to day,
His hours roll on like a pleasant dream,
Serenely he glides down time's fair stream.

CHAPTER I.

HOME TO DIE.

"To die—to sleep—
No more;—and, by a sleep, to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to,—'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished."

Back into the past to the year seventeen hundred and ninety-seven. It was September—that month which might not inaptly be named the Poem of the Year.

The reign of autumn was fast spreading over the country, and many a "sear and yellow leaf" met the eye of the dying De Lacy as his family chariot wended its way on the road between Bath and Sherbourne. He was languidly reclining in the spacious, soft-cushioned chariot; yet the eye at once took in the fact that he had been an exceedingly elegant and well made man of about five feet eleven. His general appearance was that which characterizes the English gentleman of high birth: and, while he strongly showed the stamp of their proud cast, there could be seen in him, coupled with a high-toned and generous soul, that mild dignity and unostentatious manner, which have made the hereditary gentlemen of England so exalted in the minds of the peasantry above the middle classes and moneyocracy of the land. Our dying traveler was a fine specimen of that class, whose pride of character and family is not a barren representative of naked, unadorned rank. He was a man of that quality of life and character who would be honored and loved by his tenantry, as much as that of some good Baron of feudal times. In fact, in spite of the decline of his family and the transfer of the estates of his ancestors into other hands, the loyal tenantry of his father still looked upon Lord Frederick De Lacy as their hereditary head and proper lord of lands which had been for generations the domains of the De Lacy family.

A solitary foot-traveler had, for several miles, kept pace with the chariot of the dying gentleman, as the horses trod gravely—almost solemnly—along, like those accustomed to the funeral hearse. From time to time, he cast stealthily, sympathizing glances into the carriage upon the dying man, wondering what could have so suddenly broken down so fine a form, of one whose age he mentally calculated at not more than twenty-seven years.

Nor was the wonder of the foot-traveler strange; for Lord Frederick had possessed a constitution as solid, comparatively, as the castle of his ancestors, and a frame as finely built; but, like the fortunes of his house, it had declined, and he was now at life's last ebb. He had recently conquered a fever; yet he was dying—conquered a fever in spite of his will—dying, evidently, not against his will.

A thoughtful little boy, of about five years of age, sat at the bottom of the carriage, with his little hands clinging, as with love caresses, to his father's knee, and looking pleadingly into his parent's face to catch his glances from time to time. The artless motive of the intelligent boy was to engage his sire's attention; for he instinctively understood that he was the link which chained his father to life.

Ever and anon, the dying man would arouse from his languishment to death, and, with sudden energy, start from the irresistible languor that stole over him. Though too much exhausted, even by the very power that aroused him to caress his child, he would bestow upon him a glance of intense feeling and tenderness which the little fellow would diplomaticly answer by taking the opportunity of holding his father, for a time, by his innocent prattle, but would soon relapse into his languishing state, each time more exhausted by the efforts put forth in his battle with death.

"Mamma will come back soon! Don't leave Freddy to go for mamma! Talk to Freddy, papa. I am sure mamma will come back!"

That little orphan boy in black told a volume by the side of his dying father, with his infantine mystification upon Death, and the length of his dominion over those subject to his reign; that motherless child told the cause of that shadow of anguish, which flitted, from time to time, across Lord Frederick's pale countenance. The dying man knew but too well that his little darling, motherless son would soon be also fatherless, and knew, too, that neither father nor mother could come back to him in mortality from "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns." The De Lacy felt that, had she remained, his powerful constitution would have conquered the fever that had carried his wife to the grave before him; but his loss and yearning for his beloved dead took from him the power to conquer for life and child. Death and life consumed him, and his self-reproach was from the consciousness that his boy would soon be fatherless, because that father had lost the mother—his wife.

"Nurse said mamma would come back," persisted the little fellow. "I am sure she will if God up in heaven will let her. I know mamma can't stay away from Freddy and papa. God will let her come back, won't he?"

The dying gentleman could bear it no longer. With a mighty effort of his every mortal energy—with the intense yearning of his whole being, Lord Frederick caught his boy in his arms and convulsively pressed him to his breaking heart, and burst into passionate sobs, while the child, terrified by his father's tears, clung, crying, around his neck. A week before and this mighty struggle of De Lacy to remain with his motherless child would have conquered Death at his very gates; but now no mortal prowess could win the battle—no human affection or yearning could hold him long to earth.

The child hushed his own sobs to hush the strong ones of his dying sire.

"Don't cry, papa!" and he wiped, with his infant hands, his parent's eyes. "Freddy will let you go and fetch mamma."

"Father of the fatherless more abundantly be to him in my stead," prayed the dying nobleman.

"Talk to me about the good Sir Richard and baby Alice," the child coaxed, to draw his sire into a sunnier prospect.

Thus with childhood's deepest impressions. Its heavy calamities are like writing upon the sand, from which a child, tripping along, will efface a volume of sorrows, and its tiny foot dance away a record of direst events.

Slowly, solemnly rolled the family chariot of the De Lacy towards the ancestral house of Sir Richard Courtney, lord of a noble estate in the county of Somersetshire, England.

Night had hung her black mantle over the ancestral mansion of Sir Richard Courtney. The day which had been so serene and mellow, saw at its close the signs of the gathering thunderstorm. A solemn silence reigned in that stately mansion, for while night has spread her dark drapery without Death has hung his sable pall within.

Lord Frederick De Lacy was in the last sweet sleep of his mortal life, which stole over him after his arrival at the mansion of his friend, where he had come to die. By his side sat Sir Richard Courtney, whose love for the dying nobleman was as the love of David for Jonathan.

When Lord Frederick arrived at Sir Richard Courtney's, he was so exhausted that life scarcely remained, and although he recognized his friend, he was powerless to speak. A strengthening cordial was administered and he soon fell into a refreshing sleep upon the baronet's own bed, where he directed his servants to lay his beloved friend. He had slept nearly six hours, for the journey, though it much fatigued him, made his sleep deeper and refreshing.

It was now about nine o'clock at night. By the bed of death Sir Richard had mournfully sat watching his friend, and listening to the storm without, which did not awe but served to deepen his meditation upon the memory of the past—the events which had consummated the ruin of the De Lacy family and the will of that mysterious Power of Good which had summoned the two dear ones of himself and friend, who had stood together at the same marriage altar, and who now also sent the dread message of Death to that friend himself.

At length the silent revery of Courtney was broken, and he mournfully murmured—

"Life would have been even now in the fresh-opened bud of our youth, yet of those beloved ones who, in that quiet village church, on that blessed day when all seemed sunshine for many a cloudless year, entered into holy marriage-bonds—of them all, I, I alone, shall, ere to-morrow comes, be left the last. Were it not for the many holy trusts committed to me, to which will soon be added this dear, motherless, fatherless boy, I could almost wish that thou and I, my brother, were about to stand again at the same altar—this time at the alter above, to be united with our dear ones forever."

The half wish of Sir Richard might be unorthodox, but in our fresh, fond youth, we all more or less hope for a re-union eternal in a better world with those we love on earth.

Perhaps the fond, pathetic murmurings of Courtney found an echo in the sympathies of a departing soul, for Lord Frederick moved gently—he was waking for the last time in mortal life. Sir Richard was ready to catch the first glance of consciousness of his dying friend, for he knew that although he would awake, renewed awhile, his very moments were numbered.

"Thank Heaven I have lived to see you once more!" exclaimed the dying man, as he became conscious of the presence of his friend.

Courtney knelt by the bed of death, and taking the hand of Lord Frederick, with sobs, which he could no longer suppress, burst into the utterance of friendship's agony—"Oh! brother of my soul, that we should thus meet again."

"'Tis not, Richard, the kind of visit I promised—is it?" De Lacy replied. "I and my Agnes and our darling boy—all should have been your joyous guests. But my wife—well, I am going to her soon, and I come to leave our son with you. Heaven willed it otherwise, my brother."

"That you should come to my ancestral home to die!" observed the baronet in a broken voice, as the warm tears of friendship, which swelled up from his true manly heart, fell upon the hand, which he held, of his dying companion, as he knelt tenderly over him.

"Why, where could I better come to die, old friend?" half cheerfully, and with fond confidence, replied Lord Frederick; "I fear not death; it has a prospect brighter now to me than life. Since my Agnes passed away I have longed to join her in a brighter sphere, and I have come to spend the last moments of my mortal life with you, who shared so many of its years with me."

"Would to God many more remained for us to share together."

"An eternity above, Richard!—friends—brothers forever where brotherhood is first, highest, most enduring," fervently came from De Lacy, his countenance lit with the divine enthusiasm of a departing soul that fears not death.

After a moment's pause, the dying nobleman said—

"My son, Richard, I leave to your guardianship—my darling little one who has held me to life since his mother died. I could not—I dared not pass away until I had placed him myself into your hands. To none but you, my more than brother, could I trust without a pang of agony, my motherless, fatherless boy."

"Not fatherless! not fatherless! Oh, not fatherless while I live!" Sir Richard interrupted with emphasis of his strong, noble nature.

And the friends fondly clasped each other's hand in expressive silence. In that silent communion of souls they understood the feelings and sublime mutual confidence in each other that moved them. Their language of sympathy was more expressive than vocal speech.

"There is a scene of our youth, Frederick, that I would recall," observed the baronet. He wished to arouse his friend to the future of their families and their dearly cherished compacts, and he continued to him suggestively—

"That night in Rome!—You remember, Frederick?"

"Remember? I have it always before me. I am here to die because of that night. I saw nothing on my journey which did not conjure up that night—that sacred compact."

"You remember the nature of that compact, my friend?" said Courtney, aiming to hold De Lacy's wandering mind to the object.

"Yes, 'twas in Rome; I remember."

"The present?—the past?—ourselves?—the children?" interrogated the baronet with anxious prompting.

"Aye, word by word—item by item. I have come to you that all may be fulfilled," Lord Frederick replied, and then relapsing into his wandering revery of the past; again he murmured—

"Yes, it was in Rome—grand, old historic Rome! How fresh and bold that scene comes back from the memory of the past like reality repeated."

"Yes, yes, dear Frederick," interrupted Sir Richard, for he knew the very moments of his friend were numbered, but still the dying nobleman continued to dream—

"The night was full of poetry, high thoughts and generous sentiments. The soft sky of sunny Italy was eloquent with Nature's tenderness and the gentle Zephyrs which fanned the uncovered heads of two youths, were heard in the ruins of that old monastery, like a vocal chorus, sanctioning the vows of friendship."

"Yes, yes, those youths, my brother," still prompted Sir Richard.

"Together they enter those stately ruins, as reverently as though they had been sons of the church of Rome. Solemnly they approach the broken altar and vow a life friendship which nothing should sever."

"And they promised, Frederick, that should the fortunes of either become as that noble edifice—a ruin—they would foreswear all false pride and share as brothers.

"I am here to fulfill the compact of our budding manhood, Richard. For myself I claim my part of the inheritance of my brother—your family vault. Let me rest awhile in the hallowed resting-place of your ancestors."

"But why this strange request? My ancestors would welcome a De Lacy to their last home, but what would yours say, Frederick?"

"Listen, Richard, for I feel my time is shortly measured. My ancestral home and estates have fallen into the hands of our house's enemy."

"I will avenge you!"

"Not so, my brother. Fate willed to humble my race for their pride, for pride was their greatest sin. My enemy and his father were but instruments to the end."

"Your son and his children shall yet inherit that which his race so long possessed."

"I believe it, Richard."

"I will see the debt wiped out if Providence spares me," said Sir Richard, and then he quickly continued, for he knew the time was short and the strength of the dying gentleman waning.

"In the union of our children, Frederick, much of the future lies which shall restore your house united with mine. A part of that night's sacred compact was to unite our races should Heaven bless us with children, providing it did not outrage their own free choice."

"What is more likely now, their young days will be entwined! Heaven grant it!" earnestly invoked the dying De Lacy.

"Amen, my brother!" responded Sir Richard.

"I shall die at least with the blessed prospect that you will indeed be the father of my orphan son and our friendship perpetuated in the love of our children. Yes, should they love, the compact in that old monastery will be fulfilled."

"In this awful hour be that compact renewed, my brother, between us," said Courtney, with uplifted hands.

"Even so Richard—even so!" joined in his friend, and then with the light of an almost unveiled soul looking its last out of Nature's windows and a spiritual transparency illuminating his pale clasical countenance he said:—

"As I near the other side towards eternity the future brightens. 'Twill be fulfilled! The compact of our youth will rebuild the house of my ancestors and our common offspring be its future lord. God be praised!"

"But there is one matter more Richard, and then one last earthly embrace of my darling son, and blessing for your family."

"Name it and it shall be fulfilled my brother."

"Should the De Lacy estates be redeemed then remove me from the last resting place of your race and lay me beside my ancestors."

Sir Richard promised; and then summoned his family. He returned to the chamber of death, leading the orphan "Freddy" and "baby Alice" as the boy called her. Following was young Walter Templar, a dark intellectual youth of about seven years of age, with his cousin of a similar type—Eleanor Courtney. Lady Templar brought up the rear of the family. But one unbidden entered. It was old George—the faithful last remaining servant of the De Lacys. No one questioned the right of the old man's presence in that chamber of death as he stood just inside the room like a faithful watch dog, longing, yet fearing to approach to lick its master's hand: His dying master hearing his sobs called him by the familiar name of "Old Fidelity" and beckened him to his bed-side.

The last affecting chapter of man's relationship with this world was passed and Sir Richard was again alone with his dying friend. No High Priest was in that chamber of death to support the DeLacy in mortality's last moments; but one was there who had received the consecration of a holier unction than that which Canterbury's priestly head could give—Friendship had consecrated him for the service. No Divine of England's Church, to which they both belonged, knelt by that bed of death to read its prayers for departing souls, but one knelt there who, as the soul of Lord Frederick departed, sent up to the Receiver of the spirits of the just a petition, eloquent and powerful from friendship's inspiration.

CHAPTER II.

THE DE LACYS AND THE SUPPLANTERS.

The De Lacys were one of the oldest and noblest families in England of high Norman descent; and as usual with the various branches of that stock of warrior chiefs who came over with William the Conqueror, they had been distinguished for pride of family. They had not been without their bad representatives, but the majority had been of the quality of Lord Frederick. Of course the difference of the times reflected in the more modern representatives of their house a softer texture of their race. They were exceedingly jealous of their personal and family honor, and particular about sustaining the irreproachable character the De Lacys bore.

The grandfather of Lord Frederick considered it a sacred duty, which he owed both to his ancestors and descendants, to sustain the magnificence of their house; to do this the nobleman considered his income not too large; and, had it been ten times as much, he would have felt bound in honor to have exhausted it, to the glorification of his family. But, in justice to the old lord, it must be said that he considered a De Lacy in honor bound to appropriate no inconsiderable portion of his income to the well being of his tenantry and preserving and improving his family domain.

Had the grandfather of Lord Frederick gone no farther than the exhaustion of his family income, the ruin which afterwards befel his house had not been invoked; but it was the too princely magnificence with which the old lord sustained the glory of his family and name which left their estates involved at his death under mortgage to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds.

Lord Reginald, his son, as little understood retrenchment as his father; for the very necessity of retrenchment was new to the De Lacys, and though Lord Reginald yearly paid the interest of the mortgage, which to him was curtailment enough, he discharged not a farthing of the principal debt.

Matters, however, went along without further embarrassment until young Frederick reached the age of fifteen, when a train of circumstances came along which first pointed to the black, looming clouds gathering over the De Lacy house. The firm which held the mortgage of of the estates became bankrupt and the mortgage was required to be taken up. This put Lord Reginald to his wits' end; but at the very crisis came one to his help whom it were better had he never seen.

At the date of Lord Reginald's difficulties General Blakely had just returned from India. The history of this personage is briefly as follows:

The General was by birth a plebeian. His father, a clerk of a large banking company, was sent by the firm to India, at a time when it was beginning to be the El Dorado of the world. He was a sharp, industrious, money scraping little man; and, in a few years, he became principal of a firm himself. He might not have been too strict in his principles, nor too scrupulous in his honesty, but this stood not in the way of his becoming immensely rich. His wife and son soon followed him to India, and the former dying in a year, left her husband free to marry the daughter of a poor General in the service of the East India Company. When the son of the banker and money-lender reached maturity, his father obtained for him a commission in the service, and the young man became a military protege of General Maitland, the poor father-in-law of the rich Simon Blakely.

Blakely jr., was not without courage, though of plebeian origin: nor is this very remarkable, for the lower classes can fight as well as the "upper-ten." In fact, pluck is quite a quality of the Anglo-Saxon race. There was no reason, therefore, why young Blakely, as an officer of the East India service, should not distinguish himself, and in time, with the advantages of favor and wealth, become what he now was—himself a General.

After an absence of twenty-five years, General Blakely returned to his native land, which he left as a boy from the people; but now he was no longer one of the vulgar populace—he returned to enter the circles of the elite of the land, having the passport of high military rank and the reputation of an Indian naboh.

Now the General rode a high hobby-horse. His ambition was to found a family, and he was in search of some broken-down noble house. The declining family of the De Lacys threw into his hands the winning card of the stakes for which he played. His banker introduced him to Lord Reginald at the crisis of that nobleman's difficulties; and, though with much reluctance on the part of De Lacy, a transfer of the mortgage was made to the wealthy General. Thus was further paved the ruin of an ancient stock.

Soon after this event, General Blakely paid a visit to Lord Reginald; and so subtly did he play the part which he had taken for the utter ruin of the declining fortunes of the De Lacys, that he effectually wormed himself into the good graces of Lord Reginald, and obtained his entire confidence. Thus was a great part of the game won, for the noble lord had previously felt toward the wealthy mortgagee of his family estates, something akin to distrust. Of this the General was aware, and played his cards accordingly. He put himself under many obligations to the proud but generous De Lacy. It was Lord Reginald's tenantry that sent the General to the English Parliament, and it was Lord Reginald's hand that opened the stately doors of England's select aristocracy to one who, though he held high military rank in the East India Company's service, had no ancient family to claim, nor a single relative to be found in any branch of the hereditary gentlemen of the land. But the friendship and countenance of his patron was to the wealthy plebeian in aristocratic circles what among the moneyocracy of the present day it would be to a commercial man to be seen on 'Change, arm-in-arm, in close fellowship with King Rothschild. The General was, therefore, under very great obligation to the De Lacy—indeed more deeply indebted to him than was the nobleman himself to his scheming creditor; for Lord Reginald's friendship and support obtained for him what all his wealth could not have purchased. Now the General was very frank and constant in his acknowledgment of the great favors conferred upon him by his noble friend, and would not hear from Lord Reginald anything touching the mortgage upon his estates. He insisted that he was vastly indebted to the De Lacys, and not they to him—that through their representative he had been advanced in social and political position, more than all his wealth alone could have secured; and the General was irresistible in the sophistry that he had personally plucked the fruits of the princely state of the De Lacy family. When Lord Reginald was in the humor to contemplate retrenchment, Blakely was at hand to combat the design, which he declared was unkind to himself. The nobleman, however, was not too proud to receive an acknowledgment in words; it was the substantial one which his wealthy creditor offered that he was so nice upon. But the General urged that he also had his pride and was as tender as the De Lacy upon a point of honor. If Lord Reginald would not condescend to a reciprocity of friendship and favors with him, then he would owe to the De Lacys as little as possible, and pay off a portion of his own debt to them by destroying the mortgage which he held against their estate. He even went so far in consummation of his deep-laid plot as to send the mortgage deeds to Lord Reginald, which that nobleman returned, as the General well knew he would.

Thus it was, the General's course being so plausible, and what he urged so true in point of fact and honor, that the nobleman committed the grave error of allowing his political protege to treat the mortgage as a simple reciprocity of favors, and to carry his point in his determined refusal to receive the yearly interest, thus humoring what his own sensitive mind acknowledged to be a just aversion to the base character of a money-lender. It was a deep-laid plot of one who was at once the moral debtor though legal creditor of the De Lacy, who fell into the arch-schemer's trap.

General Blakely was too great a tactician to hurry his issues. It had taken him several years of cunning management and high-toned special pleading to place the mortgage so far as the interest went upon the ground of mutual favors and friendship; and it was not until years afterwards that it suited his purpose to disclose the denouement. Nor was the last act in the consummation of the deep-laid plot less masterly than any which preceded.

The General brought with him a candidate into the field at an election, whom he knew to be not only personally obnoxious to his patron, but who was politically on the other side. The General also himself left Lord Reginald's party knowing that this would bring matters to a close, and to the unscrupulous Blakely one party was as good as another so long as they served his ambitious ends. Moreover, with his usual subtilty, he put a great deal of principle into his political metamorphosis. Villainy is never so securely encased in impenetrable armour, nor endowed with such Herculean prowess as when it wears the armour of the noble and good and fights with their weapons. Satan is never Arch-Fiend pre-eminently only when he appears as "Angel of Light."

For the first time Lord Reginald began to realize that he was betrayed, but he dreamt not to how fearful an extent. General Blakely contrived to work up strong and bitter antagonism between himself and his noble patron's party, whom he had deserted, thus preparing for the great blow against the betrayed nobleman, and entrenching himself and treachery behind politics and the party whom he had joined.

On the other hand Lord Reginald set about clearing off the mortgage, and then, to his horror and dismay, he discovered that legally the debt had assumed the huge proportions of nearly half a million. At a glance he saw that the moral aspect of the case would not bear a moment's practical consideration, and he felt that he had been, from the beginning, the victim of a deep-laid plot. This was substantiated by his son Frederick's relation of the threat of Herbert Blakely, whom he had defeated in a fight at Eton. Lord Reginald was too proud to complain or advertise how he had been duped and how unwise, in a business point of view, he had been in allowing the arch-schemer to so easily accomplish his ruin. The De Lacy, therefore, accepted the issue without complaint, but with a broken heart, and died a few months before the death of his son, Lord Frederick, at the mansion of Sir Richard Courtney, as related in our first chapter.

But one of the last acts of the mortal life of Lord Reginald and his son was a striking example of the high character and proud sense of family honor, which gave the distinguishing feature of their race. They cut off the entail of their estates so that they could be sold if it came to the worst, to wipe out their obligations to the Blakelys. They refused, however, to sell to the General, who offered terms which would have partly redeemed his treachery, but Lord Reginald made a compromise and placed into his hands the estates until the original mortgage, with the accumulated interest, was paid, and thus was transmitted to the heir of the De Lacys, their family inheritance. The General would have foreclosed and forced the sale had it not been that Sir Richard Courtney and his brother-in-law, Sir Edmund Templar, declared that they would redeem the estates themselves at any sacrifice if the General persisted in his design.

The friends of the De Lacys considered that Blakely had betrayed his patron, but so much of a political character was given to the affair by the master-schemer that those of the opposition who had received the votes once in the gift of Lord Reginald, not only feigned blindness to unfair play, but for their own sakes defended him. The General had calculated the efficacy of self-interest and found that he had not over-estimated its virtue. Virtue? Aye, virtue! Charity covers a multitude of sins, and it is a virtue. Go and encase in the self-interest of others, and it shall cover for you ten multitudes of loud-clamoring sins.

After he became the possessor of the De Lacy estates, until the time of their redemption, the General commanded half a dozen seats in the House of Commons, which he held in his gift through his immense wealth and large landed influence, which he had now obtained in Wiltshire and Kent. No Parliamentary candidate could run against his nominees where his landed power dominated, and as the General was insanely ambitious to found a family, he spared nothing to compass that end. He spent his vast income, derived from landholds in two counties, monies invested in stocks and large property in India, yet he made every farthing tell to gain political power and to raise his family among the aristocracy. He was ever ready to come to the help of men in pecuniary difficulties, providing, always, that they had votes at their command. At first, after the advantage taken of Lord Reginald, men in embarrassment were shy of him, but this soon wore off, for after all, on the outside of the matter, in a business point of view, there was not much to complain of; moreover, farmers, tradesmen and all who could command votes and place them at his disposal in the two counties wherein lay his large estates, found the General the easiest of money-lenders and the most generous of mortgagees. Petty usurer he was not, neither a tyro in policy, but rather of the genus Macchiavelli. He wove the meshes of his net with the strongest principles and the finest feelings and sentiments; and held as the doctrine of his life that in liberal policy and schemes of benevolence the very best investments were to be made. He coined capital out of gratitude and devotion, and prided himself that he had purchased more services, votes and political power by well-timed acts of help, loans and gifts, than he could by the most lavish direct bribery.

You subtle apostles of the black art of human motives, everywhere, hold the Talleyrandian doctrine that every man has his price, and the political party whom the General helped into the ministry, knew his price—a baronetcy—and gave it to him. But no sooner had he obtained the object which he had in view from boyhood, and which his father—the wealthy usurer and banker—had first pointed out to him, than he became melancholy and lost all interest in things generally. In gaining the object of his life he had lost the aiming for it, and from that point had no object for the future. Perhaps, also, his treachery to the De Lacy helped to make up his discontent, for it was one of the few acts of his life which his sophistry could not justify. Even the General was not all dross and, as we have seen, usually accomplished his deep-laid plots by the best of means. Indeed he had often observed to the vindictive Herbert, who was ever drinking gall from his defeat at Eton, that Lord Reginald was such a true gentleman, and he indebted to him so much, that was he not bent upon the possession of the estates, he would not supplant the De Lacy family to establish his own. There was no disagreement, however, between the father and son in their determination to hold what they had obtained, and one of the last charges of the General to Herbert, was to leave no stone unturned to make the Blakelys the actual owners of the De Lacy estates.

OUT AT THE CASEMENT.

BY MISS ANNIE LOCKHART.

A face at the casement peering out:
Two bright brown eyes gazing wistfully down:
Two beautiful brows just arched with delight,
As he rides with his soldiers through the town.

* * * * * *

A face eager and older looking forth—
A wee sweet darling head, nestling mild:
"The war is ended; his work is done;
He lives, he lives, for his wife and child!

"Ride quickly, O steed! that bears my love,
Speed, speed him along his happy flight—
He has fought for his country's common weal—
Ah! give him rest in my arms to-night."

O praying soul! thy desire is heard;
The rest is given, the haven is reached;
Not in thy arms is that haven found,
On the shore eternal his bark is beached.

O sad, sad face! from no casement gaze—
"Shut it close; let me see no more
Where once my warrior proudly rode,
Let me forget what has gone before.

"Why was he taken? my hero—mine;
Could not my love have power to save
The life that was all the world to me
From out the jaws of the cruel grave?"

All sudden a shaft of radiant light,
A glory of brightness lit the gloom,
A sense of his presence her being filled;
"He is not shut in that dreary tomb!"

E'en as of old from the casement out
Her fair young face beamed down on him,
So now from the portals of heaven high
He gazed upon her with no vision dim.

"I wait for you on these shores supernal,
This is no fancied vision wild,
I see you—I love you—I'll welcome you—
I live for my darling wife and child."

HOW TO LOSE A LOVER.

It was a chill tempestuous evening in autumn. The wind rose in fitful gusts, now uttering a long, low wail, like the voice of human suffering, and again swelling into the loud, fierce tone of threatened wrath, while the dead leaves, whirled from the dry branches by the force of the tempest, swept by with the rushing sound of some winged creature, and the sudden bursts of rain dashed with the force of hail-stones against the unsheltered casement. It was a night when the poor man's cold hearthstone and scantily-spread board look doubly desolate—a night when the child of fortune gathers around him all the comforts and luxuries of life, feeling their value increased ten-fold by the force of contrast.

In a handsome apartment, whose rich carpet, silken hangings, and costly furniture, bore witness to the presence of wealth—while the gilt harp, the open piano, the well-bound books, and the objects of vertu scattered around spoke no less of taste and elegance—sat two persons who seemed peculiarly well-fitted to dwell amid such scenes.

The lady was young and very beautiful. Her simple but carefully arranged dress displayed the contour of a superb figure, while her attitude, as she bent over the harp, was one of exquisite grace. In seeming idleness of mood, she lightly touched the strings, and murmured rather than sang the touching words of an old ballad. Her eyes, downcast and shrouded from view by her heavy black lashes, were never once raised to the face of her companion, although the rich color which gradually deepened in her cheek might have betrayed her consciousness of his ardent gaze.

It was a subject for a painter—that stately room, with its picturesque adornments, visible by the soft moonlight of a shaded lamp, while the beautiful creature who occupied the foreground of the picture was not more worthy of the artist's pencil than was the thoughtful, noble-looking man, who, half-reclining on a sofa, watched her every movement with a loving eye.

Indeed, charming as was the lady, there was far more for both painter and poet to study in the face and mind of her companion. Charles Lilbourne had been all his life a dreamer rather than a student. A large fortune, which he inherited at an early age had enabled him to shun the sordid paths of worldly business, and the gratification of his intellectual tastes had occupied his early manhood. Gifted with fine talents, he also possessed those strong passions which are ever the attendants on mental vigor; but his noble elevation of soul guarded him from the errors that often await an excitable and impulsive youth. His intellect seemed to purify the atmosphere of his moral nature. He had been a traveler in all lands, and had dwelt amid all nations. He had ripened his fancies and feelings beneath the sunshine of all climes; and now, unsatisfied and lonely, he had returned to breathe once more his native air, in the vain hope of renewing the simple tastes and habits of his boyhood.

When Charles Lilbourne went abroad, his cousin Julia was a child, a pretty, pettish little creature, who sat on his knee and teased him for bonbons. After ten years of absence, he returned, to find his plaything transformed into the elegant and admired woman. True to his susceptible nature, whilst he fancied that he was only watching the phases of a new character, he became a lover and a worshipper; yet his idolatry, unlike the homage of a common mind, rendered him doubly sensitive to any defect in the object of his devotion. Julia Grey possessed no extraordinary mental or moral gifts. With some talent, but much more tact, she adapted herself to the tastes of others, with a degree of skill scarcely compatible with perfect truthfulness. She was a cheerful, intelligent, agreeable girl, without any fixed purpose in life, except to marry when she should become satiated with the pleasures of society; without any fixed principles of action, except of pleasing and the fear of offending conventional rules. Such was Julia Grey; such are most women when their scholastic education is completed, and they are sent into society to be molded or remodeled by circumstances.

On the evening already alluded to, Charles Lilbourne was in one of his most dreamy moods. Fearful of disturbing the current of vague, sweet fancies, he spoke not, stirred not; and even the entrance of a servant with some message, which caused Julia to break the chain of a gentle melody, scarcely aroused him.

"How beautiful she is!" sighed he, as the door closed behind the fair girl; "how beautiful and how good! Can it be that the happiness of winning such a heart is reserved for me?"

Just at this moment, his ear caught the low, pleading tone of some one speaking in the hall.

"Indeed, Miss Grey," said the person, "it was impossible to finish the dress this evening; I have been obliged to make up mourning for a lady who has just lost her only child, and I knew you would not mind the disappointment of a few hours."

"But I do mind it," was the sharp reply of Julia Grey. "It seems to me that somebody is sure to die when I want any work done. I am sure there is no necessity for any great haste in making up mourning; people don't want to go out at such times, and they need not be so particular about the color of their dresses."

"I can have your dress completed by Wednesday," said the first speaker.

"That will not answer; I must have it to-morrow evening; I want it in time for a party at Mrs. Lawton's."

"I shall scarcely be able to get it done without working all night, but I will do my best."

"Well, let me have it at any rate, by eight o'clock to-morrow evening, and be sure not to disappoint me. I will send you the lace trimming in the morning; the weather is so dark and stormy, I am afraid to trust you with it to-night, for you might lose or be robbed of it on your way home. Why didn't you come before dark?"

"Mother was not well, and I could not leave her sooner."

"Oh, I remember she is blind and gives you a great deal of trouble. I will send the lace in the morning, and you know how I want it laid on the skirt and sleeves."

Lilbourne heard the hall-door close; and the next moment, with a smile of gentle benignity, Julia re-entered the room.

"I am completely chilled!" she exclaimed, as she drew her chair to the fire.

Charles had risen from his indolent position, and now, with knit brow and folded arms, stood leaning against the chimney-piece.

"With whom were you talking?" he coldly asked, while the glance of his dark eyes betrayed his interest in the answer.

Piqued at his unwonted indifference, Julia sought to arouse his jealousy, and, accordingly, she assumed all her brilliancy, and never forgot that her chief object was to increase the power of her spells over her cousin. She had studied his peculiarities; she had adopted his tone of thought; and already her work was half done, when one little trait, so habitual as entirely to escape her own attention—one evidence of selfishness and unwomanly disregard to the comfort of another, spoiled her plans, and marred her happiness.

"It was a poor dressmaker whom I employ out of charity," said Julia, with a meek air of conscious rectitude. "She is poor, and supports her blind mother, and I therefore patronize her instead of employing a more fashionable modiste."

"I dare say you are quite satisfied with her skill, or else your taste would overcome your charity?"

"I believe you are right, cousin Charles, was the apparently frank reply; "but Clara certainly has an innate idea of the 'fitness of things.' "

"Is the poor girl pretty?"

"Quite so; with soft, dove-like eyes and beautiful brown hair; but she is pale and thin, and lacks the roundness of healthful symmetry."

"Where does she live?"

"Somewhere in Blank street, just behind your hotel, I believe."

"Have you ever visited her in the course of your patronage?"

"Certainly not; I always send for her to come to me; I would not for the world enter one of those close and crowded places where poor people huddle together; I am sure I should catch some frightful fever."

Charles Lilbourne was silent; and as Julia drew her harp again toward her, he fell into another fit of musing. But now his thoughts were apparently less agreeable, for the expression of languid enjoyment in his countenance had given place to a stern coldness, which Julia could neither comprehend nor dissipate.

That night he returned, sad and dissatisfied, to his hotel. Captivated by Julia's beauty, he had, as usual, believed her gifted with all womanly feelings and sympathies; and now, like all seekers after perfection, the discovery of a single flaw in the diamond made him regard it as utterly false and worthless; Indeed, Julia could scarcely have done anything which would so suddenly have disenchanted him. He had witnessed her selfish gratification of her own whims even at the expense of another's comfort—he had listened to a falsehood from her lips, for he well knew that the party for which she required the dress would not take place till the day after which she had named, and that therefore the requisition which would deprive the poor seamstress of her nightly rest was as unnecessary as it was cruel—he had seen her shrinking from a moment's exposure to that inclemency from which she had not sought to screen a woman as delicate as herself—he had heard her express fears for the safety of a paltry lace trimming, while she scrupled not to suffer the unprotected and timid girl to return alone through the darkness and tempest to her distant home: in fine, he had discovered a want of womanly tenderness in the character of his lovely cousin; and when a man has learned the falsehood of a single attribute with which his fancy has invested the lady of his love, it is wonderful how acute he becomes in his scrutiny of all her gifts.

As he entered his well-furnished bed-chamber, at the hotel, he approached the window, intending to close the curtains previous to retiring for the night, when his eye fell upon a solitary taper twinkling in an apartment of a neighboring abode. The houses in the street behind the hotel faced his window, as his bed-room was in the back. It was in one of these domiciles, the attic casement of which was scarcely thirty feet from him, that he now saw the light. So common and trivial a circumstance, at any other time, would scarcely have claimed a thought; but, in his present state of mind, it was calculated to interest him deeply.

He remembered his cousin's allusion to the dressmaker's abode; and he felt an innate conviction that the lonely taper was lighting her to her weary task. His curiosity was fully awakened. He saw a shadow upon the muslin curtain which shrouded the window; and as a change in her position brought the occupant of the room directly before the casement, the figure of a woman bending low over a piece of needlework was clearly defined. As he gazed, a feeling of benevolent indignation took possession of his mind. A degree of interest, so strong that he might have attributed it to the secret influence of some mysterious magnetism, if he had not been fully aware of the wonderfully attractive power of sympathy, chained him to the spot.

With his eyes fixed on that solitary taper, and the shadow of that weary watcher, he dreamt away the hours, weaving a mingled web of sorrow and romance, until the gray dawn of morning flecked the dark vault of heaven. Then, and not till then, was the taper extinguished, and a pale, wan face approached the casement. Lilbourne gazed unseen upon the fragile-looking creature; who, throwing aside the curtain, raised the window, and leaned forth, as if to catch one breath of fresh, unpolluted air. He saw much beauty in the pallid countenance; but he also read the lines of habitual suffering; he observed the traces of exhaustion, and he felt disposed to curse the selfish vanity of those who win the flattery of fools at the price of a sister's health and life.

It was late in the afternoon when Lilbourne entered the drawing-room where his beautiful cousin awaited him. His manner was abstracted and cold; and Julia, vexed by his pertinacious resistance to her wiles, became exacting and petulant. It was evident to both that something had weakened the spell—that some ingredient had been mixed in the Circean cup which had been so carefully mingled by beauty's hand. Lilbourne was disappointed, and, of course, unreasonable. A man of more frankness would have disclosed his feelings, and sought to awaken a better spirit in the woman he loved; but Charles only felt that he had been deceived, and he scorned the idea of teaching her that which ought to be the habitual rule of her conduct.

His mood was but little changed when, on the following night, he accompanied Julia to the party for which the new dress had been prepared. Never had she looked more beautiful—never had her superb figure been more finely displayed, never had her attire been more tasteful and elegant. But Lilbourne looked on the rich garb only to remember the solitary watcher; and the single taper which had burnt through that long night, in order to complete these trappings of vanity; he gazed on the fair face only to recall the attenuated features of the less fortunate woman who was at once the priestess and the victim at the shrine of Fashion.

That evening and that dress completed his disenchantment.

Some two years afterward, the cousins were again seated in the apartment where we first found them. The same rich decorations were around them; the piano was open, as if the lady had just turned from it; but the harp stood silent in its nook, and something seemed to tell of change in the hearts and minds of both. There was a mournfulness in Julia's eye, as she glanced round the room, and the changeful color on her cheek told of some suppressed emotion; but her brow was calm, and her beautiful lip displayed a placid smile, as if she had worn the mask of fashion so long that her features had become molded into its false expression. Charles Lilbourne was grave and thoughtful as usual, but there was a fire in his eye, and and a nervous movement of his heavy brows, as if some hidden feeling was at work within him.

"To-morrow, Julia, to-morrow," said Lilbourne, "you will be another creature—to-morrow you will assume the duties and responsibilities of a wife—you will take upon yourself the keeping of another's happiness. Are you not startled when you reflect upon the magnitude of your life-long task?"

"It is too late to reflect now," replied Julia, while a laugh of forced gayety echoed strangely from her lips. "I dare say I shall be very happy; I have outlived the age of romance, and, as I expect little sympathy, I shall meet with few disappointments. Mr. Dale is rich, complaisant, and kind; he loves to spend his vast fortune, and he will be as proud of his wife as of his blood-horses."

"For heaven's sake, Julia, how can you talk in so frivolous a strain?"

"I tell you, Charles, I have survived my own affection. The time has been when I could have given up wealth and fashion, and all the homage of society, for the love of one true heart—but the hour is gone by. I respect Mr. Dale's virtues, I am willing to tolerate his eccentricities and defects, and I have a most decided preference for his large estate. I expect nothing beyond what his fortune and good temper insure to me, and I have very philosophically adopted my ideas of happiness to my capacity for obtaining it. Now, say no more on the subject, Charles; you know not, you cannot know, how painful are the feelings you awaken. I have chosen my path, and mean to pursue it fearlessly."

"You are a strange creature; I wish I could understand you."

"You might once have fathomed the depths of my nature, Charles, but you scorned to do so. The weeds thrown up to the surface deterred you from seeking the pearls that might have been found beneath; and now they will never be brought to light. Leave me to be happy in my own way, and heaven grant that you may find greater happiness in yours."

"Julia, do you know that I also am engaged to be married?"

"To whom?" was the earnest, almost passionate question; for no woman ever listens coldly to such tidings respecting one whom she has loved.

"Do you remember the dress you wore at Mrs. Lawton's party?"

"Perfectly well; more especially, too, that it enabled me to attract the admiration of the somewhat fastidious Mr. Dale."

"Indeed! Well, that confirms my belief in the doctrine of compensations, for as that dress won you a husband, it certainly lost you a lover. When I heard you coldly condemn your sister-woman to unbroken labor and privation, in order that you might obtain the trappings of vanity, I felt that you were not all my fancy had painted—not all that I desired in woman. I watched from my window the progress of that solitary task; I saw the gray dawn of morning break upon the sleepless eyes of that pale girl, who toiled for a blind and helpless mother; and when I saw you robed as the idol of fashion, my thoughts went back to her who was the victim as well as the priestess of your vanity, and the spell of your beauty became powerless. I sought out the aid of a friend, an aged and benevolent lady, who might be my agent in rescuing your dependent from the thraldom of necessity. For the girl's sake, no less than for my own, I avoided all personal interference; and when I found that her father's bankruptcy and sudden death had thus reduced the family to poverty, I feigned to have discovered that I had been long indebted to the deceased parent; I immediately transferred to them the sum of one thousand pounds, and fancied that I had managed most adroitly to secure them, at least, from want. But what was my surprise, when I learnt that the noble girl, immediately upon receiving the money, had handed it over to her father's creditors, believing it to be their just due. This awakened a new and more elevated interest in my heart; and, in company with my old lady-friend, I visited her humble abode. I shall never forget the picture of that small room, so poor and yet so cleanly; the bed where lay the sightless mother, and the little table covered with the rich silks, which were to minister to the wants of the poor by pampering the pride of the rich. I saw the pale workwoman—I watched the hectic flush on her thin cheek! Will you forgive me, Julia, if I add that, as I compared the patient sufferer with the brilliant belle, I accused you of the selfishness and cruelty which had reduced her to the brink of the grave? You were only one of the many who had thus tasked her strength, but you should have known better."

"I see it all, Charles; but you should have remembered that we sometimes sin through ignorance rather than willfulness. Go on."

"I found refinement, good sense, delicacy of perception, and high-mindedness beneath the garb of poverty. By the aid of the old lady, Clara Wilmot was placed in a situation which secured her from such hard tasks; and, as the governess of my friend's grandchildren, she assumed a position better suited to her talents and virtues. I assure you, cousin, she understands the 'fitness of things' no less in intellectual than in personal graces."

"And so you are going to marry her. Who could have supposed that, after all your fastidious notions about women, you would find perfection in the character of a poor workgirl?"

"I have not found perfection, Julia; but I have learned to be satisfied with less. Clara has none of the brilliant beauty which once captivated my fancy; but her soft, sweet eyes are full of womanly tenderness, and her brow wears the serenity of high thoughts. She understands the waywardness of my susceptible nature; she knows how to modulate the harmony, as well as to soften down the discords which such a peculiar temperament as mine awakens. She does not in the least resemble my beau-ideal of a wife; but she is something better, for she is a tender, truthful, devoted woman."

"You have my best wishes for your happiness," said Julia, while a gush of irrepressible tears burst from her eyes. "Since to you good has come out of evil; and my faults have led to your happiness, think of me, Charles, with kindness—as one who carries beneath the trappings of wealth a lonely but not an unsympathizing heart."

"What can she mean?" thought Charles, as he left the room; "can it be that she once loved me?"

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Julia, as in bitterness of spirit she entered her own chamber, where the morrow's array of bridal splendor met her view; "how little do we know of the undercurrent of life, which, while we seem gayly floating in one direction, slowly bears onward to an opposite course! Who could have believed that a careless word, an act of mere thoughtlessness, could have deprived me of life-long happiness?"

LOST IN THE WOODS.

About ninety years ago the events of this story commenced. It was in Vermont, within the limits of the township of Rockingham or Springfield, it is impossible to say which, that the log cabin, which was the home of the heroine, stood surrounded by a forest.

"I have finished my spinning, Robert, and I shall carry the yarn home. I think I shall spend the day with Mrs. Green, and I wish you would come and meet me and bring the baby home," said the young wife, taking the linen in her apron and the baby in her arms.

"Very well," replied the husband, giving his crowing child a kiss, as he started off, with his hoe on his shoulder, to the wheat field. His land had been burned over and sown with wheat; but the huge stumps of the old trees and the thick underground roots prevented the use of the plow.

All day he worked busily in the fresh soil, eating his lunch at noon from the little basket, until the lengthened shadows of the forest around his clearing betokened sunset. Then he started off to meet his wife. A mile or two in the forest his neighbor Green had made his clearing. He went on without meeting his wife and baby, until he got to his neighbor's door.

"Why," said Mrs. Green, in answer to his inquiries, "did'nt you meet her? She hasn't been gone long—only a few minutes."

"Can she possibly have missed the marked trees?" asked Robert Harris, aghast.

The two men went together through the forest, which every moment grew darker and drearier. They called Mrs. Harris's name aloud at intervals, but there came no answer. They kept saying to each other, "We may find her at home;" but they were heavy at heart.

The log house was reached; but the mother and babe were not there. The cow lowed to be milked, and the pigs who ran in the woods all day and came home at night, clamored for their usual feeding; but the men took no notice of them. Back again through the woods, with a lantern, calling and hallooing. Then they went to the next clearing and the next.

"A woman lost!"

What telegram in the exciting days of battle ever fell more thrillingly on human ears than those words, going from mouth to mouth among the homesteads of the new country? With iron muscles and determined wills the warm-hearted settlers set out.

"We will scour the woods; we will find her, never fear!" According to a custom they had at such times, they blew horns, made fires, and shouted till they were hoarse. No tidings of the lost ones on that night. All the next day they searched, and day after day as long as possible. Fires were left smouldering among the trees; men who knew the woods kept resolutely to the search; but the budding April had its own secrets.

When Mrs. Harris started, with her babe in her arms, from Mrs. Green's, expecting momentarily to meet her husband, she went on carelessly, her attention being directed in part to the child, when suddenly looking up, she discovered no white scar of an ax on any tree in sight. But she thought she had only stepped out of the track and might in a moment regain it. A vain fancy. She went on, but nothing familiar met her eyes.

The night came on. The song birds went to rest, and the owls commenced their doleful hooting. She was alone with her infant in a great sea of forest, where never woodman's ax had echoed. She was lost. She sat down faint and tired, and, womanlike, began to cry. Hark! That was a human shout! She arose and turned her course breathlessly towards it. And now, she thought, she heard it again, farther off. Many hours of the night were spent in running with hysterical sobs and palpitating heart towards the voices of her friends, so near that she could hear them, but so far away that no effort of her frenzied strength could enable her to reach their protecting presence.

Towards morning she slept, leaning against a tree, with the baby on her bosom. She started nervously in her dreams, and at first bird-song awoke to full consciousness. She would not willingly give up and die. Her friends would find them. She saw near her some of last year's berries, and tough leaves of wintergreen, and a few acorns. A poor breakfast, but she ate whatever she could find, for the sake of her child more than her own.

This day also she ran wildly through the tangle of dead brakes and briars, growing from the decay of centuries over the gullies and jagged rocks, past rude branches that caught and rent her dress till she came to the dying embers of a fire. Here she lingered long. Her friends had been here; perhaps Robert had kindled this fire with his own hands, and for her. Hark again! the search has commenced this morning. Echoing through the woods comes the prolonged shriek of the horn. She called with all the desperation of one drowning—she rushes forward—but the ground is rough, and, alas! how heavy the baby grows. She is giddy from the loss of sleep and want of food.

The baby moans and will not be comforted. In this way she spends the day and another dreadful night. She finds another fire; she stays by it and keeps it burning through the night, for she is afraid of wolves. Another morning, and she is almost hopeless. Oh, will not heaven pity her? The little one grows weaker; he cannot now hold up his head.

Another terrible night! baby moans piteously; he falls into convulsions; the next day he dies. All day she carries the lifeless body in her arms, and all night beneath the unpitying stars she holds it to her bosom.

She carried the little burden day after day, till the purple hue of decay was settling rapidly over it; and she felt, with a pang at her heart, that she must bury it. Then she looked about for a spot where she might dig the tiny grave so deep that the wild cat and wolf would not scent it out. Weak as she was, this was no easy task; but in her wandering she came upon a giant tree torn up by a hurricane. In the soft earth where the roots had lain, she scooped out the baby's resting place; and, making it soft with moss, she covered the cold little form for ever from her sight. Then she sat down by the grave in a stupor of grief. Hour after hour passed. How to commence the dreadful pilgrimage? Then she noted everything about the spot. There was a rock, there stood an immense hemlock. Yes, she would know the place. She could find it easily with Robert.

Then began again the struggles through the wilderness. Day after day, week after week, she passed on. Her shoes were torn to fragments, and fell from her feet. Her garments were torn to tatters. But the days grew warmer, and the fever that was burning in her veins made the soft showers that fell upon her welcome. First she ate the buds of trees and the bark of the birch. Presently she began to find the young checkerberry leaves; and now and then she found a partridge's nest, and greedily sucked the eggs. After a time there were red raspberries and black thimbleberries in the woods; and then she knew it was July.

The trees had now put on afresh their beautiful garments. she saw nothing but trees in intermediate succession. It seemed years—yes, ages ago that she swept the hearth with a birch broom, and sung the baby to sleep in Robert's cabin. Her mind grew bewildered; still she went on, on, on. When she came to a large stream, she went up towards its source until she could wade across it. So she said; and she affirmed that she never crossed a stream wider than a brook. She paid no attention to sun or moon as a guide, or indication of the points of the compass; but she must have taken a northwesterly direction, there was Black River, Mill River, Waterqueechy, and White Wait's Well flowing into the Connecticut River from the Vermont side; but she constantly asserted that she saw none of them.

Through July and August there were berries of various kinds; and by these, she sustained what little life was left. And now the maple began to take on its gorgeous crimson, and the silver birches to wear their pale gold of September; the birds were leaving the forest. Occasionally she had glimpses of a black bear, human voices had ceased to call her name.

Was she alone on the earth, and was the earth one vast wilderness without outlet, without a clearing or a settlement? Tramping, tramping, with her feet bleeding and cracked at first; and afterwards completely hardened; nearly naked; knowing nothing of time or place, she was fast becoming idiotic. When she was hungry, she sought for food, but the great idea lingered in her mind was that of pressing on. Since the luxuriance of summer had filled the forest with ferns and new growth of briar and underbrush, there was more trouble in passing through. But she had become quite accustomed to the rough work; and the frenzy at last became a steady, constant habit, almost the labor of life to her.

One day in October, the inhabitants of the village of Charleston, in New Hampshire, were startled into the wildest excitement by seeing a nearly naked emaciated woman, with her hair streaming upon her shoulders, walked with bewildered gaze along their streets. She told them she was lost.

"Robert Harris's wife, who disappeared from the opposite side of the river in April!" exclaimed the villagers. "How had she crossed the Connecticut? Where had she been all the time?"

But she told them she had never crossed the Connecticut, and that she had been lost in the woods all this time. There was no lack of hospitality: the wanderer was immediately clad, fed, and cared for to the utmost. Volunteers went at once and brought her husband; for the story of his bereavement was well known on the Charleston side of the river.

We can only imagine the meeting, and the tears that were shed at the thought of the little forsaken grave by the up-rooted tree. The joy-bells were rung in the village; and the poor woman, a living skeleton, was nursed and petted—every woman vieing with her neighbor to lavish every good thing upon her—until her weakened mind recovered its tone again.

As she constantly asserted that she had never crossed the river, it is supposed she wandered into Canada, and going round the Connecticut at its source, or crossing where it was a brooklet, passed down on the New Hampshire side until she reached a district just opposite that from which she started.

When she began to grow strong again, her mind recurred constantly to the grave in the wilderness. She described to her husband its surroundings; and he went and searched for it, but without success. As soon as she was able, she went out with her husband and other friends, to search; but the baby's grave was never found.

It was thought very strange that she, in all her wanderings, never met a roving Indian; but so it was. The Indian tribes had perhaps nearly disappeared from New England since the French and Indian war; but however that may be, the first human being she saw, after the burial of her infant, was in Charleston.

This singular legend has descended to the writer from a descendant of hers who was the third child born in the town of Rockingham, Vermont, and the story is an undoubted fact.

CHAPTER II.

WOMEN AND POLITICS.

As far as our individual opinion respecting the actual participation of women in scenes of political strife is concerned, we believe that practically they can never be brought to delight in it. In the essential quality of their mental and physical organization, women are non-combatants and non-assertive; while man is combative and glories in the excitement of political contest. Women prefer to attain their ends another way. They have tools of a sharper edge but not of so massive a form. The greatest opponents to the exercise of political duties by women will always be women themselves. Individual women would, doubtless, glory in it, but you could not force it upon the mass of the sex. They would sooner be wronged and keep so than fight in the political arena for their rights; and on this very account they have been politically wronged for ages and have kept so; while they have convulsed courts—and by connection kingdoms—over a silk dress or a love-token. The only reason why women have not been politicians in the past is because they have not wanted to be such; for there is no instinct of their true nature but they have made men feel and succumb to long ago. Had women possessed half as much of an instinct for politics as they have for love, and been deprived of it for six thousand years, they would have shattered the constitution of society and introduced chaos a thousand times over.

So far as equality of the sexes is concerned, we hold that surroundings being equal, the womanly brain is in no way inferior to man's in the extent and variety of its capabilities; but its activities and powers run altogether in another direction. There can, therefore, be no fear entertained of the mass of women, enfranchised or not, stooping to mingle in political affray. They have too keen a sense of their greater influence in another direction to throw themselves away on so unprofitable a business; but this in no way touches the question of their right to be recognized as of equal political value before the law. As far as our own community is concerned, in ecclesiastical matters—and with us they include politics and everything else—the perfect equality of women to vote for officers is practically allowed. Should God in his providence, for great and special ends, extend to women similar rights all over the Union, we are satisfied that the true instincts of the sex will be sufficient guarantee that women will never unduly leave their own sphere for that of man's. Water cannot run up hill, and women can no more resist their native propensity for more congenial pursuits than the Earth can resist the gravitating influence of old Father Sol and take a run off to Jupiter. The question stands pretty much like this: men, and women too, want a recognition of their right to do a thing whether they intend ever to do that thing or not. Men do not want to be, and never will make, good nurses; but they would indignantly oppose any law forbidding them to practice in that or any other delicate calling if they wanted to do so. Forbid to any human being any particular course and it immediately wants to peruse it. This is natural to the human spirit, and an outgrowth of the unsubduable deity embosomed in every soul. As to the true sphere of women, speaking in the abstract, we are all agreed that it is spirituality, beauty, refinement, tenderness, love and hope. Once elevated to their true position—that of priestesses of heaven-born influences and graces, and they will never—speaking of the mass—stoop to the labored efforts of lumbering legislation. They will see a diviner and a speedier road to their object. They will discover that they need not our clumsy weapons. They can do more with a fencing foil than a broadsword any day. But this question is not one of seemliness or adaptation, it is one of the right of human beings of either sex to choose their own guides, spiritual and temporal, and determine their own conditions.

Music.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

Abstractly speaking we are in favor of congregational singing. How delightful it would be to hear at the General Conferences of the Saints ten thousand voices of the congregation join in the praises of God in some soul-stirring hymn of Zion. Of course for such a jubilee of congregational praise it would presuppose some musical education among the entire people, but especially a general familiarity with our own hymns and anthems selected for Tabernacle service. But it is not at all too much to hope that the time will come when musical culture will form a branch of school education among our children, and then congregational singing will be quite practicable. There is, moreover, another phase of this subject of congregational singing led by a trained choir, rather than exclusive choir singing amid the silence and general apathy of the assembly. Let Zion have her own musical service, her own set hymns, anthems and psalms, and all the people would soon become familiar with the same and a thousand voices every Sabbath could join in the praises and glory of God, led by the regular choir. It would then require but little or no scientific musical training to reach this simple form of congregational singing, and it would only be on the occasion of the choir performing some grander chorus or anthem that the general assembly would be required to be silent, and then their silence would be simply from the reason that they could not join in the performance; and hence the choir would always have the honor of leading and the mission of educating the congregation in their musical services. It would, moreover, be found that even in these extra performances the assembly, after a few repetitions, would take a part, and their hearts would sing when their voices were silent. This congregational singing is no new-fangled problem. Formerly the Saints were more given to the use of their own hymns, adapted to their own familiar tunes. Though they were neither expressly set to music by our own composers, nor sometimes very happily allied to the old clothing of popular songs, yet sung by the Saints with full hearts and vigorous voices, they were very inspiring. For our part, to this day we would sooner hear "The spirit of God like a fire is burning" sung well by the congregation than an anthem badly sung by a choir. More upon this subject hereafter.

Orchestral Music.—In this branch of the art Utah has reached a higher excellence than in the vocal department. The orchestra of our theatre, for instance, has at times compared with the very best metropolitan orchestras, though at present its members are not so numerous as they once were. They are, however, very efficient, and often "discourse most eloquent music." Indeed, the band performance is sometimes the best of the evening's entertainment. Professor George Careless is the leader. He has held that position for four years, with credit to himself and satisfaction to the public.

CAPTAIN CROXALL'S MARTIAL BAND.—The celebration of that triumph of the age—the completion of the Pacific Railroad—in Salt Lake City, May 10th, gave an opportunity for Captain Croxall's famous martial band to display the instrumental ability of its members. The band delivered some of the very best of the speeches at the mass meeting, and its performances spoke a genuine exultation that found an echo in the hearts of the thousands present. Captain Mark Croxall himself is a gem of the first water, and his martial band is a crown in which he has a lustrous setting.

The Drama.

PROSPECTIVE.—We understand that Miss Annie Lockhart will run a long engagement here. This, we think, will be very pleasing to the public. It is a happy circumstance to have a lady so satisfactory in all her parts as Miss Lockhart. She wins upon the public mind. This is rare. Artistes generally live out in their engagements the interest which they at first create. But this is not the case with the lady in question; we shall have the opportunity, therefore, of devoting a special page of review to her hereafter.

NELL GWYNNE.—These old English comedies and plays require the very best of rendering. In the hands of indifferent performers the cast is lost. Nell Gwynne is one of those plays in question. On Wednesday evening last this beautiful piece was presented by the management, and the leading members of the company played admirably. Some of the minor characters, however, were out of time. Fanny Morgan Phelps well sustained the generous-hearted Nell, but the gem of the evening was Francis Stewart, personated by Miss Lockhart. It was a very chaste exposition of a maiden of honor, in the licentious court of Charles II. of England. There is pathos and tenderness in this lady's performance.

ALWAYS EFFICIENT.—Mr. John S. Lindsay has treated us to some very fine playing of late. His Michael Feeney, in Arrah-Na-Pogue, was a master-piece of its kind. But brother John ever plays well. There is vim in his action and force in his characters. He is constant in his efficiency, always ready in his scenes, never lacking in his parts. This is admirable. We would advise our minor actors to pattern after him in this, and ever aim to keep up the credit of the house by efficiency.

A RISING MAN.—James M. Hardie is decidedly a rising actor. We expect to see him make a name in the world. There is in him metaphysical force and physical weight, combining a fine appearance. In heroic parts he can reach the "top of the tree." He must aim for professional perfection. That is a work of art. Nature has given him all the force. A chaste study of the sentimental and the intellectual will give the exquisite finish necessary to the artiste.

JOHN C. GRAHAM.—This gentleman is still a public favorite. His line is varied. He is at home in the higher walks of comedy, is unique in low comedy, and plays with grace and dignity such characters as Charles II., in Nell Gwynne.

THE LIFE OF THE STAGE.—Such is Mr. Margetts. He has held the public mind for a series of years, and no man to-day of our company can command so large a benefit as he. This is the people's critique, and a very satisfactory estimate, indeed. The stage is never dead when Mr. Margetts is in the scene.

REMEMBERED.—Messrs. Thorne, Crowther and McIntosh deserve notice, for they are useful. Mr. Thorne, in particular, is in remembrance. Mr. Crowther sometimes plays well. The old Jew in the Child Stealer, for instance, was very good.

THE LAST WEEK.—Fanny Morgan Phelps closed her engagement last week. On the whole it has been a success, and during her term a great variety of plays have been produced. We look forward with interest to Manager Caine's next card.

A WELCOME TO THE PACIFC RAILROAD.—Manager Caine did honor to the great event of the age by a grand entertainment Monday evening. At the close of the play of the Octoroon, the audience was treated to a miniature representation of the laying of the last rail, after which the train dashed across the stage and the tableaux was illuminated with fireworks and hailed with joyous shouts.

Review of Books, Etc.

VICTOR HUGO'S LAST NOVEL.—The writings of this great master are not novelettes: they are works of art. His chapters are creations of the poet's soul—his novel, Victor Hugo's book of illustrations of humanity. We read his work as we contemplate cathedral architecture. It is a fabric of grand conceptions harmonized; combinations of immensities are brought within the focus of a limited view. In that view we have manifested the mood materialistic of Hugo's genius, which has induced a comparison between him and Michael Angelo. He hews out his conceptions in colossal forms, and sculptures his thoughts in antique compositions. They bring us into the presence of solemn sublimities, as do the ruins of ages, or the caverns of the shores, which we imagine the sea gods built ten thousand years ago. Indeed, Hugo in this materialistic mood is thoroughly ancient, thoroughly Grecian. His plastic or Grecian genius is ever working with its might to interpret itself in forms, and they are antique and colossal. But he has also his spiritualistic mood. His book has a dispensation of subject, it is pregnant with a grand superstition of faith and mistrust. Hugo is as religious and reverent as the old cathedral builders, as cynical and daring as modern infidelity. He is an iconoclast to beat down kingcraft and priestcraft; yet he works with the grim sublimity of an ancient throwing down one temple to erect another. As for his sermons upon man, they are as sombre as those of any cathedral divine. Take the opening of the last novel of the great French patriot. Mark his sculptor style, and that superstition of faith and mistrust which doubts, yet finds a deity in the very nature of the wolf. The man and the wolf are the first to come upon the scene, and they come in loving companionship. With what cynical affection, yet with what supreme trust in Nature's good intents he introduces them together, transposing even their names. The man disdainfully honors himself with the name of bear, pathetically degrades the wolf with the name of man.

CHAPTER I.—URSUS.

Ursus and Homo were fast friends. Ursus was a man; Homo was a wolf. Their dispositions were congenial. It was the man who had christened the wolf. Probably he had also chosen the name; having found Ursus good for himself, he had found Homo good for the beast. The association of this man and this wolf was profitable at fairs, at parish festivals, at the corners of streets where passers-by gather together, and wherever the people give way to their need of listening to nonsense and buying orvietan. This wolf, docile, and submissive with a good grace, was acceptable to the crowd. It is a pleasant thing to note the effect of taming. We take supreme delight in seeing all varieties of domestication. It is for this reason that so many persons watch the progress of royal processions.

Ursus and Homo went from square to square, from the public places of Canterbury to the public places of Glasgow, from county to county, from town to town. One market exhausted, they passed on to another. Ursus lived in a crib upon wheels, which Homo, sufficiently civilized, drew by day and guarded by night. When the road was difficult, in going up-hill, when there were too many ruts and too much mud, the man buckled the strap to his neck, and tugged away fraternally, side by side with the wolf. In this fashion they had grown old together. They camped out, according to chance, on a bit of waste ground, at the intersection of crossing roads, at the approach to a hamlet, at the gates of market-towns, in the market-places, in the public malls, on the skirts of a park, on the space before a church. When the tilted cart stopped in some field where a fair was held, when the gossiping old women hurried up open-mouthed, when the cockneys drew round them in a circle, Ursus speechified and Homo approved. Homo, with a wooden bowl in his jaws, politely made a collection. They gained their livelihood. The wolf was lettered, and the man too. The wolf had been trained by the man, or had trained himself alone, to various pretty woltine ways that augmented their receipts. "Above all things," said his friend to him, "don't degenerate into man!"

Ursus preferred Homo, as a beast of burden, to an ass. To make an ass draw his crib would have been repulsive to him; he set too high a value upon the ass for that. Besides, he had remarked that the ass, a four-footed thinker, little understood of men, has sometimes an unquiet pricking up of the ears, when philosophers say foolish things. In life, between our thoughts and ourselves, an ass is a third party; this is annoying. As a friend, Ursus preferred Homo to a dog, believing that the wolf's approach to friendliness is from a greater distance.

This is why Homo sufficed to Ursus. Homo was for Ursus more than a companion; he was an analogue. Ursus tapped him on his lean flanks with the remark: "I have found my second volume."

He said furthermore: "When I am dead, whoever desires to know me, will only have to study Homo. I shall leave him after me as my exact copy."

A supreme cynicism is in the advice of Ursus to the wolf: "Above all things don't degenerate into man!" But how much there is also of supreme trust of the man in nature, when he thus elevates wolf-nature!

The second form of his novel is on the English Peerage, dramatically climaxed by the republican's aspiration for a higher nobility and a diviner object for man's idolatry

"A plebeian, who strikes a lord, has his wrist cut off.
"The lord is almost king.
"The king is almost God.
"The world is a lordship.
"The English address God as my lord."

We will, during its publication, give to our readers an occasional illustration from Victor Hugo's great last novel, entitled, "The Man Who Laughs."

THE HONEST WORKING MAN.

DEDICATED TO THE WORKING MEN OF UTAH.

They've sung of heroes brave and strong,
On flood and battle-field;
Of poets, too, a numerous throng,
Which history's pages yield,
Of kings and emperors, mighty lords,
Who o'er the world held sway,
And ruled the millions with their swords
In their great, little day.

But I will sing of him who stands
The first on God's own plan—
In every age, in many lands,
The honest working man.
Then let us treat him as we should,
And help him all we can;
The brightest gem in nature's crown
Is the honest working man.

We hail all workers, great and small,
As well as those who plan;
Be ready at the Master's call,
And be a working man;
For, though his hands be rough and brown,
His features worn and wan,
He's proof against a smile or frown,
The honest working man.

ELIZA R. SNOW.

"ZION'S POETESS."

As a fit illustration of the subject of woman and her sphere, we could not find one more acceptable than our beloved sister, Eliza R. Snow—Zion's Poetess. Her influence in the Church of the Saints, through the medium of her holy sentiments and elevated thoughts, has been like a pure stream from a heavenly fountain. Her life has been of the divine cast in all its phases, and her sublime devotion to her God, coupled with that saintly meekness which has ever characterized her, is, like her poetic genius, Hebraic in tone and quality. Mark this Hebraic constitution of mind in the poem of her opening life as a Saint:

My heart is fixed—I know in whom I trust.
'Twas not for wealth—'twas not to gather heaps
Of perishable things—'twas not to twine
Around my brow a transitory wreath,
A garland deck'd with gems of mortal praise,
That I forsook the home of childhood: that
I left the lap of ease—the halo rife
With friendship's richest, soft and mellow tones;
Affection's fond caress, and the cup
O'erflowing with the sweets of social life
With high refinement's golden pearls enrich'd.

* * * * * *

The proclamation sounded in my ear—
It reached my heart—I listened to the sound—
Counted the cost, and laid my earthly all
Upon the altar, and with purpose fixed
Unalterably, while the spirit of Elijah's God within my bosom reigned,
Embraced the Everlasting Covenant;
And am determined now to be a Saint
And numbered with the tried and faithful ones,
Whose race is measur'd with their life; whose prize
Is everlasting, and whose happiness
Is God's approval; and to whom 'tis more Than meat and drink to do His righteous will.

The entire poem from which these lines are copied is very illustrative of the life and character of Sister Eliza. In thus affectionately speaking of her by her Christian name, a suggestive note comes upon the page. Our heroine is the "Sister Eliza" of every Latter-day Saint in the world. This extensive kinship is wonderfully expressive, for it is very uncommon. There is a volume to be read in the mere note of it.

Eliza R. Snow has obtained this universal kinship with the Saints by being in her life, her inspirations and her subjects their own poetess. But she is in fact something more than a mere poetess. She is also of the prophetess and priestess type, and hence, as we have said, she is Hebraic in her genius. She is this in her essential nature. The Jewish genius blends that of poetry, prophecy and priestly calling. It is a unique type, differing somewhat from the genius of every other nation. There are only two of the Latter-day Church who pre-eminently possess this triple quality, and they are—Parley P. Pratt, who may be termed the Mormon Isaiah, and Eliza R. Snow. The type is very rare, for although among the great Gentile authors we have poetic natures of the most transcendent excellence, we have seldom met the pure Hebrew cast. We have Shakspeare, Byron, Shelley, Burns; but they are both Gentile and modern in their variety and tone. There is only one of the great English poets who stands boldly as an example of that peculiar poetic genius manifested in the inspired writings of the prophets and psalmists of ancient Israel, and that one is the "divine Milton." This Hebrew genius is pregnant with prophetic subjects, for from it comes its inspirations, and not from the exuberant richness of passionate natures. Its written manifestations abound with elevated spiritual thoughts, its style is that of vigorous simplicity, and its tone of supernatural sublimity. It is therefore eminently spiritualistic in its essence and religious in its very constitution. When found in man it will manifest itself in divine epics, as in "Paradise Lost," or in such writings as those of the apostle, Parley P. Pratt, whose very prose works are poems with the prophetic cast and quality. When found in woman, which is very rarely the case, we have an interblending of the poetess, prophetess and priestess.

The difference between this Hebrew genius and that of the Grecian or Roman is strikingly illustrated in Eliza R. Snow, a daughter of Zion through her faith and spiritual instincts, and the gifted Sarah E. Carmichael. The latter is much more luxuriant in imagination and elaborate in her treatment and harmonies of verse; the former more divine in subject and loftier in her inspiration. Miss Carmichael is by far the most passionate writer of the two. Indeed, she is nearly the equal of any "Gentile" poetess living, and her nature and gifts are of the Gentile quality. But Eliza Snow soars to a higher sphere than that of earth, and God, not Nature, is the source of her inspirations. She is well illustrated in her celebrated "INVOCATION to the Eternal Father and Mother"—God, commencing:

"O my Father, Thou that dwellest."

The most stirring poem of her life is that written upon the martyrdom of the prophet and patriarch Joseph, and Hyrum Smith. This terrible event disturbed for a moment the current of her gentle spirit, which burst forth into passionate verse.

Sister Eliza R. Snow in her life has been a constant influence for womanly civilization. No woman in the Church of Latter-day Saints is more universally beloved. Even her own sex envy her not.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY
Illustrated in its Great Characters.

CHAPTER II.

THE POPES TO CONSTANTINE.

Before referring to some of the world's great characters in detail, we shall give a brief epitome of the first centuries of the Christian era, both descriptive of their spiritual and their temporal phases. The former will give a view of the transition of the Church from its spiritual state to that of temporal dominion, which opened to it in the reign of Constantine the Great; and the latter a view of that other half of the world's dominion—the Roman Empire under its emperors, thus completing the links of history in the reader's mind.

From the low degree of meek followers of the Lamb, the successors of the Saints became the very lions of the earth: from fishermen-apostles they sprang into sovereign pontiffs. Religious aspirations were transformed into worldly ambitions, and the successors of sainted martyrs vied with each other to win their crowns in heaven as the exterminators of heretics. Though Jesus opened his dispensation with the suggestive annunciation: "My kingdom is not of this world!" a clause of his testimony which he immediately after sealed with his blood, yet those who followed as his vicegerents set themselves up above kings and emperors. Arrogance, not meekness, was their cardinal virtue; absolutism, not love, was the sceptre by which they ruled the earth. There is, in these facts, a severe commentary embodied which need not be written here. The temporal dominion of the Popes commenced with the reign of Constantine, was firmly established in that of the imperial Charlemagne, and was consummated by the fierce crusaders of Christendom. The Gospel of the sword prevailed over the Gospel of Peace, and the "dominion was given to the Saints" of the Catholic church. But before this was achieved there was a long warfare between the Popes and Emperors of Rome, in which the early Christians showed themselves worthy the title of Saints, and even their pontiffs that of holy martyrs in the mission of Jesus.

The second century opened with the pontificates of Anaclet, St. Evaristus, and Alexander, the fifth, sixth and seventh Popes of Rome. They sustained the Church during fierce persecutions from the Emperors and the birth of schisms among the early Fathers. Sixtus, Telesphorus, Hyginus and Pius succeeded, and Anicet, the twelfth pope, commenced his pontificate A. D. 167. At this period came to Rome the venerable St. Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, the disciple of John the Divine. Between the Pope and his reverend visitor there was a general agreement upon the doctrines and discipline of the Church, but they disagreed as to the apostolic time for the observance of the festival of Easter. The opinion of the venerable disciple of St. John was not allowed by the Church to be set aside by the Pope of Rome, but St. Polycarp, on his part in a true Christian spirit, affirmed that the discipline of the Church ought not to be arbitrary, and that the nations who received the Gospel ought to be permitted to serve God in accordance with such rites as they thought most pleasing to the Supreme Being. Doubtless in this view St. Polycarp enunciated the wise policy of the Apostles themselves, who, having to open a dispensation to all the Gentile nations as well as to those of the house of Israel who would receive it, sought to harmonize the whole with as much tolerance for diversity of national customs as the fundamental laws of their mission would permit.

Mosheim, in his history, says: "The churches in those early times were entirely independent; none of them subject to any foreign jurisdiction, but each one governed by its own rulers and its own laws. For though the churches founded by the apostles had this particular deference shown them, that they were consulted in difficult and doubtful cases, yet they had no juridical authority, no sort of supremacy over the others, nor the least right to enact laws for them. Nothing, on the contrary, is more evident than the perfect equality that reigned among the primitive churches; nor does there even appear in the first century the smallest trace of that association of provincial churches from which councils and metropolitans derive their origin. It was only in the second century that the custom of holding councils commenced in Greece, from whence it soon spread through the provinces."

But it was not until the close of the second century and the beginning of the third that the Popedom may properly be said to have had any existence. It dates from the pontificate of Saint Victor (A. D. 194) and Zephyrinus, (A. D. 203) the fifteenth and sixteenth Popes. Up to the period of the discussion concerning the festival of Easter between Anicet and St. Polycarp, (A. D. 167) nothing had disturbed the peace and equality of the Christian churches; but from that time there was a struggle on the part of the popes for the universal supremacy of the Bishopric of Rome. St. Victor, who was an African by birth, after his elevation boldly claimed this supremacy, and he sent to the churches of Asia his manifestoes, in which he threatened them with excommunication if they did not conform to his judgment. But this usurpation of supremacy (for it was then considered usurpation,) met with resolute opposition from the bishops generally, and even those who differed from the views of their brethren in Asia refused to sanction the judgment and action of the Pope, who was by them regarded simply as the chief Bishop of Rome. They also, in sharp terms and forceful spirit, reprimanded him for his presumption. St. Ireneus, also, in the name of the Christians of Gaul, censured him for his usurpation; and thus overruled by the remonstrances and censures of the bishops of the West, St. Victor was forced to submit.

But the wedge of the supremacy of Rome once entered, each succeeding pontiff drove it farther in until Popedom became a mighty power beyond all parallel in the history of empires. Nor can we wisely say that this was contrary to the dispensations of Providence. In the general balancing of the world's affairs we must reverently acknowledge with the poet, "Whatever is, is right." God in his wisdom and intentions is best interpreted in history in the harmonized issues of ages. It was necessary and for the good of all humanity that a popedom should grow up to bring forth a Christendom to succeed the Roman empire in the dominion of the earth. A grander dispensation shall yet consummate the whole—one truly Catholic—embracing and blending all the civilizations from the beginning of time. Then shall Jesus reign in the hearts of the people of every nation, and his spiritual empire be over all the earth; but to bring this to pass a Popedom and a reformed Christendom was first ordained to rise to make Jesus (in name at least,) the Prince of the Earth, even as he is the Prince of the Heavens.

Zephyrinus, the sixteenth pope, succeeded in establishing the supremacy of Rome. During the persecutions against the Christians, by order of the emperor Severus, he fled from the charge of the Church to avoid martyrdom, but returning when the storm had subsided to regain favor among the orthodox, he persecuted the "heretics." In the assertion of the supremacy of the pontiffs of Rome he excommunicated the Montanists, among whom was the celebrated Tertullian, one of the most eminent fathers of the Church. The fall of this great man, it is said, deeply affected the faithful, who attributed his apostacy to the bad treatment he suffered and the envy of the ecclesiastics. This excommunication excited general indignation against the Pope, and the evil reputation which his clergy had acquired brought upon him universal blame.

The famous Origen was another great chief of these heretics. He was a pupil of the erudite Clement, the fourth pope, whose writings on Christianity are the most ancient, and ranked next to the canonical books. Origen, his pupil, was equally eminent as a commentator on the scriptures. He kept seven notaries, who wrote at his dictation, and twenty librarians made fair copies of his works, while female calligraphers transcribed them for the other churches. Thus we see how learned and worthy were these great chiefs of heresies—Tertullian, the most distinguished of the Latin Fathers and a powerful writer, and Origen, next to Clement the most distinguished of the Greek Fathers! Says De Cormenin, in his "History of the Popes:" "On this subject we will remark, that the fathers of the Church have almost all of them been heretics."

As for ourselves we would rank these men called heretics, both of ancient and modern times, among the world's greatest characters, to whom humanity owes more than to any other class of men. What, pray, were Jesus and his apostles but heretics in the judgment of the Chief Priests of Judah —those orthodox interpreters of an economy of ages past?

Callistus, the seventh pope, was permitted by the emperor Alexander Severus to build a temple. This was the first Christian church erected in Rome. The cemetery which still bears the name of Callistus, and in which this pope was buried, is said to have received the relics of sixty-four thousand martyrs and forty-six popes. In the days of Callistus, also of Urban, the eighteenth pope, the Christians numbered among them many persons of rank among whom was Mammea, the mother of the emperor Alexander Severus.

In the year 250 of our era there was a vacancy in the Holy See for several years, and in the interval, to the elevation of St. Cornelius, the twenty-second pope, the clergy took charge of the Church. So violent were the persecutions of this period that some of the most noted and worthy of the bishops had to fly and abandon their dioceses; and there is a story of St. Gregory Thaumatures and his Deacon being preserved by a miracle in his flight very similar to the one related by Moslem writers of Mohammed and Abu Becker, when they hid from their pursuers in a cave, at the period of their flight from Mecca to Medina.

During the pontificate of St. Cornelius, an anti-Pope arose and drew away many, increasing the troubles of the faithful. Persecution still raged and Cornelius was banished by the emperor Gallus, and a large number of Christians fled from the empire, many of whom perished, and those who escaped, peopled the solitude of the Thebais and became Eremites."

A few years later, at the martyrdom of Sextus the twenty-fifth pope there was another vacancy in the Holy See (A. D. 258). At this period, took place the famous martyrdom of St. Laurence, who was roasted on a gridiron. "Agent of the devil," said the martyr to the prefect of Rome, "cause them to turn my body on the other side." It was done; and then he added, "As I am now cooked, you can eat me!"

Nearly all the popes, up to the opening of the fourth century, are classed by the Catholic church as martyrs. Then came the elevation of Constantine the Great in the Apostolic reign of Melchiades, the thirty-third pope, when the church entered into its career of temporal power.

A SKETCH OF EDINBURGH.

BY JOHN NICHOLSON.

"The Englishwoman in America," Miss F. L. Bird, has graphically depicted the horrors that exist in the ancient city of "Auld Reekie." Her vividly drawn pictures of the filth, drunkeness, and degradation of a large proportion of the population are also too true. As the greater portion of the life of the writer of this sketch was passed in that city he had ample opportunity of judging of this fact.

It seems to be the case everywhere that where one extreme exists the other lives and flourishes by its side; no where is this more plainly visible than in Edinburgh; there can be seen the most princely splendor and magnificence almost within a stone's throw of the most squallid poverty; men and women in the full bloom of manly and womanly beauty, and unshapely, unsightly masses of humanity repulsive to look upon. One probable cause of these extremes existing to such an extent in that city may be on account of Edinburgh being non-producing; it has become a hackneyed saying that the only prodnets of the Scottish capital are Law, Physic, and Gospel, there Lawyers, Doctors and Clergymen are trained and turned out by the hundred.—That makes it rather bad for Edinburgh.

The slums of Edinburgh are situated in the central part of what is called the Old Town, the inhabitants of these places are liberally sprinkled with the Irish element. The principal streets in these parts are grand and imposing enough in their external appearance, many of the buildings being from nine to twelve stories high; but these streets have numerous tributaries consisting of narrow, dark, slimy "closes" and alleys, so narrow indeed that in places the occupants of houses on each side can reach out of the windows and shake each other by the hand. These closes are the theatres of many scenes of wild debauchery; brutality and crime; yet many honest, brave and upright souls are compelled, by force of circumstances, to take refuge in these dens. Only a few years ago one of the huge tenements on High street, under the roof of which one hundred people lived was the scene of a dreadful tragedy. It happened in winter, it was a lovely night, the moon shone full and clear. It was nearly midnight, and the city slumbered save when the silence was broken by the heavy thud, thud of the watchman's tread on the pavement or the shouting of some staggering inebriate. The semi-silence was suddenly dispelled by a rumbling noise, a roar, a crash, which were followed by the shrieks, yells and groans of the wounded, mangled and crushed men, women and children who were buried in the debris of a fallen building. Then followed an indescribable scene—the sounding of police alarms—the rushing thither of a large and motley crowd; then commenced the digging out of the poor unfortunates. Some of the bodies were so bruised, crushed and cut as to be unrecognizable by their friends. Some who had fallen with the building from the top story were taken out unhurt. After two nights and two days of digging and removing the rubbish, when it was not expected that any more would be got out alive, while the laborers were endeavoring to remove a ponderous beam, their attention was suddenly arrested by the sound of a feeble voice. They desisted a moment and listened with bated breath, when the following brave though feebly uttered sentence fell upon their eager ears: "Heave away, men; I'm no deid yet!" On removing the intervening rubbish it was discovered that the speaker was a little boy of twelve years of age, who was unhurt, but nearly dead for want of food and air. The huge beam had saved him from being crushed to pieces. On the front entrance of the new building, which was erected on the spot where the old one stood, can now be seen inscribed the sentence uttered by that brave boy, "Heave away, men; I'm no deid yet!"

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

CHAPTER II.

WANDERING LIFE OF THE ANCIENTS—ITS EFFECTS ON WOMEN.

In examining into the causes of early barbarism—we find that it followed as an inevitable result of the disintegration of society—induced by a sparse population and an almost boundless and illimitable surface of unoccupied land—squatter sovreignty was the law and possession the right to all the land before them—then any man, family, or tribe could take their choice and go their way rejoicing. The lower orders of the animal creation multiplying infinitely faster than the Genus Homo. Game was most abundant, and life by the chase offered great inducements to the lazy and restless as a means of support, at the same time gratifying their love of ease and adventure.

The careful student will at once observe that the same great difference of character that exists to-day between the wandering and the settled; the savage Indian and the cultivated American; the wild Tartar of Asia and the intelligent European—between the tent or the wigwam of the savage and the palatial structures of America and Europe, has been equally marked in all the ages of antiquity between the followers of the chase and the cultivators of the soil.

In the investigation of our enquiry, we will; in its place, endeavor to correctly define the extent and character of the civilization of antiquity; but at present it is chiefly with the wandering or Nomade tribes we have to deal. The Nomade is never a civilizer. It is true we have frequent examples in history of the transition of the wandering tribes to the condition of the cultivators of the soil, transmitting to their posterity all the advantages favorable to civilization arising from a fixed and permanent mode of life—yet let it not be forgotten that man leading a wandering life is never a civilizer—The chase necessitates a migratory life, frequent migrations render any considerable accumulation of property impossible, therefore no laws are needed for its protection—that, like every thing else, is left to the strong hand. Such a life, by its uncertainties cultivates all that is reckless, daring and improvident in the nature of man. It necessitates the almost exclusive use of animal food, which induces animality in man's nature and checks progress. The migratory life of a Nomade renders a partial isolation from his kind necessary—hence opportunities for social intercourse are few, the polish that follows the action of man upon man is in a measure lost, the stronger sex being engaged in the chase or in predatory warfare, become utterly averse to labor; the burden of all the menial offices of life are heaped upon the weaker sex. Woman ceases to be valued except as a convenience; her social caste is lowered, and she finally becomes an article of barter and exchange. It takes but little reflection to realize that woman in a rude life of savagery is without any protection from the wild brutality of her husband. She is bought with his money or goods; or is the reward of his valor in his predatory excursions in search of plunder. In either case she is property, to do with as seemeth him good.

It was no doubt a great improvement on the former social polity of the Israelites when Moses fixed the value of a maid at fifty shekels of silver, and checked or limited the abuse of power by the husband, and obliged him if he got weary of her to give her a writing of divorcement and turn her adrift. Fifty shekels of silver was not a great sum, and placed a wife within reach of the poorest—Other lawgivers of antiquity sought to place a check upon the cupidity of parents by the enactment of similar laws; for instance, the Assyrians at their matrimonial fairs, put up the handsomest of their maidens to the highest bidder. When all were sold who would bring a price at all, the squint-eyed and bow-legged damsels were put upon the block and disposed of to any poor greedy wretch that would take one or more upon his hands with the least dowery, this was continued until all were sold or until the funds realized from the sale of the Assyrian beauties was exhausted.

It is strongly indicative of the estimate of woman even in liberal England, when its ancient legislators thought they did a great deal for woman, when they passed a law inflicting a severe penalty upon the man who thereafter should use a rod "thicker than his thumb," when he whipped his wife.

The social status enjoyed by woman in any age is a sure and infallible indication of the extent and character of the civilization attained to. Of this, more hereafter; but at present, permit me to observe that any condition or state of society that debases woman, degrades the race—for woman is the mother of the coming generation She moulds the plastic nature of her child to the image of herself; she leaves the impress of her nature upon her offspring; therefore to debase woman is to lower her progeny in the moral and social scale. Elevate and refine woman, and elevation and refinement will characterise her posterity.

THE EARTH AS A HISTORIAN.

The earliest account we have of the tribes that inhabited northern and central Europe do not extend back two thousand years; but late discoveries made in the lakes of Switzerland, and the bogs and sandhills of Denmark have taught us about as much in relation to the people who inhabited those regions in far more remote times, as we know of any of the nations encountered by Julius Cæsar in his career of conquest.

For example, there can be no doubt that the aborigines of Switzerland, in order to protect themselves against wild beasts, constructed their rude dwellings on piles driven into the shallow parts of the lake. It is evident from the implements found among the debris of these amphibious settlements that they were originally tenanted by a race who had no knowledge of metals. The results of antiquarian investigation go to show that this feeble people was conquered by a superior race, possessing weapons of bronze, and that the conquerors in their turn succumbed to a still more intelligent tribe, armed with weapons of iron, who afterwards fiercely opposed the progress of Cæsar, and are known in history as the Helvetii. Thus geology tells the history of our globe.

Our Home Humorists.

THE MOURNFUL OLD BACHELOR.

DEDICATED TO JINGO.

[NOTE.—In his communication to us enclosing the following attack upon him, Jingo says: "A certain, or uncertain young lady sent me the following, and it was some time ere I recovered the shock of its perusal sufficiently to respond. Imagine yourself (which we can't—Ed.) an antiquated bachelor, given over to the buffetings of all the disappointed victims of matrimonial infelicity for a thousand years. Imagine yourself, if possible, receiving, after many month's hopeful waiting, a daintily addressed, delicate looking epistle, redolent of roses and honeysuckles, and superscribed in characters unmistakably feminine. Imagine my pleasurable anticipation when breaking the seal, and then imagine—but it is impossible, even I myself cannot describe my feelings on reading the enclosed."

What a pitiful thing an old bachelor is,
With his cheerless house and his rueful phiz!
On a bitter cold night, when the fierce winds blow,
And when all the earth is covered with snow;
When his fire is out, and in shivering dread,
He slips 'neath the sheets of his lonely bed.
How he draws up his toes,
All encased in yarn hose,
'Neath the chilly bed-clothes,
That his nose and his toes,
Still encased in yarn hose,
May not chance to get froze.

Then he puffs, and he blows, and says that he knows
No mortal on earth ever suffered such woes:
And with ah's! and with oh's!
With his limbs to dispose,
So that neither his nose nor his toes may get froze.
To his slumber in silence he goes.
In the morn when the cock crows,
From beneath the bed-clothes
Pops the bachelor's nose!
And as you may suppose, when he hears the winds blow,
Sees the windows all froze,
Why, back 'neath the clothes pops the poor fellow's nose:
For full well he knows,
If from that bed he rose
To put on his clothes
That he'd surely be froze.

To future honors do not aspire,
But get a wife to light the fire.

A TRIP TO THE TERMINUS—THE TRACK, ETC.

BY JINGO.

SALT LAKE CITY, FEB. 26, 1869.

Learning from the papers (which never lie, and seldom err) that the Iron Horse was rapidly approaching us by way of the Weber canyon, penetrating the solid earth, rending the rocks, and causing the mountains to crumble before him.

I (being a descendant of Eve) naturally felt a little curiosity on the subject; and, after resolving myself into a committee of the whole, and maturely deliberating, decided to visit the scene of action. Now, when I decide upon anything, I am uneasy until it is accomplished; consequently I sought earnestly and immediately for the most rapid mode of conveyance—saw the advertisement of the "Tri-Weekly," and felt at once, to use a vulgar expression, that I had "struck ile." The "Tri-Weekly" was to start that morning. I grasped a tooth-brush and a paper collar—thrust them hastily into my valise and reached the station, out of breath, just in time to learn from the proprietor that, owing to a melancholy series of unforeseen events, such as had never before transpired and such as, in all human probability, might never occur again, the "Tri-Weekly" would defer its customary trip until the following day. This gave rise among the by-standers to trifling remarks and would-be witticisms about "Trying weakly" etc., upon which the conductor looked with deserved contempt. I restrained my impatience until the morrow, when I was upon the ground betimes, and beheld the stage approaching at such a rate that I felt to exclaim with one of old—"His manner is after the manner of the driving of Jehu, the son of Nimshi; he cometh furiously." The smoking steeds were eventually reined up and we (seven of us) saw the stage. If Shakespeare had ever seen a similar outfit called a stage, I could pardon him for that rather wild remark that "all the world's a stage." It was barely large enough to contain our seven bundles, while each man sat upon his plunder, with legs (encased in cowhide 14s.) dangling over the wheels. The two horses must have been blooded animals, as the conductor deemed it advisable to keep them low in flesh in order that they might be manageable.

"All aboard?" came in stentorian tones from the driver. One of us ventured feebly the customary affirmative, "You bet;" and the extraordinary march was commenced.

The weather had been unpropitious, (it always is when I travel), and the roads were somewhat moist, sloppy and sticky, but we pressed rapidly on. The fence posts and trees were passed in rapid succession. Van Natta's cooper institute —Pascoe's Pioneer Perpetual Plaster Place—the board requesting parties from Bear Lake to go to what-dye-call-'ems—the Half Way House (though why it is called the half-way house, or where it is half-way to, I never could ascertain), and sundry other establishments too numerous to mention.

The day was gloomy, and the roads what is termed—"heavy." Our progress became gradually slower. The spirits of the party seemed to flag, and we were rapidly relapsing into that state of mind which must have influenced the Cockney poet, when he wrote those affecting lines—

> "'Twas ever thus from childhood's hour,
> This chilling fate has on me fell:
> There always comes a soaking shower
> When I haint got no umberell."

But when I observed the manly form of our driver, and saw the determination written upon his lofty brow, somehow, I could not despair. I felt that we should yet emerge from our slough of despond, and listen with throbbing pulse and enraptured sense to the sound of the dinner bell at Farmington. I reflected that we were not the only ones called to suffer in this world: individuals and nations have endured and triumphed: why should not we.

Our whole country has recently been convulsed by a terrible civil war, but its banner is again unfurled which was never trailed in the dust, and which this day floats triumphantly over every foot of our common country from Maine to Texas, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Let the "Tri-Weekly" emulate the example of the nation beneath whose fostering care it first had birth. Let it continue to breast the storm, and surmount the dark billows of mud which threaten to engulf it until they shall fade and vanish like the baseless fabric of a dream! Let the banner nailed to the mast, be ever Nil Desperandum! Let—— Just at this point I was suddenly called to a realization of my position by a violent concussion accompanied instantaneously by a sense of total darkness. One of the passengers said dam— (the word dam— was used as an adjective, however, and not with any intention of being profane). On investigation, I discovered that one of our steeds had fallen, and that we had been precipitated headlong into the mud. I immediately rushed to the stage to extricate any of the ladies of the party who might be entangled in the trappings, but immediately recollected that, although this was not exclusively a mail stage, yet there were no females on board. I then turned my attention to our team. The horse is truly a noble animal! How many instances are recorded of their almost human sagacity! This animal which had fallen seemed endowed with an unusual degree of intelligence, for although almost submerged by mire, he refused to struggle or make any attempt to free himself until perfectly certain that all the passengers were entirely out of danger. Feeling to reciprocate his consideration for our safety, as evinced by this forbearance, we surrounded him and unitedly assisted him to his feet, putting our shoulders to the wheel, emerged once more on terra firma, and shortly reached Sharpsburg, where we paid our fare after experiencing some little difficulty in getting our change right. I had to ask several before I could get two 10s for a 5. Small change seems scarce at this point.

One of the party wishing to light a cigar, drew forth one of what's-his-name's celebrated matches and attempted to strike a light, but owing to some unaccountable circumstance it didn't ignite. A gentleman present, having one of Calder's patent fusees, started a little flame and we applied the match to this for a short time when it blazed up famously. Every one who uses these matches should have a patent fusee. This is a want which has long been felt in this Territory.

We then footed it—not from motives of economy, but in order to more minutely observe the road—to Mountain Green—the then terminus of the U. P. R. R., where we put up at the Weber House. I have stopped at first-class hotels in London, New York, St. Louis and Ogden Hole, where they were fitted up sumptuously, and where they dined every day in purple and fine linen; but for lavish expenditure of means, utter regardlessness of expense, the Weber bears off the palm. It is true while we were there, it was somewhat thronged by gentlemen from the Emerald Isle; but their cheerful conversation enlivened us enough to compensate amply for the inconvenience of sleeping four in a bed. For instance—"Are you the conductor, Pat?" "Sure, and I am." "Thin, conduct me to supper." "Oh! go along wid ye, you've got a cowld. I'd advise ye to take a couple of hot punches and go to bed." "Wouldn't a cowld punch in the nose do for the likes of him?" "Call me servint!" "How do you pay yer bill, Pat, in the advance?" "Sure, an I don't pay it in the retrate, don't bodther me." "As there seems a good many of yez about, I'll see if yer all prisent! Call the roll, Gineral." "Faith, an I'll do that same; —Nosey Jim?" "Im absint on duty." "Pete Neversweat?" "In Mixico." "Dhirty Mike?" "Sure, an isn't he mixin biskits at the Delmonico!" "Where's my gould repater?" "Let's take a spin round the block." "Sure, an I'll spin yer head off iv ye don't lave me; put that in yer pipe an smoke it," etc., etc.

Gentle reader, I returned on the "Tri-Weekly," but if my foresight had been as good as my hind-sight, I never should have traveled on it at all. The fact is it needs encouragement, but our government is like some individuals: it is not perfect yet, and there is considerable partiality manifested. Now, the U. P. R. R. and the "Tri-Weekly" are both great enterprises, both laboring for the same great purpose, and having to encounter the same disadvantages, yet the U. P. R. R. is fostered and encouraged by government, while the "Tri-Weekly" has, as it were, to "go it alone." "There is something rotten in Denmark." If the U. P. R. R. has means advanced and alternate sections of land granted along its route, why not make similar grants of means and land to the "Tri-Weekly?" Why not? Echo answers—it's nothing but right and should have been done long ago. Labor omnia vincit, which signifies encourage home manufacture.

N.B.—Speaking of Grants of land, I understand there is a General Grant for all lands at Washington. We shall probably all stand a chance.

P.S.—I forgot to mention that I saw the end of the track. It consists of two iron bars laid parallel on sticks.

CHAPTER III.

ANOTHER PHASE.

General Blakely was now in his grave and gone to give an account for his deeds, but Lord Reginald and his son were sleeping in peace as the righteous sleep. Years have passed away since our opening chapter, and the death of Lord Frederick at the mansion of Sir Richard Courtney. His honored remains are still reposing in the sepulchre of the Courtney race, where they are resting until the redemption of the De Lacy estates. Ever does the noble baronet remember his beloved, departed friend, and never does his purpose slacken touching the sacred compact of union between their families and the fulfilment of his vow to the dead companion of his boyhood and early manhood—his brother, as he always, with deep feeling, called him. The children have also shown in their characters and persons the development of time. The orphan Freddy is now a fine, spirited youth, and Courtney's nephew has marked himself in the minds of those who know him as one of those wonderful types of individuals in whom Nature, in the boy, blends the soul of the man. From such come those bright constellations of society who, in the first buddings of youth, and years before the age of ordinary manhood opens, are often known to the world as poets, composers of music and geniuses of various kinds, and from these also come our empire-founders who, like the great Napoleon, grasp the destinies of nations, and in whose very birth is concealed the germ of empire or the soul of an age.

Let the fathers and their surroundings take their place in the history of the past and become transmigrated in the children and their acts and events to come. With these our story has chiefly now to do.

But here must be noted that at the date of the present chapter, Sir Richard Courtney and his two daughters, Lady Templar, his sister, and her son Walter, with the orphan De Lacy, form now but one strong-knit, loving family circle, with Sir Richard and Lady Templar at their head. Without going again to the past for detail of story, suffice it to say that Sir Edmund Templar is also dead, and Courtney has the sole guardianship of his nephew, Sir Walter, and the vast estates of the Templar family.

Soon after the death of his father, Sir Herbert Blakely attempted to force the sale of the estates. The General had once before pressed the mortgage upon the executor. He had offered Sir Richard Courtney, in favor of young Lord Frederick one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, if his guardian would relinquish the estates. Herbert considered this Quixotic in his father, but the General would have made considerable sacrifice to cover what he knew was treachery to his generous patron, providing he obtained the entire ownership, for which he had so long plotted. Sir Richard Courtney would not compromise, and he and his wealthy brother-in-law, Sir Edmund Templar, still declared that they would redeem the mortgage, by involving their own estates, rather than allow the Blakelys to press the matter to such a consummation. The General, much enraged, gave up the point to bide the time when the De Lacy should not be so powerfully backed. The time, he hoped, would sooner or later come, and he calculated much upon its probability. He instructed his son, in his very last charge on his death-bed, not to precipitate the issue, but to seize the most favorable opportunity and, at all cost and without scruple, secure the ownership of the estates to the Blakelys.

Such an opportunity soon offered through the death of Sir Edmund Templar.

Sir Herbert Blakely was in Russia when the news reached him, and as he had been on a tour through India, where his father, the General, had spent so much of his life, and Sir Herbert owned much estate and invested funds, he did not receive intelligence of Sir Edmund's death until a year after its date. He had gone to the land of the Czars before his return to England for the same reason that he went to India—to draw in the resources of capital which his father's policy had spread out. He had inherited a partnership in a large banking company in Russia, and also in the firm in India, which his grandfather had founded. From these he had now retired. He had not the managing mind of his father and better understood capital in bulk than in its multiplying agencies of interest. But no sooner did he hear of the death of Sir Edmund than he hastened home more confident in this new bulk of wealth, which he despised to invest in his own land, because it seemed an easier commercial problem to him, and he was more determined than ever that the first investment should be in the De Lacy estates.

This time Sir Herbert considered the game sure. The opportunity for which his father and himself had waited had come. Sir Richard Courtney stood unsupported now by his wealthy brother-in-law, Sir Edmund Templar. But there had arisen one greater than the dead. It was his impetuous son, Sir Walter. But Blakely knew it not, nor did Courtney fully realize it. He had all reliance upon him in the future, but the issue of the present was coming and it had to be met. Oh, these boys are sometimes more potent than men, for they do in their impulse swhat men ought to do in their better judgment. David is a greater champion than the huge Goliath for he has more of trust and earnestness in his young heart.

When lawyer Wortley again made the proposal to Sir Richard, which had been once before made by General Blakely in person, the boy, Sir Walter Templar, and young Lord Frederick De Lacy were at school. Courtney wrote to the youths, informing them of the crisis, and also wrote to the Reverend Doctor Horn for a leave of absence for his wards.

Had Sir Walter Templar been moulded a military type of character, and been appointed by destiny to command armies, he would have won his battles with the rapidity of Napoleon. His volcanic nature would have forced victory by surprise, and the overwhelming velocity of his movements. No sooner was his design conceived than executed with all the intensity and forcefulness of his character. It was not in his nature to strike a light blow. He planted it with all his might, and his irresistible rapidity was bewildering to those who stood in his way. Cæsar's sublime egotism would have been appropriate in the mouth of Sir Walter Templar: "I came!—I saw!—I conquered!"

"Fred, we shall be at Courtney House in the morning," said young Sir Walter, as his friend ended reading the letter to him. He had decided that point before the first half-dozen sentences were read, in which he gathered at a grasp the whole matter.

"That is impossible," replied young Lord Frederick. "We cannot start until the morning."

"We start to-night, Fred. My dear fellow, you can ride seventy miles for such a stake. I start to-night, Fred."

"Yes, I can ride the distance well enough, but we must stay till the morning, Walter."

"Not another hour, Fred. So let us don our riding clothes. We can obtain a pair of splendid hunters at the 'Coach and Horses.'"

"But it is now six in the evening. We cannot reach Courtney House without a change of horses."

"Which we shall obtain at Bath at the Golden Lion. Matthew Strong was coachman of my father, and for Walter Templar he will not grudgingly leave his bed. Beside we shall reach Bath before twelve."

"Doctor Horn will surely not consent to let us start to-night."

"We shall not ask his consent."

"Will it be proper to leave our kind master so churlishly, Walter?"

"We would not, did I not know he would oppose our starting to-night, and as he will oppose us, I shall not ask his leave."

"Still I would sooner not offend the good man, Walter."

"So would I, Fred."

"Then let us stay till the morning."

"You make me angry, Fred, to talk so, when your family estates are under the hammer of the auctioneer."

"But your uncle, Sir Richard, will do all that can be done in the matter. What can we do, Walter, that he cannot accomplish."

"What can we do, Frederick De Lacy? Do you ask what can Sir Walter Templar do in wrestling for his brother?" impetuously and proudly demanded the youth. "You have seen me in a wrestle, Fred, dash my antagonist to the earth? Thus will I dash the supplanter of your family to the ground—aye, and stamp the life out of the villain, if he provokes me much more," said the boy fiercely.

"There was something almost ferocious in Walter Templar's love and instincts of protection towards Fred, who was to him as a younger orphan brother left to an elder brother possessing power and a large inheritance. Walter had grown to arrogate a sort of a superior right even to Fred to battle for the De Lacys, just as though he really had been the elder brother. Indeed, the boy had come to the conclusion that, if anything, he possessed a higher right than even his uncle to act where his friend was concerned. He had held an argument with his uncle upon this point, to prove that between him and Fred's father, Sir Richard stood first, but between Walter Templar, the nephew of the father's friend, and Fred, the son of the uncle's friend, Walter Templar stood first. 'Twas the claim and argument of friendship. To Sir Richard of course it was all powerful, and he approvingly gave up the point to his nephew.

"But what do you propose to do, Walter?" asked the young De Lacy, as the groom of the "Coach and Horses" saddled a pair of beautiful steeds, which, as usual with him in everything, he had "forced" from the landlord at a handsome price that could not be resisted.

"What do you propose, Walter? For the life of me I cannot imagine. What is it you can do?"

"I shall not tell you!"

"Now, that is unkind."

"No, Fred."

"Why wont you tell me?"

"Because you will oppose it."

"Will Sir Richard oppose it, Walter?"

"Most likely."

"Then you ought not to do it."

"There, you see, I was not unkind, but only right in not telling you; for you are opposing without knowing. In this I will have my own way. So, to horse, Fred, and for Courtney House."

Fred mounted, laughingly observing: "As if Walter Templar did not always have his own way."

CHAPTER IV.

CHECKMATED.

On the morning after the impetuous boy, Walter Templar, with young Lord Frederick, so abruptly left the Academy of the Reverend Dr. Horn, and started for Courtney house, Sir Richard was closeted with lawyer Wortly, the agent of Sir Herbert.

"My dear Sir Richard, you must acknowledge the terms are most generous. Well, well, I see you don't like the phrase: say in a business point of view, most liberal. One hundred and fifty thousand pounds as the bonus! Positively a gift. Now, my dear Sir Richard, I did not say it was more than an act of moral justice to the De Lacys."

"Lawyer Wortley, I beg you to remember that I understand the matter thoroughly," somewhat haughtily replied Sir Richard. "It is the necessity," he continued, "that we have to consider."

"Yes, yes; just so, Sir Richard. I thought you would see it in that light. Nothing could be clearer. You acknowledge the necessity, Sir Richard?"

"I observed, lawyer Wortley, that we had to consider the necessity of the transfer of the De Lacy estate, with full ownership, to Sir Herbert Blakely. I will not condescend to treat the matter in view of the means by which the Blakelys obtained their present advantage, and will grant that if the estates must be sold, I would not, from my antipathy to the purchaser, deprive young Lord Frederick of so handsome a sum as you offer.

"Quite a fortune, Sir Richard, is it not? Of course no other purchaser would give it. The estates are mortgaged to their full value," put in the lawyer, urging the issue, for upon his success was placed a handsome fee.

The servant brought in the morning letters which for a moment interrupted business between Sir Richard and the lawyer. Courtney had been trying to negotiate the transfer of the estates into the hands of his own bankers. One of the letters brought was the answer from the firm stating that the company would be most happy to oblige Sir Richard; they had no doubt of its being a good investment, etc.; but could not, just at that moment, invest in the matter so large a sum. Such was the pith of the answer. The Baronet had tried, he considered, his last resource to save the estates of his dead friend.

"Well, Wortley," he said sadly, "you have us at an advantage; and I cannot clearly see an alternative."

"You accept the handsome offer, Sir Richard?" the lawyer asked eagerly. "I am very glad we have come to so amicable an understanding."

"Sir Richard Courtney will reject the offer of Sir Herbert Blakely!" And the boy Walter Templar, who had heard the last remark of his uncle and the lawyer, strode proudly into the room.

"Good heavens! How very improper! Oh, yes, I see! Young Lord Frederick, of course! Yes, yes, quite excusable, my dear Sir Richard!" interjected the lawyer, bewildered by astonishment at the strong and haughty manner and speech of the boy.

For a moment Sir Richard frowned upon his nephew, but it gave place to a smile of approbation and welcome. He understood the character of Walter, and knew that his presuming to answer for him had not the most distant meaning of presumption or disrespect for himself, whom the impetuous boy venerated as a father. It was only a strong illustration of the strong forceful nature of Walter, who, like a volcano, threw out his lava-tide without even anger against that which it consumed. Its internal force gave the fury of the external expression. According to its nature, the majestic lion is gentle when it roars: and the voice of thunder is a soft voice of the mighty universe when it shakes the vaults of heaven.

Sir Richard had himself implanted in the mind of his nephew the strong love which the boy entertained for the orphan son of his dead friend; and the most pleasing view which the noble baronet took was in contemplating in the person of his nephew and young Lord Frederick, what might be termed a metempsychosis of the friendship which had a pre-embodiment in himself and the beloved friend of his youth. In the great souled friendship which had grown up between his nephew and the orphan Fred, Sir Richard Courtney lived in the past again; and, in the link of their substantiality, he could grasp the hand of his dead friend—his more than brother. This gave Courtney more satisfaction than anything in life, and though he doubtless would have been offended had his nephew presumed to answer for him in any other matter, in the De Lacy case no expression which friendship gave could be too strong, and as he looked upon Walter where Fred was concerned, as the representative of what he had been to Fred's father, Walter answering for him, in his mind, was not unbecoming. It was simply abrupt and unexpected.

"My dear Walter, how could you arrive so soon? You could not have received my letter until last evening. But welcome, my dear boy, most heartily welcomed" and Sir Richard shook the hand of his nephew with much satisfaction, evidently relieved by his presence. He had not the slightest idea, however, that the coming of Walter would make any material change; but, at such a time, the presence of his nephew was in harmony with the circumstances.

"You are surprised, uncle, to see us so soon. Fred accompanied me."

"Well, not exactly surprised, Walter, at anything from you. But when did you start?"

"The same hour we received your letter, We came horseback."

"Did not Dr. Horn object to your journey?"

"We did not ask him to object, replied the boy, naively, at which Sir Richard smiled, but observed:

"That was very wrong, Walter."

"We should have been too late, uncle."

"That is true, my boy, and although it does seem improper, I cannot scold you for the offence."

"At least it has saved you, uncle, from breaking off a partial engagement."

"I fear not, Walter; but where is Fred?"

"With my mother and cousins. I prevented him from coming with me to you, until we had concluded business with Sir Herbert's agent.

"Why did you this? Lord Frederick should be here."

"He would have opposed me, uncle; and I will have my own way in this matter," the boy said, strongly, and then continued smiling:

"It will be quite enough to have you on the opposition side of the house."

In the meantime, lawyer Wortley had been indulging in moral lessons of spoiled and wilful boys, and concluded that Courtney's nephew was the most objectionable of that type of any he had ever met.

"This is my nephew and ward, Sir Walter Templar; Mr. Wortley, Walter."

"Indeed," dryly observed the legal gentleman; "I thought it had been young Lord Frederick."

"You are surprised, I perceive, that my nephew should have answered for me; but Sir Walter is a privileged individual in the cause of his young friend. Excuse his impetuosity. He has an intolerable objection to the estates passing from Lord Frederick. I own I have the same."

"They shall not pass from him, uncle," said the boy, as one immovable, who held the power to prevent.

"My dear youth I think—yes, I really must say that I think—" Wortley tried to express his astonishment and reproof, but feared to offend Sir Richard.

"I do not see, Walter, how we can prevent the transfer of the estates."

"But I do, uncle. You wrote to me a month ago that you had received offers from the Cornwal Mining Company for the purchase of the Templar mines in Cornwall."

"Yes, Walter. You know your father refused their offer before, and of course I did the same."

"I have resolved to sell those mines, uncle, and invest the capital in clearing the DeLacy estate of this detested mortgage."

Lawyer Wortley looked extremely serious, and began to think that Sir Walter was something more than a spoiled, self-willed boy. He was discovering that he was a character to be feared in the case.

"No, no, Walter; I cannot allow your sacrifice, even to save the estate of my dear friend," observed the uncle. "Those mines are the most valuable part of your inheritance. They are a princely fortune in themselves. Your father exhausted the bulk of the income of his life to work them, and it is only now that they are beginning to yield the returns. I have no doubt that they will give you a revenue of a hundred thousand per year."

Lawyer Wortley breathed again. He hoped Sir Richard would not permit the sacrifice.

"So much the better, uncle. They will yield the more, now," urged the boy.

"It must not be, Walter."

"The sale will enable you to clear the estates, and have a large amount of capital on hand for some other investment. Then you know it will cut off but little of the Templar lands," persisted his nephew.

"But that will be the most valuable part, Walter. I know your father would not have allowed it, and I dare not, my dear boy."

"But my father left those mines to his son, and that son has determined to sell them," answered Walter, strongly.

"Were you of age, Walter, of course I could not object," said Sir Richard, half disposed to give up the point, yet daring not to make the sacrifice.

"Imagine, then, that I am of age, uncle."

"But you are not, my dear boy."

"Do you think I should act differently, Sir Richard?"

"No, Walter."

"I fear, uncle, I should reproach you when I am of age, if you allow the estates of Lord Frederick to pass into the hands of the spoiler."

"I should not deserve it, Walter," said Sir Richard, much pained, but not offended with his nephew for his strong effort to save his dead friend's estates.

"Forgive me, uncle. I know you would not deserve it; but you will let me have my own way in this," he continued pleading. "Just imagine the case thus, uncle: Sir Walter Templar, being twenty-one years of age, authorizes Sir Richard Courtney to sell his mines in Cornwall."

"Well, my dear Walter, you have prevailed, and I fear much because I am on the same side. If the affair cannot be compromised, I will accept the offer of the Cornwall Mining Company."

"Oh, a thousand thanks, dear uncle," and Walter Templar felt a nobler triumph than that of a conqueror of an empire—it was a triumph of friendship, richer from the sacrifice proposed.

Oh that the world could but remain young, with all youth's generous impulses and self-sacrifice for love, friendship, or a noble cause! Age is a disappointed alchemist, who transmutes much of the gold of human nature into baser metal. Well, it cannot be otherwise. The fall of man must be individualized and perpetuated in every age, to those who travel far towards the measured three score years and ten of man's life, for therein is the greater exaltation of the whole. "There is a soul of goodness in things evil." The metaphysical Shakspeare thus declared the subtle truth of the universe, which tells to us why evil is.

"You perceive, lawyer Wortley, how the case has shaped itself," observed the baronet to the agent of Sir Herbert.

"Yes, Sir Richard, very much surprised. I may say very much surprised. Very singular, indeed."

In the confusion of his ideas, the lawyer scarcely knew what he said, and had not clearly understood what Courtney had observed. He distinctly appreciated, however, that the issue which the boy Walter had shaped would cost him the loss of his best client, for Blakely would throw all the blame on his shoulders, as a lawyer, and he was trying to arrange his ideas for the next move, when Sir Richard addressed him:

"My nephew, my dear sir, wishes me to sell the Templar Mines in Cornwall, and invest his capital in clearing the DeLacy estate."

"But, my dear Sir Richard, you know my client has not instructed me to negotiate the matter."

"Let us deal plainly with each other, sir," continued the baronet. "I think your client has no desire to have the mortgage cleared off, for the revenue of the estates gives him too handsome a fortune."

"I believe I may admit your point, Sir Richard," conceded the lawyer.

"On the other hand, I will admit that it is not my wish to consent to the sacrifice proposed by my nephew."

"Very right, Sir Richard. Decidedly too great a sacrifice to be seriously entertained," put in the agent, eagerly.

"Yet I have determined to entertain the sacrifice seriously, rather than allow the estates of Sir Frederick to pass out of his hands. We must compromise the matter, by Sir Herbert returning to his old ground, as the mortgagee, or I will sell the Templar Mines, and act as my nephew has proposed. You have, sir, our decision; and it now remains for Sir Herbert to make his."

The lawyer was most anxious to close the matter upon these terms, for it left him the advantage of having lost nothing, and his client still retained his hold as the mortgagee.

Sir Herbert and his lawyer had not, hitherto, deemed even the existence of young Sir Walter Templar worthy a moment's consideration. They had only known that his father died a year before, thus giving them the opportunity of pressing upon Sir Richard, unsupported by his rich brother-in-law; but they dreamt not that in the nephew of Courtney, and heir and only son of Sir Edmund, there had arisen the greatest guard of the DeLacy house. Thus had the offered sacrifice of the boy saved his friend's estates. Isaac is not the only sacrifice accepted unconsumed. Often, by laying ourselves upon the altar, do we call down the word of promise! We save by offered sacrifice that which we should lose by withholding!

Lawyer Wortley was taking leave of Sir Richard, and expressing admiration—a lawyer's admiration of the boy who checkmated him—when the impulsive youth again surprised him with—

"Tell your master, lawyer Wortley—"

"My client, my good youth—dear me, what a very singular young man, Sir Richard."

"Tell your client," continued the boy, "that if he ever attempts to take advantage of my friend again, it shall be for the last time. Tell him to look upon Walter Templar as the elder brother of Lord Frederick. Tell him that a day of reckoning will come! When Sir Walter Templar is a man he will meet Sir Herbert Blakely, and exact recompense for the DeLacys!"

The boy delivered himself fiercely, in anticipation of that day of reckoning. Walter Templar's character was strength and an embodiment of volcanic force, and in battling against the supplanter of the DeLacys, his friendship will be ferocious to the enemy. We justify him not, but take him as he is.

CHAPTER V.

SIR HERBERT IN HIS DEN.

Sir Herbert Blakely was sitting in his "den," in the old castle of the DeLacys, awaiting the arrival of his lawyer, whom he expected that evening. Not that his "den" was by any means an uncomfortable one; for the apartment was commodious and luxuriously inviting, just suited for a gentleman's retreat. It was reached by a private avenue, which ingeniously concealed a secret entrance to the castle, the avenue being in fact a well contrived labyrinth of fir trees. A small oaken door, which opened with a strong secret spring, concealed a flight of stone stairs, leading to a lofty corridor, which communicated with a suite of luxurious apartments. This part of the castle had no public connection with the main building, but could be entered by spring panels in the family portrait gallery, known only to the master and as many as he chose to entrust the secret entrance to. This wing of the castle was built by a recluse of the DeLacy family, but since it came into the hands of Sir Herbert Blakely, it had been appropriated for purposes suited to the character of its owner. Villainy, dissipation, and the ruin of many a fair one, that secret suite of luxurious apartments was familiar with, during the reign of Sir Herbert Blakely over the DeLacy domains. The room in which Sir Herbert awaited the arrival of lawyer Wortley had been named by Snap, the valet, as Sir Herbert's "den."

"So, so!" exclaimed Blakely, after again reading his lawyer's letter, which he could not exactly make out, yet which on the whole appeared exceedingly satisfactory. "So, so," he repeated, as he drank the last glass of his second bottle, for he drank deeply, "Courtney acknowledges the necessity of closing with my offer. He owns the necessity at last, does he? By heaven! Wortley your letter brings to my revenge a cup of nectar. How the haughty Courtney must have been tortured by this necessity, my cunning little limb of the law, before he acknowledged it to you. By all that's wicked, I never could make out the friendship of those two men, whom I most hated. Either one of them would have beggared himself for the other. Ha! ha! but Courtney without Sir Edmund Templar could not save the DeLacy inheritance, even by beggaring himself. By my favorite Bacchus, my jolly deity of this sparkling nectar, my revenge on Courtney is almost as sweet as my triumph over him who disgraced me at Eaton. Curse them both!"

Sir Herbert broke his third bottle of wine, as he soliloquised. His curse upon the dead Lord Frederick strongly showed his low, vindictive spirit, and how deeply still rankled in his memory his defeat at school.

"By the fiend, Wortley is a laggard. He should have been here by this. I almost wish I had forced the sale of the estates, without the offer of the hundred and fifty thousand. My father —my politic sire, who was a match for most men, was a fool in the DeLacy affair—a Quixotic fool ever to offer the bonus. My cup is too sweetly mixed for the DeLacy lips, and not sweet enough for mine. A hundred and fifty thousand pounds! Why, the Norman beggar will possess a handsome fortune, and of my giving. I shall have transformed the beggar into a rich man. Am I not forgiving? Am I not kind to half rebuild the DeLacy ruins? By Satan! I half repent my offer. Where can that tardy villain of a lawyer be?"

He rang the bell furiously, which communicated with another of the secret apartments of the castle. In a moment his valet appeared.

"Snap, you villainous, ugly-visaged rascal, hasn't that infernal lawyer arrived? Your father gave you a phiz, Snap, which would have brought any honest man's son to the gallows before now. I never saw such a hang-gallows face as yours in my life, Snap. Has not that infernal Wortley arrived, I say. I swear, Snap, I think you have only escaped hanging by being more villainous looking than either the hangman or his gallows."

"You flatter me, Sir Herbert," meekly replied his valet, who seemed to receive his master's words rather as a compliment than as an offence.

"I compliment you. Well, that's rich. You are such a genuine rascal, Snap, that I believe I almost admire you. You would say your prayers before committing a murder, and return thanks after you had got through the job."

"You flatter me, Sir Herbert," again meekly came from the admirable Snap.

"Upon my soul, I believe I do. You have so much of Beelzebub in your composition that you take it as a compliment to be told so. I believe you would never forgive a master who did not appreciate your excellent qualities for villainy."

"I never should, Sir Herbert," the valet replied, much more emphatically than he was in the habit of speaking.

In fact, Snap was a study. His master's portraiture of his character, provoked by his impatience for the arrival of lawyer Wortley, was correct. Sir Herbert did not paint him from a metaphysical intuition of character, but from matter-of-fact and his practical knowledge of the man. Snap was a most genuine villain, and as villainous looking as his master had described him. He never could have been genuine in anything but villainy, and in that, to beg a strong touch, he was most conscientious.

His master often required his services. He will need him in the future and we shall meet him again.

Snap was retiring from the presence of his master with his peculiar, slow, soft step, which would suggest to one the fancy that he was just the very man to "put salt on the bird's tail" to catch it. Sir Herbert had often admired the insinuating mannerism and soft movements of his valet, who seemed so very tender lest he frightened the air through which he moved. He never startled his prey as he approached it, and in spite of his villainous face, the rogue had much fascinating power. But his soft, slow retreat was now out of time with his master's irritation.

"Snap, you unmannerly scoundrel!"

"Yes, Sir Herbert."

"Who dismissed you, sir?"

"I imagined your silence, after you addressed me, expressed your wish."

"Who gave you the right to imagine my wish, you presumptuous rogue?"

"You, Sir Herbert, both to anticipate your wish and execute it."

"Well, well, Snap; but you provoked me with that slow, soft way of yours, when I am on wires of impatience for the arrival of that villain of a lawyer."

"You have often commended that slow, soft manner, Sir Herbert."

"There you are again. Curse you and Wortley both, you weazen-faced rascals. You would have made capital twins. Ever as slow and slimy as snails, and always meeting obstacles."

"I generally surmount mine, Sir Herbert," said the rascal, with a quiet chuckle of self-satisfaction.

"That's true, Snap. But, like the lawyer, you go such an infernally round-about way."

"I have ever found it the only way when the path is crooked. Are you not too impatient with lawyer Wortley? He was to arrive at eight. By the clock there, Sir Herbert, you may perceive it lacks just a quarter to eight."

"Well, well; I acknowledge you are right, as usual, you cunning, observant rogue."

"Hark! there is the signal of the lawyer's arrival."

"I did not hear it."

"I am certain the bell rung in my room, Sir Herbert. There again, and this time impatiently. 'Tis a cold, wet night, and even Wortley is impatient."

"Let him in directly, Snap. Don't allow him to enter your room. I know Wortley; he would dry himself, wheedle you for a glass of brandy, and come to me in a quarter of an hour sleek and prepared, like a true lawyer, with his notes arranged. Bring him at once Snap, though he should be drenched to the skin like a rat."

THE GRECIAN BEND.

BY LYDIA A VERY.

Let's have the old bend, and not have the new;
Let's have the bend that our grandmother's knew;
Over the washboard and over the churn—
That is the bend that our daughters should learn.

Let's have the bend that our grandmothers knew;
Over the cradle, like good mothers, true;
Over the table, (the family 'round,)
Reading the Good Book, 'mid silence profound.

Let's have the bend that at church they did wear—
Bowing them lowly in meek, humble prayer;
Not sitting erect with the modern-miss air—
With the "love of a bonnet" just perched on one hair.

Leave the camel his hump—he wears it for use;
Leave the donkey his pannier—and cut yourselves loose
From fashions that lower, deform and degrade,
To hide some deformity most of them made.

Let your heads of false hair and hot yarn skeins be shown;
Let your garments be easy and light to be worn;
Don't shake in December and swelter in June,
And appear like unfortunates struck by the moon.

Let's spend the time in things higher than dress—
Time that was given us to aid and to bless;
Time that is fleeting and passes away;
Oh! let us work while we call it to-day.

Let's have the old bend instead of the new;
Let's have the old hearts, so faithful and true!
Away with all fashions that lower and degrade—
To hide some deformity most of them made!

"LOVE THY NEIGHBOR."

BY RICHARD HENRY STODDARD.

"'Love thy neighbor as thyself,'—
When at dawn I meet her,
As by the garden wall she stands,
And gives me flowers across the wall,
My heart goes out to kiss her hands—
—Are hands or flowers the sweeter?—
I'm ready at her feet to fall,
Or like a clown to labor!
Better than I love myself
Do I love my neighbor."

"'Love thy neighbor as thyself.'—
When at dawn I meet him,
As by the garden wall he stands,
And takes my flowers across the wall,
My soul's already in his hands—
It flew so fast to greet him!
And oh, I grow so proud and tall,
And my heart beats like a tabor!—
Better than I love myself
Do I love my neighbor."

VILLAGE ROSES AND THORNS.

The village of Auray-le-Clocher was situated on the side of a hill, basking in sunshine. At the back, up to the summit, and rolling down the other slope, and up and down again for miles and miles of hill and valley, spread vast woods, which kept from Auray all bitter winds; while below it, the ground ran down gently to a broad and fertile vale, watered by a little river; here showing itself in glittering silver, there marking its course by rows of poplars and willows, and by mills, with a few cottages clustered about them. At the entrance of the single, rough-paved village street, guiltless of trottoirs, and with a gutter in the middle, stood the church, and enclosed with it, the presbytère and its ample garden.

Up and down, in the shade, beside the gurgling brook, the cure paced, reading in his breviary one of the portions allotted for daily perusal. He was an old man, but tall, upright, hale, and hearty, and his firm equal step betokened none of the infirmities of age. A tranquil, temperate, simple life had maintained in prolonged vigor a naturally strong frame and constitution; and a frank, kindly, though not very intellectual countenance, fresh-colored, and but little lined, seemed indicative of that most enviable temperament that "takes the goods the gods provide" with cheerful thankfulness, and that troubles itself but little without serious and real cause for so doing.

His reading finished, the curé looked at his watch, and found dinner-time drew near; so he turned his steps, nowise reluctantly, towards the house, pausing here and there in his progress up the sanded alley to pick the blight off some pet rose-trees, (he was a great amateur of roses,) to disencumber it of fading blossoms, or to gather some particularly beautiful specimen, to stand in a wine-glass on the top of the organ, that he might enjoy its loveliness and perfume while he played.

Clattering about in sabots, on the pavement in front of the house, was little Claude, the nephew of Jeanne, the cure's servant.

"I say, little one," said the good man, "tell thy aunt to make haste with dinner. I'm as hungry as a wolf; run, or I shall eat thee!"

The child laughed, and clumped into the kitchen with his message, while M. Leroy proceeded up-stairs to his sitting-room, and, to expedite matters, drew the table into its place, and out of the corner cupboard extracted his bottle of vin ordinaire, wretched thin stuff, a tumbler, a coarse, plain linen tablecloth, and a napkin to match, rolled within its ivory ring, on which an inscription hospitably wished the user "Good appetite."

While occupied in these arrangements, a back door, leading to the other rooms, above and below, opened, and Jeanne made her appearance to lay the cloth.

"Par example, M. le Cure!" was her exclamation, when she saw how her master was employed; and taking the things from his hands, she began to perform her service. She was a good-looking woman of about four or five and twenty, but, like nearly all French peasants, appeared some years older. Her features were regular, with the exception of a somewhat coarse mouth; her dark eyes were fine, and surmounted by well-marked brows, and her complexion was of a rich warm brown, with a good deal of color. Altogether, a handsome specimen of her class, but with a taciturn gravity of countenance and demeanor somewhat unusual to it.

The cure sat down in his arm-chair, with a book, while Jeanne brushed round the table and about the room. It was evident his reading occupied little of his attention; for, whenever he could direct it unobserved to the servant he did so, and finally, when she left the room, he flung down the volume, murmuring, with an expression of profound concern,

"The poor girl! the unhappy!" and remaining absorbed in evidently painful reflections till the sound of her by no no means light step on the stairs aroused him.

But it must have been no common grief that could materially affect the curé's appetite, and when Jeanne had produced, in one course, the whole of the dinner, consisting of the usual soup and bouilli, a salad, a dish of potatoes cooked in butter, and a dish of the light-red pine-apple strawberries, of which whole fields are grown wherever the vicinity of a town of any size affords a market for them, M. Leroy fell-to with a hearty good will and made very short work of the repast. Then he sat down in the arm-chair, and quietly composed himself to his post-prandial nap, while the roses nodded outside the window at him, and a blackbird, from the grove below, sang thanks to him for the ruddy cherries to which he and his young family were made welcome.

Jeanne's and Claude's dinner followed that of the master, the meal concluded, the former filled a little basket with eggs, and gave it to the boy.

"Go, my child," she said, "with this to Madame Morel; say Monsieur le Curé sends them with many compliments. Then go on to the Croix-Blanche, and ask, from Monsieur le Curé, how Madame Leroux and her daughter are, and, coming back, you may call at Uncle Jacques', and say to Pierette I wish she would come down the first day this week she can get out. Go, and don't break the eggs, and bring back the basket. Mind."

On the ground floor (you entered the premises by the garden, there being no door on the street, which there was bounded by the side-wall of the house and the wall of the garden) a large kitchen and wash-house, a sort of storeroom, and a particularly gloomy stone-floored sitting-room, almost entirely bare of furniture, opened, with window-doors on the paved space that lay in front of the house, and divided it from the garden. Above was the salon, habitually occupied by the curé.

In front of the house a few orange and pomegranate trees stood in cases, once painted green, but now with the color peeling off, and in but sorry condition. Beyond, came the garden—squares of vegetables, bordered with flowers; then a tonnelle, or trellised arbour, clothed with vine, the delicious chasselas, or sweet-water grape, commonly grown in French gardens; and still further down the slope of the hill, a little nook, closely sheltered with some fine chesnut, poplar, and locust trees, and watered by a tiny stream, that found its way into the enclosure by one little opening at the bottom of the pailings, and out by a similar gap at the opposite side. To the left lay a poultry-yard, with pigeon-house above and rabbit hutches below the hen's dormitory; at the same side, a screen of poplars only divided the curé's territory from the back of the church, where stood the little postern that admitted him at all times within the sacred walls.

Jeanne watched at the door till the boy had passed through and latched the garden-gate. Then she returned to the kitchen, took a large key down from a nail where it hung beside the projecting chimney, and once more looking out and all around, she re-entered and proceeded through the long dark tortuous passages to the room that formed the last of the straggling series, unlocked the door, and entered.

It was a small gloomy lumber room. In one corner the long-collected dust had been swept from the floor, where was spread some fresh straw, and on it, rolled up, a mattress and some bedding. After listening intently for a minute, Jeanne, satisfied by the silence, pulled down a broken-legged chair and a ragged rug that were placed on the top of a box in the obscurest part of the room, and, from within it, drew a bundle tied up in an old colored handkerchief. Opening this carefully, several articles of baby's clothing, some complete, some in progress, all of the commonest description, but carefully made and clean, were disclosed, and Jeanne, taking working materials from her pocket, began stitching away at an unfinished frock with feverish rapidity, still pausing now and then, with that look of intense anxiety, to listen.

For more than an hour she worked undisturbed; then, as if fearing to remain longer away from her usual employments, she, putting into her pocket a half-finished cap, which might be worked at in any stray moments, tied up the bundle, restored it to the box, and again covered the latter with the rug and chair, as before. Then carefully locking the door behind her, she returned to the kitchen.

She did so just in time; for, while she was putting together the brands that, during her absence, had burnt through in the middle, and, falling outwards, become scattered and nearly extinguished, an old crone, half-beggar, half-peasant, and commonly reported witch, tottered into the kitchen. Standing just within the threshold, her knotted, claw-like hands crossed on the top of her staff, she gave Jenne a bon jour, and there remained, contemplating the girl, with a grin intolerable to be borne.

"Sit down, Mère Gausset," Jeanne said, crossing herself in secret, as she turned to place a chair for the unwelcome guest. "Sit down; the warm weather's come at last; that ought to agree with your rheumatism."

"Eh, eh, well enough. How is Monsieur le Curé?—and yourself?" suddenly, and with a scrutinizing look.

"Monsieur's well; and I, I'm always well."

"So much the better, so much the better, my girl; ready to dance at the wedding on Thursday? Ah, it'll be a fine wedding."

So deadly a whiteness overspread the girl's face, that she turned from the hag to conceal it, as she replied,

"So I hear."

"Well, you'll see it, no doubt, that'll be better. Eugène Landry and you were great friends last year, I remember; everybody said you were going to be married. But, alas! when a girl's got nothing, lovers are shy, and they say Mélie Prunier has not only a good dowry, but will have old Louis Prunier's savings. Oh, it's a fine marriage for Eugène."

"A fine marriage," Jeanne repeated mechanically. Happily, at that moment, the curés voice calling her, released her for the instant from her torture, and when she had performed the service for which she had been summoned, she lingered about up-stairs till the old woman, tired of waiting, took her departure.

At night, Jeanne went, solitary and sad, to her bed: in the morning, when she went about her work, she left an infant sleeping in it. What she had gone through that night, none but God and her own poor heart could tell.

"Jeanne! how dreadfully ill you look, my girl!" the curé said, when he entered the kitchen. "What is the matter?"

"I am not very well," she replied. "I was ill in the night, and had bad dreams; but I am much better now, monsieur; it's nothing—it will soon pass away."

M. Leroy paused, hesitated, sighed; he would fain have sought her confidence, fain have reassured him as to the suspicions that, never occuring to himself, had lately been suggested by village gossip. But Jeanne went to and fro, bestirring herself in a way to make any such opportunity difficult, and with a slow step and anxious mind, the curé went out to tend his roses.

Through the next three and four days the subject still haunted him, but by degrees less painfully and at longer intervals. Jeanne seemed getting well again, and was, he fancied, less preöccupied, less oppressed with some hidden care than, despite all her efforts to conceal the fact, she had lately been. He had had some knowledge of Eugène Landry's former attachment to her, and he now began to think that it was Eugène's faithlessness alone that had so weighed upon her mind.

On the sixth day from the wedding Jeanne came to him with a troubled face. Her mother was alarmingly ill; she had had a letter from a neighbor, entreating that, if the curé could spare her, she would lose no time in coming to her. M. Leroy scanned the face before him—a face whose color went and came, and whose set mouth and desperately beseeching eyes told all that hung on his reply. He could not keep her in that agony of suspense; he could not, by the hint, even of a perhaps unmerited suspicion, further torture her; so he consented.

It was a distance of nearly five leagues to Montrouge, the village where Jeanne's mother resided, and there being only chance communications between it and Auray-le-Clocher, she had no means of getting there except on foot. She was yet far from strong, and the weather was hot; but, on the mission on which she was going, solitude was wholly indispensable, and this she could only secure by walking.

She had arranged with her cousin Pierrette to take her place in the curé's household during her absence; and now all things were prepared for her departure, which was to take place before even the early June dawn, that she might get beyond the risk of recognition while Auray and its neighborhood was yet buried in sleep.

Strange, terrible, and yet crossed with gleams of stormy sunshine, had been the experience of those last few days to Jeanne. Happily her child was a quiet and a healthy one, and passed most of the hours of its first days in sleep. Still what agonies of vigilance lest its occasional cries should be heard, lest the frequency of her visits to its hiding-place should be noticed, lest Claude should, at any time, track her there unawares! Yet, with all this, the passionate love she had for the infant; the ecstasies of maternal pride and tenderness that not all the shame, and terror, and suffering of her situation could smother, gave her moments she would have purchased at almost any price; and though the child's removal would put an end to this perpetual state of anxious terror, she yet dreaded the separation almost as much as she desired the relief.

She had not confided her secret to any one; though she had been forced tacitly to admit the truth to her cousin Pierrette, who suspected it, but who, after a few leading questions, had, in pity, forborne to inquire further, and who did not come to take her place till some hours after her departure.

Before daylight, Jeanne, with her precious burden sleeping in her arms, and a basket containing the child's clothes and some little provision for the journey, stole out of the presbytère, and through the garden wicket, into the sleeping village, whose length she had to traverse before gaining the road to Montrouge.

The moon had set, and though some stars still twinkled, the night was densely dark. Trembling, listening, seeking to penetrate the obscurity, she paused an instant before the church to assure herself she was unobserved, ere she fairly started on her way. At first all was dead silence; then she fancied she heard—fancied she saw—something, that had been crouching by the white wall of the garden, near the gate, stir and rise slowly. Like a deer that suddenly scents its pursuers, she turned and fled, finding her way through the dark street and over the round sharp stones rather by instinct than sight, stopping not till the rapidity of her course had so exhausted her breath that she was forced to pause to regain it.

By this time she was well out in the open country, and the dim line of the white road just sufficiently visible to her eyes, accustomed to the darkness, to secure her against the danger of losing her way. Then she began to feel a little reassured, and to try to reason away her late panic: it might have been fancy altogether, the effect of an over-tired brain; or, as the impression had been so strong that she could not quite overcome it by any attempts to refuse the evidence of her senses, she persuaded herself that what she could not deny she had seen and heard was a dog, goat, or other animal, that her footsteps had disturbed. So probable, indeed, did this solution appear, that, her reason having nothing to suggest to contradict it, she was fain to reassure herself with such explanation, and, turning her thoughts as well as steps forward, she began once more to rehearse the dreaded scene of confession to her mother, who was utterly ignorant of the events that were so suddenly to be brought before her, and whose alleged illness had been, of course, merely a pretext to make this escape.

By the time that the June morning was in its waking flush, Jeanne had got so far on her way, without immediately encountering any one, that she now began to feel there was comparatively little risk of detection. Still, she said to herself, she must yet push on, and not think of wasting a moment of the so precious morning hours. But, ere she had got much further on her way, she began to feel that she was not in a condition to travel either very fast or very far, and she reflected that it would be better to husband her strength before fatigue overcame it, than to put it all forth at once, and perhaps unfit herself for the completion of her journey.

There was, she knew, not much further on, a little wood, and she now resolved that there should end her first stage. She could find shelter, rest, and concealment among the trees, without going far from the road, and this repose, with some food, would, she hoped, quite recruit her to continue her journey by two or three easy stages, if she found she could not make the rest of it in one. So she walked on bravely, keeping a look-out for the little wood.

Suddenly a turn of the road brought her on a party of men, women and children, half gipsies, half strollers, seated in a green spot by the highway, around their fire. One or two of them looked at her as she passed, but took no further notice, and she continued her way till some hundred yards further on, she perceived, sitting at the foot of a tree, a woman whose general appearance seemed to mark her as one of the party she had just left behind, but whose attitude of grief, her body crouched together, her head bowed down on her hands, might sufficiently account for her thus isolating herself from the rest.

Hearing a footstep, she looked up, and showed a dark face, still young, but marked with an expression of despair so intense, so hopeless, and at the same time, so sullen, that Jeanne's quiet sense of compassion for her was tinged with a touch of fear, and she instinctively shrank from the long, fixed gaze with which the woman followed her. After she had passed, she looked back, and perceiving that she was still the object of the same uncomfortable scrutiny, a thousand vague anxieties assailed her.

She tried to recall the face, to remember where and how she could ever have seen it before; but her memory entirely failed to bring before her any previous association with it, and fancying that the woman must have been deceived by some mistaken identity, she tried to dismiss the subject from her mind. Shortly after, coming within sight of the wood where she proposed to rest, the sense of approaching relief turned her thoughts into another channel.

Turning from the road, she soon found a spot that seemed perfectly suited to her purpose: a couch of thick moss, hidden from the highway, not alone by the intervening trees, but by a bank, overshadowed by a great gnarled and hollow oak, and further cooled and freshened by the flow of a little brook. Here she sat down, bathed her hot and dusty face and hands, and having eaten some of the food she had brought with her, and nursed her child, she settled herself for repose. With the murmur of the brook and the faint regular respiration of her infant in her ears, the soft green light, with here and there a little spot of blue heaven, or a white sailing cloud passing before her upturned face, in her eyes, the sense of all outward things became confounded, and she fell into the first really profound and dreamless sleep she had known for many weeks.

Then there came, stealing along with cat-like footfall and suspended breath, parting, with strong but cautious hand, the flexile branches, stopping by moments to look and listen, then creeping on again, the woman with the terrible face; far more terrible now from the feline intensity of greedy purpose stamped in every line of it. A few more long, lithe, crawling steps brought her beside the mother and child.

Noiselessly she stooped over them, pausing and gazing, never for an instant relenting in her purpose, but studying the best means to execute it. The child lay clasped in the fold of the mother's arm, and now to withdraw it without disturbing her was at once the woman's desire and difficulty. Plucking a stem of feather-grass, she, with its fringed tip, touched the back of Jeanne's hand, ready to drop and crouch behind her, so that should the sleeper be so far disturbed as to open her eyes, her tormentor might not be visible. But, as the latter guessed, her sleep was too profound for this, and she merely twitched her hand, and then, on a repetition of the application, threw out the arm on the ground beside her, leaving the infant exposed.

In a second it was in the dark woman's grasp, and she was up and away, one arm clasping it close to her breast, the other hand ready to lay on its mother and still its cries, if it should attempt to utter any; but it only started and murmured in its sleep, and was quiet again.

The woman sped on without pausing an instant till she came to a spot in the wood, removed a considerable distance from where Jeanne lay, but still only on the border, her course having been nearly parallel to the high road, though not visible from it. Here she paused, and kneeling by a little spot where the ground had been newly disturbed, though a careful covering of moss and dead leaves almost concealed the part, she bent, and, kissing the sod, murmured:

"Adieu, little angel; le bon Dieu has given me one to replace thee!" Then, rising, she once more sped onward, and was soon out of sight.

It was past mid-day when Jeanne awoke, with a terrible dream of the dark woman.

She knew, the instant she found her child gone, what had become of it; but that was small guide, nor greater comfort. Wild and desperate, all thought but that of recovering the baby left her; she cared not who might recognise her, who might know her disgrace; could proclaiming it in the streets of Auray have brought back what she had lost, willingly would she have paid such a price for its restoration. But what to do now? how to trace the woman? In the horrible shock and confusion of her senses, no definite plan at first presented itself; but when, by a violent and determined effort, she collected them, she saw the only chance was for her to retrace her steps to where the strollers had been assembled, and endeavor from them to obtain some clue.

Turning backward, then, she rapidly traversed the ground she had so wearily trodden some hours before. A wayfarer, plodding through the dust, paused to look after the distracted woman, and a little boy herding goats by the wayside crossed himself with mingled fear and pity.

She came at last to the spot she sought; but it was vacant. The brands yet smouldered on the burnt turf, scraps of rags, and dirty paper, and straw littered the ground, the grass still lay crushed and trampled by the dusty feet. But the wanderers were gone, and Jeanne recollected with a feeling of agony that a little further on, three roads branched off in different directions, and that unless she could fall on some accidental trace of their course the chances were two to one against her taking the right one. She traced the way back to where the roads separated. The probabilities seemed altogether in favor of their keeping the main road, which led to Auray. In her despair she had just decided on retracing her steps even thither, when the figure of a man in the distance, coming from that direction, raised a gleam of hope. Hastily joining him, she asked him if he had met the party described. The man stared at her, took off his hat, deliberately wiped his face with the dirty colored handkerchief it contained, restored the handkerchief to the hat and the hat to the head, and then replied in the negative.

"Where had he come from? From far? From beyond Auray-le-Clocher?"

He nodded.

"Then he must have seen them if they had passed?"

"Probably."

"But there were so many of them, and they looked so different to ordinary travelers; and they had a van, with a white horse! He could not be mistaken if he had seen them at all!"

The man shrugged his shoulders. "Savoir! he had rested by the way, he might have slept, they might have passed him while he was asleep."

Jeanne could get nothing more out of him, but still, maddening as was his stolidity, she was disposed to gather from his replies that the chances were against the travelers having taken that route. She resolved to let chance guide her steps, and therefore, with an instinctive shrinking from the glare of the sun, chose the more shady.

On, and on, and on, till her feet were blistered, and her knees trembled, and her head throbbed. On and on till sunset. On and on till nightfall. No trace no sign, no hope. Then she lay down under a bank by the wayside, and felt so utterly broken that she longed for death. But she was too young and too strong for death to make so easy a prey, and sheer exhaustion plunged her into a sleep that lasted till the chill of the coming dawn roused her, stiff and sore, covered with dust, damp with dew, but having no thought beyond that of continuing her search.

Thus for two days and two nights more she wandered, and wandered in vain. Then, with what little power of mind was still left her, she decided to return to Auray, and rather with the instinct that directs a dog on his homeward way than by any more reasoned process, she traced her route back to the presbytère by the evening of the fourth day.

In vain Pierette questioned her; in vain Claude crept to her side and timidly looked up in her haggard face. She had no answer to give, but shook her head and rocked herself in her chair, or stared blankly into the fire. The curé had gone for a game of billiards to the Mairie, and Pierette could only get her to go passively to bed—all attempts to induce her to touch food were vain—and sit by her till, to get rid of the well-intentioned cares of her cousin, Jeanne turned her face to the wall, and pretended to sleep.

Some weeks went by, and Jeanne had fallen into her usual course of duties; but quite mechanically, and as one to whom nothing in life could give a moment of interest or excitement. Her state of mind was a sort of dull, lifeless fatalism, that accepted all things as parts of a crushing, relentless destiny, which she could neither comprehend nor resist, and which she could only bow under so long as her strength lasted. But it was fated that she should be roused from this condition, and in a startling manner.

She was arrested on a charge of infanticide.

At the trial the chain of evidence was painfully conclusive. Her attachment to Eugène Landry had been known, and her condition had, for many weeks back, been more than suspected in the village.

The widow Gausset was the principal witness against her. This woman happened to be about the house more than once at night during the ensuing week; she had heard distinctly, in the darkness and in the silence, the cries of a new-born infant proceeding from the house; she happened again, by another of the same strange chances, to be in the street, near the presbytère, not long after midnight on the sixth night after the wedding; she had been surprised and startled by hearing some one come out of the curé's garden; she had watched to see who it might be, and, although the night was dark, she had been able to distinguish a woman, carrying something in her arms, who fled on seeing her. The widow Gausset, much surprised at this circumstance, had gone the next day to the presbytère, to relate what she had witnessed, deeming it a duty to do so. She had found Jeanne gone to see her dying mother, as she was told. She had not much believed the story, but she had thought the affair was no business of hers; she did not wish to compromise the girl, so she had said no more about the matter at the time.

But since then she had reflected a good deal on the matter, and several circumstances (the last and most important of which had caused her to feel the necessity of revealing all she herself knew on the subject) had, strangely enough, been brought before her. In her wanderings—for she gained a living by going about to the neighboring farms and villages, subsisting on the charity of all good souls, or by effecting cures on cattle that were sick, or affected by the evil eye, or other charms—she had visited Jeanne's mother, and, on speaking to her of her illness and of her daughter's visit, had been amazed to learn that the old woman had never been ill, and had never seen her daughter. Finding this, her suspicions had been so much excited that she—always as a matter of duty—had made every inquiry in the neighborhood and on the road between Montrouge and Auray, and had learned that several persons had seen a young woman whose description precisely answered Jeanne's appearance. For instance a wayfaring man, who had found a job of work at Montrouge, which had kept him there for some time, and a little goatherd, especially had seen her come out of a wood by the roadside; in such an agitated condition that they had fancied her mad. These persons being called, their evidence wholly corroborated the Mere Gausset's testimony. Lastly, came the circumstance which, as the old widow declared, had made her feel it was imperative on her to bring to light all she had learned respecting the affair.

Returning from Montrouge, she was accompanied by a dog that she had cured of the distemper, and that she was taking back to his owner at Auray. Arrived at the wood described by the last witnesses, the dog had run in among the trees, and being unable to bring him back by calling, and fearing to lose him, she had followed to a certain spot, where she found him tearing up the ground with his paws. Finding all efforts to get him away impossible, she had, in some curiosity, further excited by the fact that the ground had evidently been lately disturbed, waited to ascertain what might be the object of his search, and shortly, to her horror and amazement, she saw revealed the body of an infant.

Here the mayor of Auray deposed to the old woman's having made known to him her discovery; of his having, accompanied by her and the other witnesses, gone to the spot and found the body (she had covered it up loosely again, and, by tying a handkerchief round the dog's neck, had dragged him away from it by force); and of his having confided it for examination to Dr. Lenormand, whose testimony followed.

The doctor declared that, in consequence of the state of decomposition in which the body was found, it was impossible to say exactly how old the infant might have been—but probably a week or ten days; possibly a fortnight. There were no marks of external violence on it, but, as far as he could judge, from its existing condition, there was reason to suspect that it might have been smothered. He had seen one or two cases of infants that had been overlain, where the respiratory organs had presented appearances to which those in the case in question seemed to bear a strong analogy.

Pierrette, the curé, last of all Jeanne's mother, were called in to bear evidence, and what they had to say could in no degree invalidate the testimony of the previous witnesses.

So Jeanne Decaisne was declared guilty of child-murder, with the plea, usual in France, where the life of a culprit is at stake (except in the cases of the most exaggerated atrocity), of extenuating circumstances. She was sentenced to the travaux forcés for life.

Jeanne was carried from the court in a state of insensibility. Next morning, when, at dawn the gaoler entered her cell, he found her crouched in a heap in the remotest corner. He spoke to her, but when, obtaining no answer; he laid his hand on her shoulder, she sprang at him, demanding her child; and such was her violence that it required three men to hold her down and bind her. From this stage, which lasted, with little intermission, for some weeks, she gradually fell into one of dull, apathetic imbecility, and in that condition, as she was generally harmless, though occasionally, and at long intervals, subject to fits of passion, her mother was permitted to take her to her own house, where she remained till the period of the old woman's death, which occurred some twelve or thirteen years later. Then Claude, who, thanks to his own steadiness and intelligence, and to the curé's protection, had got an excellent place as gardener at the neighboring Château de Planey, took on himself the charge of the afflicted woman.

Sixteen years had slipped away, bringing their changes to Auray-le-Clocher.

The curé, though an aged was still a hale and hearty man and went about his duties with little diminished activity. His eye and his hand at billiards were not what they used to be, but, on the other hand, the skill in the cultivation of his roses had so much increased that one of them had gained the prize at the horticultural show of the chief town of the department and became known all over France as the Beauty of Auray. The Mere Gausset, whose reputation of witchcraft—with the dread and dislike that belonged to it, had become yet more general since Jeanne's conviction had grown paralytic and half-crazed, and not even the strongest-minded of the inhabitants of the village could pass by where the hag would lie crouching in some sunny corner, a hideous spectacle, mumbling and mowing, or at intervals bursting into impotent shrieking rages at some fancied affront, without shuddering and crossing themselves.

Great preparations were made, as usual, for the fête of Auray. The altar of Sainte Suzanne, the patroness of the village, was newly decorated and adorned with fresh flowers, among which shone conspicuously some of the curé's best roses, and various specimens of young Claude's skill in horticulture. Next came the procession, with all its attendant pomps of music (so called), banners, and priestly vestments, rich with silk, gold and embroidery; and then the fair, where, in booths, were collected enough bad gingerbread to sicken the youth of both sexes of Auray for the next ten days, at least.

But the great attraction was reserved for the evening, when, in an interval of the dancing, some wonderful performances, chiefly of a dramatic character, though the acrobatic, pyrotechnic, and prestidigitatory elements of entertainment were not wanting, were to take place, executed by a strolling company.

The public, on the payment of one sou for those who were content to stand, or three for such as desired the luxury of seats, were admitted into a temporary enclosure formed of mats, canvas and old tarpaulins stretched on posts planted in the sward, and the entertainment commenced by a short, wiry individual, with a swarthy face, keen black eyes, and fabulous head of frizzly black hair, performing a frenzied dance, blindfold, in a space of about two square yards, where were laid six eggs, without breaking one of them. This feat completed, amid the applause of the spectators, the gentleman, tearing the bandage from his eyes, made a sweeping bow to the company, and retreated with a short backward run behind the canvas screen, which formed the green-room.

In a few seconds issued from the same retreat a dark hard-featured woman, looking considerably past forty, though she had probably hardly reached that age, accompanied by a slight girl of from fifteen to seventeen, who, though thin and worn-looking, had some beauty in a pair of large, soft, blue eyes, and a profusion of rich waved brown hair.

Having sung one or two songs to the woman's accompaniment on a cracked guitar, the girl, taking from her hand a tamborine, began to dance to the same music, and the spectators were in the height of their enjoyment, when there came a movement from behind, attended with a cry that sent a shudder through the assembly, and Jeanne, clearing the way before her, as the course of some furious animal divides the densest crowd, plunging forward, and seizing the left hand of the dancer, turned upwards the underside of the wrist. There, traversed by blue veins, and agitated by the throbbing of the pulse, was a rose-colored mark, in size and shape not unlike a rose-leaf.

"My child!" the poor soul shrieked, and clasped the dancer in an embrace in which seemed to be concentrated all the love so long cheated of its object; but the girl shrank from her in terror, and it was to the dark woman that she appealed with cries of "Mother!" for protection. Then came a struggle, a whirl, a heavy fall, the crash and smell and smoke of extinguished lights, a confusion from which the girl with difficulty extricated herself, and when the terrified bystanders at last succeeded in separating the women, the gipsy's lifeless head dropped forward—she was dead.

Jeanne lingered two days between life and death, between reason and insanity. At the last, she recovered sufficiently to establish beyond doubt the identity of the little dancer with her stolen child. Assisted in her last moments by the curé and attended by Claude and Rose, her daughter, she passed out of her troubled life quietly and in peace.

Claude took Rose to his own home, and married her as soon as it was possible to get through the brief preliminaries necessary. They lived, and died, and were buried peacefully at Auray, where, as has been said, many of their descendants are settled, and where this chain of circumstances is still preserved.

OUR RIGHT TO EXPECT A REVEALED RELIGION.

Often times have we been asked the question, whether we can shew that mankind have good and sufficient reasons for expecting a revealed religion of any kind from their Creator? To this important question, our argument has always been that God having created no craving, no taste, no yearning of our lower nature without a preparation for its supply, surely cannot have intended to leave intenser and more important wants ungratified and unsupplied .

To see the force of this idea, mark how carefully the Creator has supplied every necessity of the body with its appropriate food. Not only is the ear prepared for sound, but an atmosphere surrounds us capable of transmitting it in every variety; while a small establishment of lungs, teeth, and throat exists in every human being to manufacture it in any quantity, pour it out in all its harmony, and modulate it to suit the taste. See the palate, or the power of taste, and luscious fruits prepared innumerably to meet that want. Observe the sight, so wondrously arranged, and mark how rising landscapes in their various robes stretch out to meet man's gaze, —the deep blue atmosphere above, the green beneath, the dancing light, the exquisitely-colored flower, and the tints upon the cheek of smiling youth. Then mark the power to grasp the delicate perfume, and see how earth yields stores of sweetly-scented flowers to satisfy that want, while a thousand meaner and inferior calls have also their appropriate supply.

But what a waste of mighty energies and care and love and labor do we see in all this, if God has left man without a religion! The five senses are not all our wants. Gratify the whole of them, and the best part of us remains unsatisfied. There are sympathies and affections of the heart, powers of the intellect, and yearnings of the spirit, requiring guidance and food; immortal powers demanding a boundless field for their employment, and needing a prospect of eternal continuance, ere they can work with full unblemished joy; immortal ambitions, and other endless activities, demanding the same prospects and the same boundless scope. These powers, never fully met or satisfied with any hope or employment that is bounded by death, lie locked up in the man, curdling and souring the whole being, and calling for their appropriate food.—food, be it remarked, that man's own efforts cannot reach; for, apart from revelation, between the little span of life and death, lies the whole range of man's hopes and expectations.—food that is as much wanted as that required by the body. The spirit of man cries for a religion—a revelation of principles that shall supply these wants. Such a religion is evidently to be had, unless we can believe that the Creator, who has so sedulously and minutely attended to our meaner wants, has left the best half of his work undone.

Music.—In this number, we publish an original piece of music, entitled "Happy Days." The words were published some time ago in the Utah Magazine, and the music has been expressly composed for our Magazine, by Prof. George Careless. We shall continue to publish compositions of our home musicians.

Music.

NEEDED---ZION'S PSALMODY.

Their own music for the Saints! The very suggestion is sufficiently telling. Why should they not have their own music? Sects insignificant in numbers, possessing no social organizations and having no national ambitions, as religious bodies, are still ambitious for their own Church psalmodies; while the more powerful and established Churches have their splendid musical services, sung by their congregations in every land and handed down from generation to generation. But the Latter-day Saints, who have been looked upon by all the world as a little nation of the peculiar people, at present have no Psalmody of their own in general use among their congregations.

We will not here dwell upon the influence of music in a religious body, and the character which splendid musical service breathing the very genius of that particular religious body gives to an established Church. That must be left for other articles. The history of the Catholic Church touching this matter, and the influence which its musical service has had, not only in extending but in perpetuating its religion, and the mission of its priesthood from age to age, will start into the memory of our readers in a moment. Let that for the present suffice as a grand suggestion of the vast necessity of a Church possessing its own special music, and come to the particular subject of a psalmody for the Saints.

Next to the necessity of a congregation of religionists having their own Hymn Book, is that of having their own Psalmody. Their hymns are burdened with the subject of their Church, breathes the genius of the people, and inspires them with the sentiments of their faith. It is very evident then that those hymns require a kindred interpretation in music. If like those of the Latter-day Saints, they are simple in theme, vigorous in style and exultant in prophetic spirit, those hymns demand a corresponding musical setting; if like those of the sombre Calvinist, their theme being —

> "Who can resolve the doubt
> That tears this anxious breast,—
> Shall I be with the damn'd cast out,
> Or numbered with the blest?"

then pondrous, mournful strains will be required; if like those of the Primitive Methodists, they burst with the shout —

> "Stop, poor sinner, stop and think > Before you farther go;"—

then bold revival music must be supplied. Thus it is strongly apparent that every Church requires its own Psalmody. The musical editor of the UTAH MAGAZINE, years ago, commenced agitating this subject among our people; and in England, he published a preparatory Psalmody consisting of simple but appropriate melodies for the service of untrained congregations, whose choirs were constantly being broken up by emigrations. Simplicity was the object aimed for, not classical music; so that the simple strains adapted to our familiar hymns might be readily caught. But for Zion a more extensive and classical work is of course necessary, and the mission and genius of the UTAH MAGAZINE point to the same direction. That design will certainly be carried out; the Saints must have their own Psalmody.

There is in Utah more than one musical composer. A Latter-day Saint Psalmody should be the work of the many, so that it might truly be the music book of the Church. There are Professors Thomas, Careless, Calder, Tullidge of the regular profession—besides the talented youth Master Daynes, and a number of choral masters and amateur musicians, who can compose hymn-tunes and anthems certainly equal to those now in use in the Territory. A Psalmody then from our own composers, is a practicable book and one which the proprietors of the UTAH MAGAZINE hope yet to see in existence. This would cover much of he desirable results referred to in a correspondent's letter now before us, and do away with the necessity of choral masters wasting so much labor and means in purchasing music paper and copying parts. But better still than this, our own hymns will be set to our own tunes, and uniformity prevail throughout the Territory in the musical service of the Church. Congregational singing will then be very easy; and trained choirs leading the service more efficient than now. The subject of giving prizes for the best musical compositions dovetails very fitly into the design of Zion's Psalmody.

The Drama.

THE COMING MAN.—It is presumable that we may look out to see soon the "coming man." It has been suggested that the public would be entertained just now by the novelty of a "man actress." The age is ripe with female men, and every star lady of magnificent physique must play some man's part. Doubtless the "variation" is admirable, but we think it could be varied again to advantage. A Don Cæsar de Bazan, who wasn't a woman, would be a decided novelty, and so would a real masculine who could play successfully "Faint Heart Never Won Fair Lady Yet," after a first class Shakspercan night. But our "Poet of All Time" is not the only classical dramatist who has written plays which will live. There are Massinger, Bulwer, Knowles and others who are dramatists and not mere play writers. Their parts need filling by good actors—their principal characters by great actors. It is, therefore, necessary that the management should depend much upon its own tact, but ever and anon theatre-goers, as well as the world in its general affairs, cry out for the Coming Man.

ARRIVED.—Mr. Charles Wheatleigh has just arrived: he brings with him a name.

ABRAHAM'S FAITH.

BY JABEZ WOODARD.

And must I now thus give thee up,
Thou mighty matchless sacrifice,
And drink the bitterest poisoned cup
That e'er to mortal lips did rise?
Oh, weep once more my aged eyes
Before my son, my Isaac dies!

But how once meet man's scorn, or, worse
Than thousand daggers in the heart,
The blight of woman's wildest curse?
A mothers wail might rend the rocks apart.
'Tis Satan's last terrific dart.
And only fiends should feel the smart.

And yet one with'ring word I hear,
Such question never came to man before,
The hope's broad leaf he plucked and sear.
This thrust alone tells all is o'er—
A whisper through my spirit's core
From voice that soon shall speak no more.

"Where is the lamb, my father? Where
The firstling of thy flocks, to lay
Upon God's holy altar there:
Where yonder thou wilt kneel to pray?"
Unconscious lamb! 'tis he must pay
The firstling's price this fearful day.

Yet one hath sworn, that dwells above,
That my posterity shall reign
As far as wings can bear the dove,
Or distant ocean isle remain.
Yea, first along the Syrian plain,
Then o'er each land of man's domain.

So now descend, my glittering blade
Upon the heart that beats for mine.
And close in death's eternal shade
Those eyes more bright than summer's shine:
All earthly love will I resign,
And say, "My Father I am thine."

HANDEL.

His Life Peculiarities and Compositions.

BY PROFESSOR JOHN TULLIDGE.

No. 1.

George Frederick Handel, of immortal memory, was born at Halle, in Saxony, in the year 1684. The predominant feature of his infantile recreations was his fond attachment to the musical art, and his wonderful genius was the surprise of all who listened to his childlike prattle on the subject of music. His father, who designed him for the law, perceiving his inclination for the musical profession, strongly opposed his following it, and especially forbade him to touch an instrument. But the impulses of the boy's genius were irresistible, and he was as determined in his attachment to the divine art, as his father was in his opposition to his son following it as a profession.

In one of Handel's rambles through the family mansion, he, by accident, found in a lumber room an old Harpsichord used in bygone days by the family. This discovery was glory to him, and from that time the boy was rarely seen except at school, or at the family table during the hours of refreshment. His leisure at the school vacations was employed at his favorite study. When the hour arrived for his family to retire for the night he watched his opportunity to steal to the garret where he had concealed the old Harpsichord and here he would delight himself when the family were asleep. In this garret, his sanctuary of art, he began his studies with a variety of harmonic combinations which he had gathered from the works of the great masters. He also practised many difficult melodial passages emanating from his own brain.

On one occasion Handel accompanied his father to a party where music held the sway of the evening. In all probability the desire to exhibit his skill on the Harpsichord, and the instrument being a much better one than he had used, prompted the youthful musician to risk his father's displeasure rather than forego the opportunity of proving to him, and those present, that music was the only profession he could follow with honor to himself and family. Genius triumphed that night as it ever does when fairly before the public. By this stratagem of young Handel his father was conquered and the advice of many professional musicians present induced him to consent to place his boy under the best masters of the age for the study of the organ and counterpoint—a composition in the strict style. The accident of finding the old Harpsichord and the circumstance above noted was doubtless the indirect means of giving to the musical world some of the most classical and powerful productions of all ages.

At the age of nine, Handel composed the church service, for voices and instruments; and at fourteen, our youthful composer far excelled his master. He was now sent to Berlin, and his sovereign having been attracted by his genius, made him liberal presents as a tribute. At the age of twenty he brought out his first opera of "Almira," and soon after visiting Italy, he produced at Florence the opera of "Rodrigo." Venice, Naples and Rome were honored by his presence in turn. Having remained six years in Italy, he accepted the pressing invitations of the British nobility to visit London, at which place he arrived in the latter part of the year 1710. His reception in England was most cordial, which induced him to stay, and the giant composer, by the immortal works which he produced in Great Britain, became for ever identified with that nation, even more than with Germany, his native land.

In 1741, he brought out in London, his oratorio of the "Messiah," which has been decided by the musical world as not only the chef d'œuvre of Handel, but the very best of its class.

Handel, in producing his oratorios, met with great losses occasionally, but at other times, with great success.

Speaking of his losses and profits, the former were more frequent than the latter; but that did not unnerve him or make him lose his temper, although he was very passionate sometimes. If the music went all right, Handel was satisfied. In producing one of his oratorios—which name has slipped my memory—Handel had expended much time, much patience and much money so that his work might be rendered by the band and voices in the most effective possible manner. He generally conducted his oratorios on the organ. It so happened that on this night—as well as many others—that the house was very thinly attended; and when a friend of his directed his attention to the subject of loss and gain, Handel replied, "Never mind, de music will sound all de better."

It is well known to those who are acquainted with the history of Handel's life, that he obtained while living as much or more popularity and eminence by his compositions and skill on the organ than any other musician. He was ambitious as a composer, and most eccentric in the manner he adopted to display his skill on the organ. He had obtained at the date of the anecdote I am about to relate, much popularity by his compositions and organ executions. One of his peculiarities was his delight in rambling and going incog. to public places of worship, where he would take his seat beside the organist, sometimes to the astonishment of both the choir and performer on the organ. On one occasion, he seemed so attentive to the executions of the player on his favorite instrument, that the musician who presided was much gratified in having so good a listener to his performances and at Handel's suggestion, thinking he had only an amateur to compete with, he allowed him the privilege to play the voluntary. This is a composition for the organ which generally consists of two or three movements calculated to display the capabilities of the instrument and skill of the performer. Handel, to all appearance, modestly took his seat, and began conversing impromptu on that noble instrument with such unequalled skill, that both the organist and his audience became a fixture in their seats. Subject, counter-subject and their answers flew with amazing rapidity through the prolific brain of Handel, which were immediately transferred to the organ and beautifully developed and elaborated. Episodal constructions were judiciously brought to the relief of his subjects as the anecdote is to literary compositions. The people were charmed, the organist astounded, and the time flew with such rapidity that an accidental appeal to the watch of the local organ player, warned him that it was time to bring things to a finale. "Get up," exclaimed the organist abruptly, "let me sit down; you'll never play them out; you must be the devil or Handel!"

As might be imagined, Handel was highly delighted with the compliment, and walked slowly away; and the audience hearing the difference in the execution, retired presto, prestissimo.

AN INVITATION.—The main object of the UTAH MAGAZINE is for the development of home talent. We therefore invite short articles on any scientific or literary subject. Any communication of real talent, whether in prose or poetry will receive our attention. Correspondence on Musical or other subjects is also invited. Let all who are interested in our mutual self-elevation as a people take hold with us, and we will, aided by our brethren, publish a Magazine worthy of our growing people, and a fair representative of Utah talent and energy abroad.

A SKETCH OF EDINBURGH.

BY JOHN NICHOLSON.

Concluded.

"Auld Reekie" has, on account of its architectural beauty, been called "Modern Athens." It well deserves the name. It is also occasionally called the City of the Seven Hills, because that is the number of hills upon which it is built. It might as aptly be called the City of Valleys as the low places are occupied as well as the eminences. In order to obtain a central view of this city, in imagination, let the reader go with us and take station on what is called North Bridge which spans the dividing valley between the old town and the new. This bridge, if we recollect aright, is 150 feet high. We look over into the valley; in it all is life and bustle. Underneath us are streets, railroad lines, stations, market places, etc., and streets stretching away on each side of us. To the west tower the grey walls of the ancient castle which arises frowning upon the city beneath it. It is built on a rocky hill, the sides of which, on the north, south and west, are almost perpendicular. Between the Castle and Waverley Bridge we see the public gardens, which contain the world-renowned Sir Walter Scott's monument. These gardens are beautifully and elegantly laid out with trees, flower beds and smooth bowling greens, and in which delightful fountains bubble forth perpetual music. There are other gardens further west which are still more elaborately arranged with tree-shaded avenues, flower patches, shrubberies and fantastically shaped green plots with sheltered nooks where the seeker of calm retirement can rest under the grateful shadow of spreading tree or projecting rock. These two sections of the gardens are divided by a broad and elevated walk, on which we see two fine, colossal, square buildings, which are surrounded, on the exterior, with large pillars and pilasters. Those buildings are the Art Galleries of the Scottish Association of the Fine Arts. In the oldest of the two buildings are contained the productions in painting and sculpture of the dead masters, and in the new building those of the living artists. Many of the emanations of chisel and brush there show that the soil of Scotland is by no means uncongenial to the production of the sons of genius.

Looking to the northeast we see the Calton hill; on its side there is a large castelated building with towers, and what look like ramparts. This structure brings to mind the ancient strongholds of the feudal barons. It is the city jail, and, to the disgrace of the large number of hypocritical, puritanical Presbyterians in that great city, be it said, the building is scarcely large enough to contain the hundreds of miserable criminals who have to seek an involuntary, temporary lodgement in it. On the summit of the hill is Nelson's Monument, the only striking feature about which is its immense height, and the fine view that can be obtained from the observatory on its top. The south and east sides of the hill are built around in magnificent terraces in crescent form, the residences there are on the grandest scale. This part of Edinburgh is among the first seen by the traveler from the south by the North British line of railroad, and impresses him with the huge appearance of the city. This impression is not obliterated on getting more into the heart of the metropolis, as the buildings are high and are mostly built of fine, light-colored sandstone and those in the new town smoothly polished.

The finest view of Edinburgh and its surroundings is to be obtained from the summit of Arthur Seat, a high hill at the eastern part of the city; but as scenic descriptions appear but dry affairs to many readers we will close this sketch for the present.

Illustrated in its Great Characters.

CHAPTER III.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE AND THE CÆSARS.

A new imperial age, another great spiritual dispensation! This was the subject of the times when the Roman empire arose.

Before the Alexanders, the Nebuchadnezzars or the Pharaohs lived, the rise and fall of empires was an antique theme. The world to them was as old as now to us. Indeed when was it young? It has ever been coming to an end, but never has that end been quite reached: never will! But empires have arisen and succeeded each other and then in their turns declined; their cycles have formed new ages and new dispensations. Thus was it when the Cæsars came and the Christ was born.

The old empires of Egypt, Babylon and Greece had passed away, following the series of empires which had died ere they had flourished: that of the Cæsars commenced. It was the iron dominion which the Hebrew Prophets foretold should rule the world, after that of the gorgeous Alexander of Greece. But it was destined to be absorbed in the mission of Jesus—to form the body of a more universal and powerful empire than that of any of the preceding ages. Rome expanded into Christendom, and its Popes and Reformers came down with the world towards the consummation of times. In the grand epic was to be fulfilled the promise—"Unto Him shall every knee bow and every tongue confess." Surely there has been a Providence and an Infinite wisdom in the course of events.

The Republic had brought the Roman nation to the very zenith of glory, and given to it the dominion of the world. It was the republic which produced the great characters of the age, whose colossal names live even to this day. It is of republics or of revolutions that the greatest men are ever born. Temporal and spiritual absolutisms are not prolific. Human progress and magnificent souls have not conception in the barren womb of despotic States, nor in the mummied sepulchres of ancient priesthoods. But while new dispensations of religions bring forth the Christs—the saviours of humanity—and republics and revolutions are pregnant with civilizations, they give birth to a Julius Cæsar, a Cromwell or a Napoleon. It is, however, a glorious fact that the Christ-spirit ever comes as a kindred birth, and humanity receives a new spiritual incarnation or else there is opened a grander dispensation of liberty to nations. It is revolutionary all—old things passing away!

But the world was not ripe for the economy of republics when Julius Cæsar lived; Rome was only a fragment of civilization; the bulk of nationalities were barbarian, and the Roman dominion which extended over them was imperial and not republican: it was part of iron and part of clay. Its legions were the type of might, its eagles of conquerors and magnificent souls: Cæsar the "foremost man in all the earth" came, and he was empire embodied. The man was more a culmination of his nation and his times than a personal fragment, the same as was the first Napoleon. The republican genius had been conceived, but the Imperial States of the world were old, and the body of humanity barbaric. The genius was, therefore, but a prophecy of the future state of man, and not a universal issue for that age. The republic passed away,—the empire succeeded. Though thousands of years of progress had gone before, mankind was still only fit for the dominion of might, and not the economy of republics, in which the genius of right not might prevails. Julius Cæsar became the embodiment of a new empire for the world, but he sealed his imperial dispensation with his blood. The patriots slew him, in the great cause of humanity, but they were less wise than he—less a culmination of the times. Thus died he—the victor of five hundred battles, the conqueror of a thousand cities, in the fifty-sixth year of his age and the forty-fourth before the commencement of our era.

After the assassination of this magnificent man, the patriots failing to reëstablish the republic, Mark Antony attempted to raise himself to Cæsar's place, but not succeeding the Triumvirate was formed. Octavius, becoming conqueror, next restored the empire, which his great uncle had founded.

Octavius, the adopted son and grandnephew of Julius Cæsar, reaching his proud eminence, took the name of Augustus Cæsar. He aimed to consolidate the empire, instead of extending its conquests, and humored the republican pride of the Roman people. An absolute monarch, yet he ruled with such magnanimity and consummate statesmanship that historians have delighted to dwell upon his glorious and beneficent reign. Hence has come the style of the "Augustian age." He died in the fourteenth year of our era, and was succeeded by Tiberius, in whose days Christ was crucified.

It is a noteworthy circumstance that Christ was born at the beginning of the Roman empire, for Augustus Cæsar was the first regular emperor of Rome. How suggestive a fact have we here! The kingdom of Heaven and the empire of this world in juxtaposition—the two halves of dominion—the temporal and the spiritual born together, to form a new imperial age and a new dispensation of light and love revealed in the incarnation of the Son of God.

Another very suggestive fact connected with the twin birth of the Roman and Christian empires in the persons of Augustus Cæsar and Jesus Christ, is that the temporal came before the spiritual. It was as the advent of Esau and Jacob, and the elder was destined to give way to the younger, for the spiritual held the superior mission.

After the reign of Augustus Cæsar the Roman empire degenerated, its grand character, exemplified in the days of the Republic, was marred, and vice corroded the state. The nation declined at the very birth of the empire! Only fifty years had passed away after the death of Augustus Cæsar when the monster, Nero, completed his tragedies, which shock the heart of humanity to this day.

A few worthy princes reigned after the establishment of the empire of the Cæsars, among whom was Titus, the son of Vespasian, who distinguished himself at the siege of Jernsalem; he is called the delight of the human race; he was the father of his people, and during his reign was merciful and virtuous. On one occasion, having performed no act of kindness during the day, he mournfully exclaimed, "My friends, I have lost a day." When he died the Romans said of him, "That he never ought to have lived at all or to have lived forever."

So short was the reign of the Roman emperors that Trajan, the fourteenth of the line, ascended the throne A. D. 107. He brought back to Rome the days of the glorious Augustus Cæsar; during his reign the empire extended its dominions and even surpassed its former splendor. Adrian, who was distinguished for his literary acquirements, succeeded him; yet during the reign of both these excellent princes the Christians suffered persecution from their administration. This, however, is but another example of the inevitable warfare between the "powers that be" and the powers which are destined to supplant them in the dominion of the world.

Towards the end of the second century Lucius Commodus Antoninus occupied the throne, and, during his reign, his Roman generals conquered the Moors, the Dacians, the Pannonians, the Germans; the Britons also, who had so stubbornly resisted the invasion of the great Julius Cæsar, were reduced. Yet the empire was on the decline rotting at its very core through the corruption of its princes. Commodus was a demigod in form, but a monster in soul. His bestiality may be imagined from the fact that his palaces contained three hundred young girls to gratify his passions; and there is the exact counterpart of this, which we dare not even name. (Who that is acquainted with history will question the judgment that the world does advance?) Yet in his reign the Christians enjoyed repose. Is not that a sermon upon the subject of persecutions? Saints put Saints to death in their mutual sincerity—good men martyred each other in turn for the cause of God! Commodus, a monster, occupied with his beastly pursuits, gave to the Christians repose, the "persecutors" oftentimes are better than the "persecuted!"

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

CHAPTER III.

EARLY CONDITION OF THE PASTORAL AND AGRICULTURAL TRIBES.

In the foregoing chapters I have briefly reviewed the religion, laws, and marital relations of the wandering tribes, and have referred but incidentally to events directly connected with the history of nations possessing a degree of civilization; believing it proper to do so in consequence of the small advance made by those nations upon the rude customs and usages of tribes wholly barbarous.

In a few words, I have endeavored to show how broad the way and how numerous the temptations spread before that portion of the descendants of Noah, who, by accident or design, were led into countries possessing genial climates, umbrageous forests, and plenty of game, to follow a life by the chase—a life, which by its uncertainties and precariousness, inevitably led them into barbarism. Agriculture, on the other hand, of course necessitates a localized and permanent habitation, which brings all who follow it into close social intercourse, and necessitates the enactment of laws that establish individual rights in property. Distinctive rights of possession in wife, children, houses and lands cultivate and develope the individuality of man's nature, and is the well-spring of all that the world has ever known, or ever will know, of civilization and refinement. I consider a pastoral life as simply the half-way point from civilization to barbarism.

The cause of the wandering life of Abraham is clear; having been led out from his father's house, and from his father's gods by divine direction, and made a wanderer in strange lands, he had, of necessity, to take to a pastoral mode of life, no matter whether his own tastes would have led him to the settled and more secure pursuit of agriculture or not. His descendants, like him, being sojourners in other lands, were also of necessity, keepers of flocks and cattle until they reached a permanent abode in the promised land.

In the coming chapters it will be our purpose to trace out the growth and development of ancient civilization in Assyrian, Egyptian, Grecian, and Roman history; not forgetting those types of primitive civilization still existing in the characteristics of India, China and Japan.

I am aware that historians almost universally accord to the Egyptians the earliest civilization of the Noachian period. I dissent from this dogma of history; in my view the plains of Shinar were the cradle of the human race. There the first settlements were formed after leaving Armenia and the less hospitable regions around Ararat. The settlements in Palestine "Ure, of Chaldees," and Egypt, were but offshoots from the parent hive. There all who were strongly imbued with a love of home and its charms of peace and quiet remained; while the lovers of the chase explored for countries suitable for that mode of life. Another class, less roaming in disposition, but equally averse to following the plow, and the hum-drum of agricultural life, took to pastoral occupations, as naturally as ducks take to water. How far mankind had advanced in civilization, and the arts and sciences that are indispensible adjuncts thereto before the date ascribed to the flood, we have no means of knowing, but our theology affirms that Enoch and the inhabitants of his city had attained to a high standard of mechanical and social development. "Three hundred and sixty-five years" residence in a city, with all the opportunities of social intercourse and enjoyment of social amenities, governed by a man who "walked with God," and who taught them the principles of a pure faith, must have purified and ennobled the people of Zion in a wonderful degree. Buthere let us not forget that there was but one city of Zion, in the anti-diluvian age. The fact that Enoch found it necessary to gather his people and separate them from the rest of mankind, is a grand solution of the whole problem of anti-diluvian life, one that necessarily leads us to suppose that the vast majority of the then occupants of the earth had "gone after strange gods."

We have but slight data upon which to base our conceptions of the degree of social elevation enjoyed by the immediate deseendants of Noah, but we can infer, from the condition in which the earliest tradition found them, and from the condition of society at the period of the earliest records of divine writ, that they, like their progenitors, had gone astray, proving that as soon as a people cut themselves loose from the spirit of revelation, that reveals unto them the existence of the true and only God, and that "taketh the things of the Father and Son and sheweth them unto them", —the worship of a plurality of gods follows as a matter of course—for then a man's god becomes simply the projection of his own nature, and he creates a deity suited to his own ideas of the powerful, the great and the glorious. To quote the idea of a celebrated writer, just as "the bull feeding in a neighboring pasture would do, were it possible for him to form any ideas of a future existence; his conceptions of a god would simply be of a greater bull than himself with an infinitely better pasture to feed upon."

PHYSICAL FORCES OF THE UNIVERSE AND THEIR UTILIZATION.

BY JINGO.

NOTE.—This is a serious article.—ED.

This is a subject which has been agitated time after time with more or less benefit to the community. It has been thought about, talked about, and written about; but notwithstanding all this discussion and agitation, some singularly important considerations have, in our estimation, been overlooked. One very essential element in the successful prosecution of home manufacture is the introduction and employment of suitable machinery. When we say suitable machinery, we mean machinery in every respect adapted to the varied requisitions of the manufacturing interests at large. Now, in order to employ machinery to advantage, it would be superfluous for us to state that motive power, of some sort, is absolutely indispensible. In fact, machinery without it is simply inert matter. Now, whence shall we obtain the giant impulse which shall permeate with its active and energizing influence the multifarious ramifications of these stupendous details? It is not in the vast domain of manual labor that we shall search. We shall not wrest this important impulse from the heat and sweat of honest toil. No! rather let us seek the gorgeous palaces of the thoughtless votaries of pleasure, where careless mirth and gayety resound; here our magnificent scheme of utilization begins. The graceful harmonies wafted on the wings of night come freighted with this important secret!

Gentle reader, picture to yourself a commodious and sumptuously furnished Hall, brilliantly illuminated and filled with a gay company of revellers numbering, at a moderate computation, say 80 or 90 ardent spirits in the full flush of youth and beauty. The combined weight of this assemblage would, at a very moderate computation, probably exceed 10085 lbs. Here is an immense power which requires merely the arms of three fiddlers to set in motion! Now to simplify the calculation and not to fatigue the intelligent reader, we will suppose the dance commenced, and that each of the 90 is capable of executing the pigeon-wing in its utmost perfection. This requires a fall of from one to one and a half feet, say three times per second. Supposing the dance to continue 6 hours; and the total weight above mentioned to be merely doubled by the fall, we shall have the force of 20170 lbs. applied 64800 times during the dance; and all through the efforts of three fiddlers whose services can be procured for $18 in store-pay and three quarts of ordinary whisky!

The magnitude of this result almost overwhelms the imagination! We do not hesitate to state that a power equivalent to that of 200 horses is absolutely wasted almost every night in the week, and every week in the month, during 6 months of every year, in this city alone. The total loss of the Territory in this respect is probably that of 230,000 horse-power for one day! Now the commonest horse is always worth at least $1 per diem; consequently the loss to the Territory is equal in round numbers to $230,000; hence, if we utilize this power, we save $230,000 yearly! Franklin, the philosopher, informs us that a certain amount saved is twice that amount earned. If this is so (and we have never heard it disputed), we realize for the Territory every year, $460,000; or say for the last twenty-two years, irrespective of interest, $9,626,750.75¢; with interest at 5 per cent per month, this would amount to the snug little sum of $263,756,544,796.7632.

It is, we are aware, useless to repine over what has been lost, or to speculate upon what might have been done with this vast sum; and how many comforts it might have procured the community.

> The saddest words of tongue or pen
> Are—it is—but it hadn't ought to've been .

The past is gone; we shall never see the lost $9,626,750.75¢, but the future is before us, and it remains to be seen whether the business men of this community will suffer a repetition of this loss on a more extended scale in the future.

We intend to enter more fully into the detail of the application of this power in the next article we write upon this subject. We think we see the time approaching, in the dim vista of futurity, when money will not be exacted for admission to balls and parties, but when it will be cheerfully paid to the honest dancer, and the more partners he has, the less the expense, and the greater will be his reward.

N.B.—Certain parties have seen fit to dispute the accuracy of our calculations. It is only necessary to state that these calculations were carefully made with instruments worked by machinery on the above prineiple; independent of which every schoolboy knows that "figures don't lie."

CHAPTER VI.

SHADOWS OF COMING EVENTS.

"Ha! Wortley: so you are come at last?" Blakely exclaimed as the lawyer entered his "den."

"I must correct you, Sir Herbert, I am first. The time is last, not I. It lacks just fourteen minutes to eight, which makes me just fourteen minutes first. Your clock, Sir Herbert, is exactly three minutes and a half too fast. Yes, I assure you that is the time. I regulated my repeater to-day by Greenwich authority."

The lawyer spoke with a soft suavity, as though he was in the best of humor, and comfortable in spite of being almost frozen, and quite wet through; but the baronet knew that Wortley was paying him back in his true lawyer method.

"Out upon the time! I need no sermon upon the matter."

"Right, Sir Herbert. Look for yourself. Exactly now thirteen minutes to eight," and the lawyer provokingly laid his gold repeater before the impatient baronet.

"Come, come, Wortley; no retaliation. I know that you are annoyed at my instructions to Snap, but I thought you would find this apartment quite as cosy as my valet's. You need a change of clothing, which you will find in my wardrobe. Be expeditious, I am bursting with impatience to learn the full particulars of your negotiations with Courtney."

"I think I had better thaw a little before changing. Upon my honor I have no fingers to dress or undress: I am almost inclined to think they are frozen off. At any rate I do not feel them, yet if I may trust my eyes, there does seem to be something of them left."

"Next to your fees, Wortley, I think you love retaliation. Tut, tut, man, I only designed your comfort. Drink a glass of brandy, that will thaw you, and I will air the linen by the time you are ready for it," said Blakely, going to his wardrobe.

Wortley was conciliated, and then he knew that the checkmate which young Sir Walter Templar had given would furnish Blakely with ample opportunity for rage without his provoking him further. In a quarter of an hour the lawyer was quite thawed and cosily seated in a luxurious chair by the fire opposite Sir Herbert.

"Now, Wortley, for your budget. Let me have it without the round-about method of you lawyers."

"I will not be more prolix than necessary. But you will admit, when I am through, that detail is required to give you the bearings of the case, which I fear is rather complicated."

"Complicated? What the devil do you mean? You wrote me that Courtney acknowledged the necessity of closing with my offer?"

"I thus wrote, Sir Herbert."

"Have you deceived me, Wortley? By the Fiend, I like not to be played with, sir!"

"I have not juggled you. Courtney did admit the necessity."

"Well, sir!"

"And upon his very lip was his acceptance of the terms."

"Ha! say you so?"

"Yes; upon his very lip, I say, was his consent, Sir Herbert."

"Then there can be no obstacle that cannot be swept at once from the path. You say, Wortley, that Courtney acknowledged the necessity, and that upon his very tongue were the words which would make the DeLacy estates mine?"

"In less than an hour all the papers would have been signed, and the estates yours, Sir Herbert."

"Why, by all that's wonderful, what miracle prevented it?"

"No miracle, but simply a boy."

"By the Fiend, sir, you do but jest with me!"

"I never jest, Sir Herbert, in business."

"Quick, man," said Sir Herbert, "quick, no more round-about. Let me have the wonderful obstacle which you discovered in a boy—the beggar DeLacy. 'Tis plain, sir, you have been a fool. There's bungling in the business, and you are approaching it with cunning preparation. Well, sir, tell me more of this miracle which you found in a boy."

"After reading a letter, brought in by the servant, which I presumed was an answer to Courtney's last effort to save the DeLacy's estates, Sir Richard mournfully acknowledged there was no alternative to the acceptance of our terms. I expressed satisfaction at the amicable understanding which we had reached, and said, 'so you accept our offer, Sir Richard?' The acceptance, as I have told you, was on his lips, when the voice of a youth behind me exclaimed haughtily and imperatively, 'Sir Richard Courtney rejects the offer of Sir Herbert Blakely.'

"Now this is heroic, indeed, lawyer Wortley. Of course it was DeLacy's beggar brat. Just like his father."

"So I took the youth at first. But it turned out to be Courtney's nephew, Sir Walter Templar."

"Better and better! Well, sir, go on."

"In short, this boy, Sir Walter Templar, imperatively commanded—aye, commanded—for it was very like a command—he commanded Sir Richard Courtney to sell the princely mines of the Templars in Cornwall and pay off the mortgage on the DeLacy estates. At first Sir Richard resisted the impetuous boy, but—"

"Let me finish the narrative for you, sir lawyer. Courtney finding this unexpected denouement, which a self-willed, inexperienced boy had given, upon second thought hit upon a cunning ruse. He feigned to give way to his nephew, pretended to entertain the mad proposition of the boy, and so befooled a witless blockhead. Why, sir lawyer, he dared not strain his perogative of guardian to sacrifice his ward and nephew, even to save the DeLacy estate. Sell the Templar mines. Pshaw! They are as mines of gold to Courtney's own family. Young Sir Walter Templar himself, in his maturity, would be the first to call his uncle to account, were he to allow the sacrifice. I tell thee, thou art befooled. 'Tis time, sir, that I transfer my business into other hands."

"Were it not, Sir Herbert, that I know you will make acknowledgment for your insult, you should find, as you ere now said, that retaliation is with me more than my fee. I never forgive a man who treats me as a fool. I could forgive much in a client who paid well, but not that insult, Blakely. I sympathize with your disappointment, and as I know that you will pay my judgment the compliment of following my advice, I will forgive you calling me a fool."

"Well, I own that I have ever found you most astute. But you cannot, in your calm judgment, think it other than a masterly ruse of the stragetic Courtney?"

"In one week, Sir Herbert, the hold on the DeLacy estates, for which your father so long plotted, would have passed out of your hands, and Young Sir Walter Templar would have superseded you as mortgagee."

"Think you so in cool judgment, Wortley?'

"I would stake my legal judgment upon it, and that is not indifferently low."

"Right, Wortley: few in your profession stand higher than yourself."

"You have, not knowing him, much mistaken the foe you will meet in this youth, Sir Walter."

"Foe, say you, and a boy? Pshaw! I have in me too much of my father, who was a match for most men, to fear a boy."

"That boy will, if he lives, become a rich, powerful man."

"I fear him not, Wortley. Does not your worldly experience tell you that he most likely will be less dangerous as a man of the world than as a foolish boy who sees not, as we see, the sacrifice he offers for his young friend and playmate? Men of the world do not make such sacrifices, Wortley. 'Tis left to the foolish days of boyhood and youth to be so generous and self-sacrificing."

"I admit your worldly philosophy, Sir Herbert, and also that as a man Sir Walter Templar may become less dangerous, and by some masterly plotting of ours be made to pay for the checkmate which he has this time given us."

"Ha! Wortley, I perceive you have your case arranged."

"I always have, Sir Herbert, when I come to business. In the first place, you much underrate the boy, Sir Walter. Take my judgment for it, that, unless we by some masterly management take from young Lord Frederick the powerful support of Sir Walter—aye, place him in antagonism to the DeLacy—"

"Ha! I see your drift. Go on."

"Unless we do this, Sir Herbert, you will find in Sir Walter Templar an enemy thrice the weight of his uncle Courtney."

"Say you so? Why Courtney has been a very lion in battling for the DeLacys."

"You will find his nephew a lion and a tiger in one person. Would you believe it, Courtney himself tacitly acknowledged the master mind and force of his nephew, and has resigned the championship of his dead friend's family into the hands of this nephew, Sir Walter. Sir Richard is simply now the second and supporter."

"Yes, I see. The subtle Courtney over the romantic mind of his nephew, has thrown the spell of friendship which existed between himself and the man whom I hated, living, whom I hate dead. Curse them both!"

"That spell of friendship from Sir Walter Templar's mind, we must break."

"Ha! By Satan I like the shaping of your plot, Wortley. Break the friendship! By the Fiend that's brave! It has been the stumbling-block in my path through life. You shall not lose your fee, my prince of lawyers. I see revenge in your plot. I am almost glad you failed; that is, if in the future we can secure the estate and revenge as well, by some master strategy. Come, unfold your scheme in full, you model of diplomacy."

"First, let me repeat to you the boy's parting words to me: 'Tell your client that, if he ever attempts to take advantage of my friend again, it shall be for the last time. Tell him to look upon Walter Templar as the elder brother of Lord Frederick. Tell him that a day of reckoning will come! When Sir Walter Templar is a man, he will meet Sir Herbert Blakely and exact vengeance for the DeLacys.'"

"You astonish me, Wortley. This is above a boy of fifteen."

"There are uncommon characters who blend the boy and man in one. Such is Courtney's impetuous nephew. I would sooner meet a whole bench of lawyers than that boy. Such characters, whether as boys or men, fight with weapons peculiar to themselves. What could the legal astuteness of a bench of councillors match against a youth who could say, in something like command, to a guardian uncle of Courtney's weight of character, 'Sell my mines in Cornwall and clear the DeLacy lands of this accursed mortgage,' and carry the point too from his own irresistible force of character?

"I repeat, Wortley, you astonish me greatly. But you surely over-estimate this youth."

"Depend upon it that young Sir Walter, when a man, will be a very Satan to you in his antagonism, and will fulfil his oath of vengeance, unless by subtle management we break this power of friendship which has so remarkably existed first between Sir Richard and the man you hated, and now perpetuated in Courtney's nephew and young Lord Frederick."

Lawyer Wortley, at the request of Sir Herbert, elaborated his plot into which Blakely heartily entered. We shall see hereafter the web of that plot and find some of its leadings, but here can simply inform our readers that in after years when Sir Walter and Lord Frederick left England on their continental tour, Sir Herbert and his admirable rascal valet, Snap, followed their track and for four years were looking all over Europe, and even in Russia, for the man who, when a boy, threw down the gauntlet and proclaimed himself the avenger of the DeLacys.

CHAPTER VII

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN.

On through the changes of time to Italy and a period seven years later.

While Sir Walter Templar and Lord Frederick De Lacy have grown from boyhood to young men, time has been ripening a pure and lovely flower in another land of a sunny clime. They have left their native shores to travel on the continent of Europe, designing especially to roam over the classic land of the Italians. So with us away before them to one of the most ravishing pastoral spots of Italy, where was born Terese Ben Ammon, fairest of Judah's daughters.

The father of Terese was the son of a Russian Jew, who had been despoiled of his wealth and transported to Siberia for taking part in a conspiracy against the Czar. His relation to the conspiring nobles was, as might be expected, simply that which his wealth formed; but his knowledge of the conspiracy and his loans to its chiefs, were grounds enough for his ruin and banishment.

The parents of Terese fled to Italy; and had her father lived, not unlikely he would have been followed by the destiny of his race, which, thought has made them a hiss and a by-word in every land, has recompensed them by pouring into their laps the wealth of the nations; but he was cut off from life before the birth of his child.

The death of her father fell upon Terese's mother as a crowning calamity of the series of cruel and sudden disasters which had attended her and her husband thus early in life. They were cousins, children of a brother and sister; and thus the thunderbolts of the Czar's vengeance smote her whole family at once.

The following brief history of the family of our heroine will not be found out of place in the progress of our story, for we may meet characters and circumstances related thereto.

Rachel, the mother of Terese, had been reared by her uncle Isaac; and was the child of his sister Judith, who had married a young man of her tribe, and followed his adventurous footsteps to England. Her brother Isaac had found a pet in litt[l] Rachel, whom he desired to be his son's wife when they should be grown to man and womanhood. A large family were being born unto Judith; and as her brother Isaac was rich, while her husband was but an adventurer, seeking his fortunes in England, whither he was bound, she willingly left her little Rachel to be brought up by her brother as his own daughter and destined wife of his son. After his sister and her husband Levi left their native land, Isaac Ben Ammon lost nearly all traces of them; and he knew but little more than what his mind conjectured from probable circumstances. Levi had an uncle in England from whom he expected advancement, but perchance, as Isaac Ben Ammon fancied, disappointment met him there, and his uncle, who was an immensely rich money-lender, had not been found very liberal in helping him along in the world. The brother of Judith was somewhat acquainted with Levi's uncle, and knew his nature to be hard and groveling, and his disposition dry and miserly. Levi too might have been overtaken with death and Judith have found a grave with him, leaving their children to the hard heart of this uncle and the cold charity of the world. Some years after their arrival in London, an epidemic broke out and carried off thousands, and in some of the districts where the poor Jews dwelt, herding together in misery and contagious filthiness, the epidemic had swept heaps of them away: his sister and her husband might have been among them. Thus would Isaac Ben Ammon speculate upon the buried history of Levi and Judith since they left Russia, while the tide of fortune bore his barque prosperously onward.

Rachel, Terese's mother, grew up to womanhood, and Isaac Ben Ammon's son loved her and, to the great delight of the father's heart, the lovers were married, and, on the day of his marriage, Benjamin was presented by his father with a deed of full partnership with him. A bright prospect was before them, and the first months of their married life sped away, alas too soon—alas too hopeful and happy for the dark sequel which ere long followed quick and terrible upon them.

Isaac Ben Ammon had been induced to advance large loans of money to the Russian nobles who formed a conspiracy against the Emperor Alexander, and into this he had been mainly drawn by the fact that secretly Prince Nicholas was himself the soul thereof.

His son Benjamin had no sympathy with the conspiracy, and tried to dissuade his sire from it, for the youth was more captivated with the bliss of his fresh days of matrimony and the promise of joy which his gentle bride gave to the proud heart of the prospective young father. But Isaac Ben Ammon was surrounded with difficulties and dangers on either side of the conspiracy. If he engaged in it, he foresaw that Alexander's vengeance might reach him, but "Prince Nicholas" had already shown enough of his imperious character to suggest that, should he ever become Emperor of Russia, more terrible still might be his wrath. Isaac also hoped that should harm befall him in aiding the cause of Nicholas, the Prince would shield as much as possible his friends and deliver them on his ascension to the imperial throne.

Like conspiracies generally, was the one in which Isaac Ben Ammon embarked the principal portion of his wealth; and the feared vengeance of the Czar fell upon him. From policy, Alexander aimed not to implicate his brother Nicholas, but there had to be victims to appease imperial wrath, and Terese's grandfather was one of them: Benjamin, his son, being partner in business, with him was cast into prison and subjected to the dreadful torture of the "knout;" but as it was afterwards proven that he had sought to dissuade his father from loaning means to the conspiring nobles, the youth was released and allowed to flee to Italy with his young wife, while Isaac Ben Ammon was banished to Siberia.

The mother of Terese was an ideal "daughter of Zion," whose pious aspirations were more for the return of the captivity than the material prosperity of the royal house of Judah among the nations. Much of this had been impressed upon her sensitive mind by her uncle Isaac, whose fervent dream was the restoration of his nation. Indeed, this had greatly induced him to loan his wealth to Nicholas and his partisans in prospect that, should the prince become Emperor, he would follow out the daring programme of Peter the Great, break up the empire of Turkey and make himself champion of the Holy Places. These sanguine hopes of Isaac, of his nation's redemption, his son and his young wife shared, but not in those political aspects which made him a conspirator. When, therefore, the calamity came, and Benjamin was hurried from her side one terrible night as she lay pillowed on his breast, lulled with the blissful visions of a young wife, and all oblivious of the dark looming future, and she awoke in a phrenzy of despair to find stern officers tearing from her arms her youthful husband, to bear him to a prison, it seemed that the curse of her race had fallen again. The re-action upon her delicate organism threatened her life; and the lashes of the murderous "knout" which lacerated her beloved Benjamin fell in her imagination and heart as cruelly upon herself. Her writhing of agony and shrieks during the execution upon her husband were fully as palpable torture as though every lash of the "knout" that cut into his body tore the blood-dripping flesh from hers; and when he was restored to her arms to nurse with her woman's love and tenderness, and they were flying from the dreadful land which they could no longer endure, still the torturing fancies would pursue her—still often in hideous dreams would they suffer the horrors of the "knout" again. In their flight from the cruel realities and the pursuing phantoms of memory, they found a beautiful village in Sicily which seemed to them reposing peacefully in the lap of surrounding mountains; and here our heroine first saw the light of day. The dying exiles—for they were dying—could have found no spot in Italy more tempting to hide from the fancies of a pursuing vengeance, and no spot more pregnant with promise of a peaceful sleep in the grave to which they felt they were going together—not separated even in death with the hope of their young hearts that eternity would only unite them closer in everlasting companionship in that better world to come. The barbarous mode of Russian vengeance upon his scarcely matured system had been murderous, and Benjamin soon passed away from earth, and Rachel followed him ere scarce his spirit had fled, and they were laid together to sleep peacefully in one grave. But the Jewess mother lived long enough to give birth to Terese, and to place her with a mother's kiss and blessing into the arms of a kind Sicilian peasant, with pleadings from her quivering lips that she would be a mother to the little one; and then taking the new-born infant from the good foster-mother's arms, she laid it upon her own breast and died.

Terese—for such the orphan Jewess was Christened by the foster-mother—grew up, under the kind woman's care, a beautiful, interesting child. Her physical system was strong and healthy, and the promise of life that the young girl gave in a few years was more than ordinary, for she bid fair to develop into a woman of rare physical perfection with fine endowments of intellect and genius. Indeed, while the sufferings of her parents had not marred the physical constitution of our heroine, the sensitive nature of her mother and the transitions of her sympathetic being in all the scenes and tortures of her beloved Benjamin, with their connecting fancies, and at last their sad but peaceful decline to the grave, very deeply marked the mind and character of the Hebrew Maiden. She possessed that tender dreamy nature so often seen in orphan children. "Left alone" is their first realization, and in females that consciousness often engenders the orphan interestingness that surrounds them; whereas, in the strong types of man, it gives a rugged, robust, self-reliant character. Yet, even in the most self-supportive natures, there is a voice of yearning heard. How many a strong-natured man is melted by his longing for the mother he never knew. What wonder then that, in the gentle sex, an orphaned life creates in the heart a great cry of nature, asking for father, mother, brother, sister, kin,—and then as the rose-bud opens into bloom of maturity, love's pleadings for her mate.

Terese Ben Ammon grew up the pet and darling of her foster-brothers and sisters; and, by the sweetness of her disposition, together with the sad history of her parents and the circumstances of her life, she became a favorite with the villagers who were ever ready with kindness and sympathy for the beautiful Hebrew Maiden. Even the girls were fain to forego their usual jealousy towards their own sex so far as Terese was concerned; and by common consent, the orphan Jewess was the queen of the village maidens,—of course the boys were always but too eager to do battle for her, especially foster-brother Beppo.

Beppo was a true Italian, with all their passionate nature and jealousy, and he was fonder of his foster-sister than of all the world beside. Between him and nearly every one of the village boys, there were constant and fiery quarrels over Terese Ben Ammon. In his exclusive devotion to her, no one but foster-brother possessed any claims to be her champion, a point which he frequently maintained by physical force; and there was only one view which reconciled him to anybody but himself doing aught for Terese, and that was the loss it would be to her, for the boy would quarrel with the moon if she had wanted it and the moon had refused to come at her bidding.

The Hebrew Maiden had often to extinguish the fire of her foster-brother and reconcile him to his companions with whom he would always quarrel upon the least appearance of trespass upon his rights where Terese was concerned; but he trembled at the lightest rebuke from her. When he had given any serious cause of offence or pain by his jealous fondness for her, he would indulge in passionate grief and moody self-reproaches, and sometimes even hide himself for days in the neighboring mountains.

Terese Ben Ammon has reached the age of sixteen; and her faithful foster-mother is now also dead. Most of the children are grown up men and women, and have gone into the world as wives and husbands to begin life upon their own account; but foster-brother Beppo and Tereso remain in the old homestead with two of the younger ones of the Sicilian peasant's family. Beppo was twenty-two, but he never thought of marrying and setting up in the world for himself like the rest of the young people. What would become of his pet Terese, whom the boy had nursed almost from babyhood, and for whose dear sake he had so often kicked and pounded the rest of the urchins of the family when they sought to take her from his arms, accompanied by a chorus of howls and squalling from the bigger ones and the fainter cries from the little angel who was the innocent cause of these periodical family broils? Ah! what would become of Terese, if Beppo left her, was the question the young fellow was constantly asking himself and as constantly deciding according to his foregone conclusion that she could not possibly get along without him. It was wonderful, too, how often he deemed it necessary for her to give her endorsement of his view of the case. Oh! no; she could not possibly do without brother Beppo, and yet half jealously the young man daily tormented her with the subject as though he felt that every coming to-morrow might change her mind. The fact was that the foster-brother was more conscious of the development of the beautiful Jewess to womanhood than she was herself, and every fresh marriage of the young folks of the village crowded him with the perplexities growing up around himself and his foster sister. He was divided between his proud delight at seeing her blooming into lovely womanhood and the remembrance of his more simple joy when he kissed and romped with her as a child. She would still throw her arms around his neck and kiss him as of old, and with her soothing caresses drive the dark spirit from his passionate jealous heart; but there was now a bashful restraint around Beppo, and he would kiss her forehead with scarcely the touch of his lips as though she had become to him a sacred idol whom it were almost sacrilege to embrace. Ha! that fiery heart within him spoke volumes. He loved the Hebrew Maiden, but it was with a morbid passion, making himself more the despotic slave claiming his mistress as all his own, than the fervent lover adoring an expectant bride. Terese as Beppo's wife had never as yet entered the young Italian's heart; but no one else must be suffered to bear his sanctified foster-sister away from him.

And Tereso Ben Ammon—how with her?—Had she passed through no corresponding changes in nature's transitions from the child to the girl, and thence to that mystic dawning of young-womanhood. There is no period of a woman's life when she more resembles an opening rose than at that age at which our heroine had now arrived. Yes, there had been changes in mind and heart as well as in her blooming physical development. But Terese Ben Ammon was the child still. It was at the green graves of her parents which her pious hands adorned with reverent tributes of flowers, and in the communion she there held with her mother's spirit that seemed to speak audibly to her ear and throb its whispers in the beatings of her own heart, where the Hebrew Maiden revealed the opening era of her life. Here let us leave her awhile kneeling at her parents' grave in her daily devotions and return to other characters of our story.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE YOUNG TRAVELERS.

Once more mellow Summer was languishing to death and ripe September reigned. Nature was infused with a spirit of languid peacefulness, and over the turbulent passions of men, the mesmeric sympathies of the dying year threw a spell of sentiment kindred with itself. The external universe is in communion with mankind; the seasons photograph themselves on our whole being. In an unrestrained fellowship with Nature in pastoral places, man feels her great heart throbbing loud against his; and her changeful dispositions strongly affect his own.

On such a September day, fourteen years before, the dying De Lacy sought the ancestral home of Sir Richard Courtney, to end the peaceful chapter of his mortal life, and be laid in his family sepulchre. Now two young English travelers, fresh from their native land, with light valises, climbed over the brow of the chain of mountains that bounded the romantic vale in Sicily where Terese Ben Ammon was born, and which sixteen years ago her parents found to lay their ashes in.

The youths had not taken the footpath to the village; for full of physical vigor, they had chosen the more rugged romance of the mountain brow, which they reached, well nigh weary, and cast themselves on the cool summit to rest awhile.

"What a panorama of beauty lies stretching out at our feet, in yon valley, Walter," observed the youngest of the Englishmen.

"It is indeed lovely, Fred. I never saw a more Eden-like vale in my life," answered the elder.

"Your uncle's description of Italy which so ravished our fancy was not too richly colored."

"No; language fails to paint the loveliness of the land over which we are traveling."

"How highly wrought and perfect in fine details of beauty Italy seems; does she not, Walter?"

"Even as you say, Fred. In Italy, Nature has lavished herself in luxuriant description. Here never crude in her works, never painting with harsh daubs, which strike the eye at a distance, but give no pleasure when near, for lack of delicacy and detail."

"I'll wager, Walter, that yon pretty village in the vale will be as enchanting when we are near, as now viewed from this mountain brow. What say you to tarry in it for awhile?"

"As you like, Fred. A few weeks spent in rusticating among these Sicilian villagers will be very agreeable."

"So that's settled; a month or two in Sicily, in primitive pastoral simplicity, and in yon Eden! I like the prospect, Walter, amazingly. We can take our tours through the country around, and make this our center and stopping place for awhile."

"It will suit my taste exactly. You know my passion is for the study of character; and, as we are newly arrived in Sicily, we must give to the Sicilian peasantry a few months of our associations."

"And I love to study the picturesque and romance of the country, Walter."

"The country, the character and genius of the people bear strong resemblance to each other," observed the elder with enthusiasm. "There is an infinite elaboration of beauty, a boundless essence of passion, and a gorgeous expression in the nature of the Italians and their land. I know not why, excepting from instinctive sympathy, but Italy fearfully stirs my whole being, and makes me literally palpitate."

"So it does me," returned his light-hearted companion, "but it is with pleasure. There is an effervescence of delightful sensations flowing over me, at every breath I inhale."

"Italy fills me with the same pleasing emotions, Fred; but there is a dark, deep undercurrent, into which I seem to be gazing within myself to see my own face. I feel how much I am Italy embodied."

"That character in you, Walter, has impressed me from my childhood. You are so unlike my unmixed Saxon self, for you know that my mother was a fair daughter of that race. I have more of the ancient English than the Norman nature in me."

"And I seem more a child of Italy than an Englishman. There is a fascination in the very thought of its terrible volcanoes, a well of passion sounded by the plummet of every passionate soul I meet, and an intense sympathy with the character and genius of the people."

"Perhaps some of your race were Italian."

"Very possible. In my own land my nature slumbered; poetry and sentiment were my dream, intellectual studies and the fine arts the luxuries of education and my social position; but in Italy they storm in me as a passion."

"Why, Walter, you were always impetuous and overwhelming. Good gracious! I have seen you like the raging sea, or a young volcano. Nay, nay, you were never the plastic wax old fellow: I trow more the seal to stamp it. Why, didn't even your uncle place you in his stead, as though you were his second self, to carry out all his family designs?"

"Yes, but only was I like the raging sea when he has told me of the supplanting of your house,—only the volcano when I have sworn vengeance upon the supplanters,—only felt the intensity of my being in the friendship which existed between my uncle and your father, and how much I was a child of passion when he has wept in yearning remembrance of his departed friend and the early death of his own wife; then I have sobbed myself into repose on his bosom."

"And I, like a silly child, have wept as I looked on, touched by the effect, but not like you stirred so strongly with the cause."

"Excepting in this, Fred, though I felt my nature like the deep sea, beyond my fathom, yet it was calm and unruffled. Proud in the confidence of my uncle Courtney, living within ourselves at school, happy and peaceful in our romantic home circle, which blended our three families, and looking forward to my great joy in redeeming, at our marriage with my cousins, your inheritance, my brother, all was deep within me, but not agitated to the bottom and upheaving as now."

"Why, Walter, what cause have we found to stir you thus?"

"No perceptible cause. But here in Italy, I feel such a travail of nature in my being that the past in my life seems but the prologue—a sleep with the dreams and foreshadowings of the drama to come. Now is the awaking, and throughout my whole nature the destiny of my life, startled from its slumbers, seems to be pulsating its first moments."

"Almost with terror, I have witnessed the awful intensity of your character when a boy," said the younger, gravely; "but what have we met to stir you in Italy?"

"Italy herself, Fred. Have I not said, I feel myself her child, and less the son of my cold native land. England is my father, but Italy my mother; and now that I am here in her embrace, her life and nature palpitate in me. In fancy, I throw myself into the fiery bowels of her volcanoes, and proudly defy them with my immortality. Were I to find cause great enough to make me weep, now, as when a boy, not as other boys with a petty cry, but here on this mountain's brow, I could cast myself as of old into my uncle's arms till nature was exhausted."

"Come, come, old fellow, no giving way to a bilious fit of mind. You are growing morbid, Walter."

"Perhaps; and superstitious as well, for I feel as though we were meeting some fate in my life."

"Of course we are, my dear fellow. Ha! look at yonder village maiden who has just emerged from the avenue of shade trees, by that nook in the valley on the side near us."

"I see her, and by a cross-cut towards the same place, her peasant swain is making."

"Plague take the fellow! I had just galloped down the skeleton of a romance growing out of that young maiden when that common-place fellow appeared and broke the enchantment."

"Your effervescence will not lighten me to-day, Fred. I do not forget, my brother, that this is the 15th of September."

"God forgive me, Walter; and I had! Yes, I his son had forgotten that on this day fourteen years ago my dear father sought your good uncle's home to die. God forgive me. 'Twould have been a reproach, had another's lips than yours reminded me of it. I understand now your mood. You had found the cause. 'Twas the remembrance of the death-day of your uncle's friend. God forgive me that I forgot it."

"I did not design my remembrance as a reproach, Fred, for no one could deserve it less. You need not be ashamed of your started tear, my brother, as a tribute to the memory of your father, but no gall should be mixed in it, that you sought to relieve my shades. At other times your lightness is a pleasing relief to my thoughts; but I cannot bear it to-day."

"My father's spirit forgive me!"

"Come, Fred, my brother, let us descend to the vale and find some peasant's home for the night."

And the young travelers arose, took up their valises, and descended the mountain towards the village birth-place of Terese Ben Ammon.

The village maiden, seen emerging from the avenue of shade trees, was Terese, and that nook in the vale was the sacred spot where slept the remains of the parents of the orphan maiden. It was the spot that Rachel and her young husband had chosen. Being Hebrews, they preferred to be laid by themselves, and not in a Christian burying ground, nor was the good pastor, Father Baldiconi, less sectarian than they, and though the benevolent priest extended to them a Christian's sympathy, because of their youth and sufferings, it was a great relief to him to obtain for them this pretty retired spot of unconsecrated ground. Young Benjamin purchased it from the relics of his broken fortunes; and there the Hebrew father and mother were sleeping together in peace after their short sad life.

Towards this family burying place bent Terese Ben Ammon, and the village swain noticed by Walter Templar, was her foster brother, Beppo.

THE SALT LAKE CITY DIRECTORY.—We draw the attention of our readers to the advertisement of THE SALT LAKE CITY DIRECTORY, a work needed in this community, and now presented in a very complete form to the public through the labors of E. L. Sloan, Esq., of this city. The proposed naming of the streets by the city fathers will make such a work still more useful. Merchants, bankers, professional men, and tradesmen, should have a copy of this work. We all need it. The price of it is sufficiently low for all to purchase a copy. Travelers will find it a reliable book of reference.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

N. P. WILLIS.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of.

Dr. CADY'S CATARRH REMEDY.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

THERE'S A DEEP AND SURGING RIVER.

BY BELLE EVELYN.

There's a deep and surging river
Running o'er the sands of time,
The music of whose flowing
Has a soft and mellow chime:
But beneath the rippling wavelets
Is an undercurrent strong,
That throbs with restless struggles
As it swiftly rolls along.

You may float upon its surface,
And watch the shining spray
That flashes in the sunlight,
As it softly glides away;
Or gather tangled mosses,
And flowerets fresh and fair,
That bloom along its margin,
And shed their fragrance there.

But I'd rather hear the whispers
Of the waves that are below,
And catch the murmured music
Of its stronger, deeper flow,
As it rolls in quiet grandeur,
And a "harmony" sublime,
Beyond the narrow circles
That bound the sands of time.

LINKED TO A STAR.

In making public the great sorrow of my life, I will speak briefly and plainly. No amplification, no graces of writing that I possess, can move the reader's compassion, if this unadorned narrative fails to. If any one asks why I come before the world with my sad story, I answer that I desire the world's sympathy. It relieves me to unbosom myself to the widest audience that will give me a hearing.

Once and for all, I do not believe in the supernatural explanation which some excellent people—most of them ladies—who personally knew of the occurrences here set down, attach to them. I hold them to be coincidences only. But upon me they have had an effect as controlling as if the Deity had made to me a special revelation! This is my candid statement, as I look back to the mysterious events, across the dreary interval of two and a half years.

I am, and have been, for a long time, head book-keeper in a great dry-goods house in the city—a plain, matter-of-fact man, of whom I will say no more here than that the gray which thickly studs my hair is not a mark of age, but of disappointment and grief.

I live where I was born, in a hallowed old house, about twenty miles up the river. Trains run to and from the city many times a day, so that my home is quite as convenient to business as a residence in town. My mother and two sisters occupy this house with me. It has fair grounds about it and some noble old trees, and commands a distant view of the river. The outlook from the roof is very fine. You can see for miles in every direction. At night, owing to the high altitude and the purity of the air, such an expanse of dark-blue sky, fretted with myriads of golden fires, overhangs us, as I have never seen save out upon the Sound.

Among my father's effects was a six-foot achromatic telescope of Fraunhofer's make—an old instrument which had strayed across the Atlantic after a life of unknown vicissitudes, and got into an auction shop in the city, where my father chanced to see it, and bought it to look at remote objects with, principally at sails far up and down the river. Its performance, for a land telescope, was unequalled by any instrument I have ever seen. Names of schooners, sloops, and barges, could easily be made out, eight to ten miles off. But it was in astronomical observations that I, as a boy and man, tested its remarkable powers most thoroughly, and derived the greatest pleasure from its use. The possession of this glass made of me an amateur astronomer. Other people find a hobby in chess, or billiards, or Shakespeare, or philosophy, or a hot-house. My amusement, on returning from the dull mechanics of book-keeping every night to my country home, was to bring out the battered brass-and-leather tube as soon as dark set in, and con the heavens. I rebuilt the cupola of our house into a sort of an astronomical observatory, by heightening and widening it so as to allow the free swing of my long telescope, and putting on a light movable roof, which could be slid off and back again by the pull of a cord. The sides were a mass of windows, so contrived that I could lower them at pleasure into the roof beneath me, out of the way. In this airy loft, long after the other members of my family had gone to bed, have I spent hours that spun by like minutes, so lost was I in the ecstatic contemplation of celestial wonders. Many a night have I watched in the morning-star, and made up for loss of sleep by naps in the cars. Occasionally I have been found nodding on my high stool in the office, and then there were sly jokes about where I had been the night before. I never let out the secret of my observatory but to a few of my most intimate city acquaintances; for there was a general disposition, I soon discovered, to make fun of my innocent nocturnal pursuits. Several of my dearest friends called me "highly eccentric;" and one, whose good opinion I greatly valued, did not hesitate to pronounce me "moonstruck."

For two years previous to May, 1866—memorable year and month in my history—I had been engaged to Milly Estwick, the only daughter of a neighbor of ours. From childhood we had known and loved each other. Ours was the first love, which sometimes is the true love, the love that outlasts all. She was a handsome girl, sweetly disposed, and, in quiet, simple, home-loving tastes, much resembled me. We should have married soon after I put the golden pledge upon her dear hand, but for the delicate state of her health. She was a slender creature, having in excess that spiritual organization so often found in American girls. Manlike, I was anxious to wed at once, and be off on a journey for her health and pleasure. Womanlike, she preferred to wait.

Much of our courtship was carried on in the open air, beneath the pavillion of stars. It was the poetry of heaven that moved me first to the point of proposing; and the eternal, countless eyes above us witnessed the sweet registry of our mutual vows. Many a pleasant summer evening, after our betrothal, would she sit with me for hours in my observatory, and watch for transient meteors, or look through the telescope at objects which I would select, the moons of Jupiter, Saturn's ring and satellites, binary stars, nebulæ, and the like. The glass was mounted on an ingenious frame, of my own contrivance, and while we sat side by side, very close, in our easy-chairs, I could turn the instrument, with the merest finger-touch, to any quarter of the skies. For both of us it was heaven above and heaven below.

Milly took but little interest in astronomy as a science. She said it made her head ache to think of the stupendous size and vast distances of the heavenly orbs. She feared too, to detach her mind from thoughts of the pleasant earth, where she had so many devoted friends, whose love and tenderness were but the reflex of her own soft and loving nature. The stars appealed somewhat to her religious sensibilities. But she admired them most—let me say it at once—for the same reason that swayed the minds of the wisest and the best in the olden times, and even now has not been banished, and perhaps never will be, by the decrees of knowledge. She believed the stars had some influence on mortal affairs. She thought they might be the homes of our future lives. This notion, so poetical and beautiful, although I thought it absurd, I did not try to laugh out of her. Nor to disprove it—as how could I have done? No! I loved her all the more for her childish superstitions.

On the night of May 11th, 1866, Milly and I were up in the cupola. My mother and sisters had been with us the greater part of the evening, but had withdrawn to the parlor, on some plausible pretext or other, but really, I dare say, to leave Milly and me together. Since we were engaged, they had often benevolently done this.

The night was mild and beautiful. A south wind brought to us the odor of blossoms. The first wood-crickets of the season chirped on every side. There was no moon; but the light of a multitude of stars, on the steel-blue ground of sky, made outlines of objects near me quite visible. I could see, or thought I could, the violet of Milly's sweet eyes, the deep chestnut of her hair; the little dimples in her cheeks. She was paler than usual that night. I knew, by her little nervous thrills, that she suffered from some internal pain. But in vain I asked her to join my mother and sisters below. She said she was very comfortable there, and would stay a while longer. We had been roving idly among the stars, and chatting a good deal about ourselves; though there was one topic very near to both of us, which, by common consent, we never alluded to. That was my darling's heart-affection. Neither of us dared to talk of it. We both silently hoped that the dangerous symptoms which it had shown would disappear in good time. That malady was the spectre, as from the grave, that rose between us often in our gayest moments

I folded her shawl more closely about her, for I somehow fancied she was chilled with the night air. Then said I, with a little laugh, and a Claude Melnott-ish air, "Come now, Milly, tell me 'what star shall be our home, when love itself becomes immortal.'"

"Are you in earnest, Albert?" said Milly, more seriously than I had expected.

"Of course, darling. Only let it be one of the first magnitude. No second-class for you and me in cars, hotels, or stars. There are Albebaran, Regulus, Arcturus, Capella, Denebola, Lyra, and plenty more of them. Which, now?"

Milly glanced about the heavens a few moments. Her gaze suddenly became fixed on the beautiful constellation Corona, then looming in the northwestern sky. Her face seemed to light up with a look of decision, as she exclaimed: "There, that's our star!"

Her small white hand indicated the glittering Crown.

We were so used to pointing out stars to each other, that I knew instantly which she meant.

"I see it, dear. The one with the soft white light, changing a little as I look at it to a faint yellow, and perhaps a blue. 'Tis only of a second magnitude. I am disappointed."

"Nevertheless, Albert, 'tis our star. What is its name?"

I looked at the star attentively, taking its bearings from other known stars in the vicinity. "This is very strange, Milly," said I, "but I don't remember ever seeing that star before. 'Tis a fixed star, you see, by its sharp, flickering light; not a planet or a tailless comet. How does it happen, then, after all my studying of the heavens and Herschel's catalogue, till I thought I had both by heart, that I can't name that star?"

"Perhaps it 's a new star," said Milly, still gazing at it intently.

"Impossible." I laughingly replied. "We can't have new stars made for us expressly, you know. Yet it may be new in one sense," I added, more seriously, "that is, a variable star, reäppearing after years of obscuration. I will look at the catalogue when we go down stairs. Meanwhile, we 'll call it new, and we 'll christen it 'Milly.' your star."

"Our star, Albert."

I was about to respond with some pleasant jest, when I marked a deepening pallor, like a faint auroral cloud, pass over her face.

Star and telescope were forgotten in an instant. The phantom rose between us! "Darling," said I, "you are ill. I knew this night air would hurt you. Let us descend."

Her eyes were still fixed, rapt upon the soft, white star. I was obliged to take her gently by the arms, and move her to the trap-door, whence a safe flight of steps led to the attic. She obeyed me silently, like one in a trance; but, to the last, before we had passed through the roof, her backward gaze rested upon that star.

By the time we joined my mother and sisters in the parlor, she was better. "Only a passing faintness," she said. In a little while she recovered her usual spirits; and I accompanied her home to her father's house, which was but a stone's throw from us. As we went into the open air, I rejoiced to see that a fleecy cloud covered the Northern Crown, for I felt there were mysterious reasons why we should not look at that constellation. She glanced up at the sky, but said nothing.

I gave her the parting kiss at her father's door—how sweet it comes back to my memory!—and hastened home, and up to the roof, with a lantern and Herschel's catalogue in hand, to solve the riddle of the star. But clouds had gathered for the night, and after waiting fully three hours for some rift to open, through which I might have glimpses of the Crown and of "Milly" (as I fondly called the unknown), I took in my telescope and went to bed. But long I lay awake, pondering perplexedly, sadly, over the strange incident of the evening.

Next day my thoughts so ran on the star and my betrothed —for the two came into my head together, as if they were inseparable—that I made several mistakes in the ledger. May 12, 1866, is scored with more penknife scratches in my accounts than any other whole month of that year.

At last—how slow time dragged, and how snail-like the cars crept up the Hudson shore!—at last I was at home again. On my way to the house I always called on Milly. That evening (the sun had not yet gone down) she was sitting by an open window, where she often sat, looking right between two great lilac-trees, heavy with pink-white masses, watching for me. I ran to the window to greet her. Ah! how pale, but how beautiful! Her eyes had the introverted look of meditation. They did not seem to see me, but some point in space just short of me.

"You are not well, dear," said she, plaintively.

The very words I would have spoken to her! but I dared not utter them.

"Something has troubled you to-day, Albert. Our star, perhaps," she said, smiling, at the same time looking over the lilac-tops to the sky, where Corona would be in an hour.

I made a poor attempt to laugh. "Not much time to think about stars in town," said I. "The ledger is my only atlas there. One star more or less, where there are millions, is nothing to me, you know; but the mistake of a cent in balancing—that's every thing. I've been very busily engaged to-day."

Then, to change the subject, I handed her a new volume of poetry, that I had bought for her. This effectually diverted her thoughts—or seemed to do so—from the unpleasant subject. I leaned over the window-sill, so that my cheek almost touched hers, and we turned the pages of the book together, glancing at the principal poems. One was headed "Lines to a Star." She paused, as if she were going to read them.

"Let me show you a lovely ode further on," said I, and I thumbed a dozen pages impatiently. Milly looked up and smiled. But I pretended not to understand her. Presently I found what I wanted, and read the poem to her in a low monotone. What it was all about, I know not, at this time. My thoughts, all the while, were only of her and her namesake up in the sky.

The sun was then setting, and Milly, always thoughtful of others, said I must go home to supper, for mother and sisters were waiting for me.

I was less reluctant to leave her than usual, for I burned with a desire to solve that star-problem.

"Let me shut the window for you," said I.

"Oh, no, Albert! Leave it open." Again the skyward glance, as she spoke!

"Then, good-night, good-night, Milly. God bless you!" I kissed her hand, and hurried away, just as the twilight began to gloom softly.

Supper was dispatched mechanically. I chatted at random with mother and sisters. They knew that I was sad about Milly's declining health, and I knew that that made them unhappy. We shunned that subject of all others.

Almost rudely pushing my plate aside, I excused myself and ran up to the observatory. I carefully wiped the glasses of my telescope and placed it in position. In the chair which she was wont to occupy I spread out Herschel's catalogue, its pages open at the Corona constellation. The lantern, newly filled and freshly trimmed, stood by its side, shedding a clear light upon the text. I seated myself, my hand resting on the drawn tube of the instrument and caressing it. I trembled with impatience as I strained my gaze to the northern sky. One by one the brightest stars in that region began to appear. Presently, under my fascinated eyes, the Crown came out, gemming the blue with its brilliant points, and, set in the midst of them, the soft, white star. The moment I could identify it beyond a doubt I turned to Herschel, as to a book of fate.

Good heavens! There was no such star upon the list!

The import of the mystery flashed upon me like the gleam of a meteor. Milly had discovered a new star.

Truly it was ours—ours by right of finding. We were entitled to name it. The star was Milly, as regularly christened as ever child brought to font.

Let me be frank. For the first time in my life a feeling of superstitious awe crept over me. Was there more in the old astrology than credulity and imposture? But I did not allow this unscientific thought to keep ascendant long. I recalled all I knew of stars suddenly appearing, of variable stars, in Ophiucus, in Scorpio, in Cassiopeia, Hercules, and other constellations. I remembered the theories that explained the prodigy, and gradually became calmer. We had made a great discovery; but dozens of other observers might have made it the same night, for aught we knew. Accident only had determined Milly's selection of that particular star. Its light, rather softer and purer than that of other stars in the neighborhood, had guided her choice. I felt proud for Milly and myself, but I laughed outright as I thought of the poor child's simplicity. The idea of a star, billions of miles away, being any earth-born creature's future home! The delicious absurdity of it made me love Milly all the more. "What is the darling doing now, I wonder?"

My blood suddenly chilled in my veins as I thought, "She is at this moment looking at our star."

Mastering with an effort this mysterious and unpleasant fancy, I addressed myself to the scientific examination of the star, so far as I, a mere amateur, was capable of such a task. By this time the night was quite dark, and I now discovered that the star was not so brilliant as it had been the night before. From a full second magnitude, it had dropped at least half-way to a third. My experience in studying stars enabled me to detect this to a certainty. It was strange, but, after all, in accordance with the phenomena of recorded variables. Their brilliancy culminates and wanes in many cases with surprising rapidity. We had first seen it at its maximum; it was now on the decline. The flicker into a yellowish and bluish tint was noticeable, as on the night of the 11th. Some stupendous chemical action going on. Possibly, the burning out of the star! Who knows?

I levelled my telescope at this wonderful object. Like all other fixed stars seen through clear glasses, it became apparently smaller than when viewed by the naked eye—a diamond-point only. But the color coming and going on the white was distinctly visible.

How long I sat at this scrutiny I cannot tell. The voice of sister Hetty from the stairs called me back to earth.

"A note from Mrs. Estwick, Albert."

I seized it as she thrust it through the opening in the roof, tore away the envelope, and read:

"DEAR ALBERT.—Milly wants to see you very much. Come over at once.

Affectionately yours,

S. E.

I presented myself at Mr. Estwick's house as quickly as I could. Milly sat by the window, shut now, where I had left her. Her face was turned toward the northeastern sky. She did not see me as I approached through the darkness. A thick-set figure came out of the house as I was about to enter. I recognized Dr. Plimpton, the family physician.

"How is she, doctor?" I asked, hurriedly.

"Ah! Mr. Chamfield, I'm glad you've come. You'll do her more good than all my medicines. She fainted to-night—though that is nothing new for her, you know—but she came out of it rather weaker than usual. Strange diseases, sir, those affections of the heart. The patients' nervous sensibility and spiritual perception are wonderfully increased. I sometimes think they have the power of looking into the world we call unseen, upon whose threshold they always stand——"

I cut short the doctor's disquisition—"Tell me, can she be saved?" I clasped his honest right hand, as if I would wring a favorable answer from him.

"I hope so; but God only knows. You can save her, if any one can."

Without another word, I rushed into the house, and the good doctor walked off to visit another patient.

"Ah! Albert, I am so glad to see you," Milly said, extending both her hands to me. I clasped and kissed them.

Mr. and Mrs. Estwick, who loved me like their own son, gave me a warm greeting, and, after a few commonplace remarks, left Milly and me together.

The moment we were alone, the dear girl said: "Our star has faded a little from its lustre, last night, and I have faded too." She smiled, and looked up at it. "We are going out together."

I recalled what Dr. Plimpton had just said, and a sense of terror thrilled me. But I conjured up a feeble laugh, and replied: "Oh, no, darling! that's mere fancy. If you had seen the star from my observatory, you would have said it was brighter than on yesterday night."

Heaven pardon me the deception, but what would I not have done for her!

She had watched my eyes closely as I spoke. "Now I know you are just fibbing a little bit," she, smiling, said. "Don't fear to tell me the truth, Albert. Our star is becoming fainter."

I could not lie as I looked into her pure, loving eyes. "Well, Milly, it has dwindled a little, perhaps. But what of it? The star is a variable, which we happen to have seen at its brightest. The light has been waxing up to the degree of last night—its maximum, perhaps—and is now waning. You know, dear, I told you all about this strange kind of stars long ago. We cannot explain the phenomenon, but one thing we may be sure of, it has no influence, good or bad, on the inhabitants of this speck of a planet."

Milly answered not, but only looked out of the window. My eyes followed hers, and I gladly saw that Corona had at last passed from our field of vision.

"Is it really a new star, as you thought, Albert?"

"My catalogue does not give it," said I. "For us it is new, at any rate, though other observers may have seen it the same night that we did, or before it. These astronomical novelties are generally discovered by a number of people in different parts of the world about the same time. I will watch the scientific items in the papers, and see what they say. Till further notice, however, we will call the star 'Milly.'"

I was sorry afterward that I said this, for her eyes shone with strange intensity as I coupled her name with the celestial stranger.

"As you watch this star fading from night to night, you will think of me, Albert, will you not?"

"Surely I will, dearest, and hope and pray that you will become stronger and better. But leave the watching to me, Milly. Promise me that you will not worry any more about this star, will you?"

"I do not worry," she said, with her pleasant smile. "I take a calm, sweet pleasure in looking at it, for I know that you and I are linked to it forever. As long as I can sit at this window, I shall feel more contented and happy to see our star, and feel in my heart and soul that it is ours."

Morbid, incomprehensible fancy! Too deeply rooted in her mind to be disturbed by any arguments that I could ply upon her. Dr. Plimpton's words resounded in my ears. I felt sick at heart.

Thankful was I that, before this subject could be renewed, Mrs. Estwick entered the room. I accepted her appearance as a hint that our interview had lasted long enough, and a few minutes after I withdrew, promising to call morning and night, to see with my own eyes how fast Milly got better—a promise quite unnecessary, for I had called that often for about two years.

Blessed hope, that can cheat us against the conviction of our own senses! For I knew my Milly was dying.

I have no heart to protract this story.

Information which I gathered from many sources in various ways proved that Milly and I were probably the first persons anywhere who took notice of this star.

On the 12th of May, the night following our discovery (if I may so call it), the new star was seen and examined at the Washington Observatory; on the night of the 14th, at Cambridge, Mass. Astronomers in England and Ireland saw it on the 12th, and the next night some French astronomers made record of it. Reports were afloat that it had been seen in Canada and elsewhere during the early part of May, when its brightness was between the third and fourth magnitude; but these reports I am unable to verify. It further appeared that several maps and catalogues of old dates testified to the existence of a small star, below the ninth magnitude, at or near the position occupied by the mysterious object; but there was no evidence to show that the two were identical. While it may have been a star "burning up," as the popular phrase is, the opinion of the majority of astronomers inclines to the belief that it was a variable, seen at its highest effulgence at intervals perhaps of hundreds of years, like the well-known one in Scorpio.

Night after night its lustre steadily and rapidly decreased. On the 14th, it was of the third magnitude, or below it. On the 19th, it was of the fifth.

These changes startled me only as they coincided, in the most remarkable manner, with Milly's declining health. As the star diminished, so the roundness of her fair cheeks fell away, her sweet voice became fainter; only the brightness of her violet eyes seemed undimmed, or even to be heightened, as she faded.

I attended to my dull work in the city as best I could—reaching the end of my labors every night through Heaven knows what tangles of mistakes—and hurried home by the first evening train.

The star being visible up to the night of May 19th to the naked eye, I did not use my telescope upon it. I had no taste for astronomy during those dreadful days. I came at last to curse the star, because of its malign influence upon my fate—though my sober reflection always rejected that supposition as weak and unworthy of me. But, reason as I would, the mournful fact remained that Milly and the star were receding from me together.

Morning and evening I was by her side. She was still able to sit up; and occupied her chair in the old place by the window. The good doctor had reluctantly told me there was no hope for her recovery; that the least excitement, even that attending her removal from room to room, might end her frail life. Her father and mother had not dared to ask of the doctor his final opinion, and they still trusted, with blind confidence, that she would mend in a few days. Milly herself would not talk of her approaching death to them or to me; but I knew by a hundred little signs and tokens, voiceless many of them, that she wished me to be prepared for the event that must come. Knowing that every allusion to the star pained me, because of its intimate association in my mind with her, she had not spoken of it to me for some days. She had seen, with her own eyes, that its radiance was fast being quenched.

On the morning of the 20th, a thought occurred to me from which I derived momentary relief. I had observed, on the night of the 19th, that the star verged so closely on to invisibility that another twenty-four hours would remove it from human sight. The idea possessed me that if she could be kept in ignorance of the disappearance of the star for a day or two after it had taken place, she would then have a clear proof that her life did not depend upon it. I determined to practise a harmless ruse upon her. I would deceive her for her good; perhaps save her life by dispelling what I believed to be a hallucination.

I had taken later trains than usual to town since her serious illness. That morning, when I presented myself at her house about half-past eight o'clock, I found her sitting in her accustomed chair, and looking better. Her parents and even Dr. Plimpton also remarked the improvement; and we all took heart from it.

"Milly," said I, as soon as we were alone, putting on a brazen face for the deceit, "I've good news for you. Your star is brightening. There was a perceptible increase in its lustre between ten and two o'clock last night. And you are brighter too, thank Heaven!"

The effect on the dear girl was not what I had expected. She simply said, "You must not be deceived by appearances."

But I would not listen to anything that would dash the joyous hope which rose within me. "This star has begun to shine out again, and so will you dearest. I know it."

Though decidedly improved to the eye, I noticed that conversation and the exertion of thinking fatigued her that morning to a marked degree. So, after dispensing what I could of my assumed cheerfulness to the patient, and telling her how much better yet I was sure of finding her when I came home that night, I bade her farewell.

We were alone at that sacred moment; and I stooped down and imprinted the kiss of immortal love upon her lips.

"Good-by, Albert," said she pressing my hand, as if desirous to detain me longer. But this she always did.

"Good-by, sweetest!" and so I retired from the room, her violet eyes bending upon me to the last their angelic look.

"Now," thought I, as I walked fast to the station, "if Heaven will but send a storm of three or four days, so that she cannot see the star! At all events, on one pretext or another—and love will find many for me—she must be kept from seeing it. All the time, if the nights are clear, I will make her believe that I have watched it, and that it is flaming out more and more. Then, after her health has improved a little, I will frankly acknowledge the deceit, and so explode forever the deadly illusion that haunts her."

Such was my poor plan; and the elaboration of it, in all its parts, cheered my drooping spirits at the desk, where I went through my appointed work like an automatic adding-machine.

The sky was clear when I reached the little village that night. I almost ran from the station to Mr. Estwick's, turning over and over, as I dashed along, the various plans by which she might be kept from gazing at the star, and made to believe my pious frauds about it.

She was not at the window. That was ominous. And, through the panes, I could see a group of persons standing still together. She was worse—perhaps actually dying!

The dread doubt was solved in a moment as I knelt upon the floor by the sofa where she lay, cold and beautiful. Dead, dead!

I remember how all my manhood snapped like a thread under the awful tension; and how I wept as if my heart would literally break. I recall the well-meant condolences of relatives and friends, who stood about, addressed to me, and that each effort to soothe me touched a new fountain of tears. The last words of the poor child were "Albert," and "our star." She had died about five o'clock, suddenly and tranquilly—thank God for that! Her death had been, the doctor said, "A fading out, natural and painless."

The torrent of my grief finally spent itself, and I could look upon the face once so full of the fresh beauty of life—so lovely even in death—with something like composure. Years of my future would drag heavily; but they would end at last, and then we would be reünited in that world where there is no more death, nor any sickness, nor any sorrow!

In our star! I arose upon an impulse and walked to the window. Darkness spread from point to point of the Northern Crown, like a pall hung upon golden nails. Our star was no longer visible!

"I know that you and I are linked to it forever!"

Such were her very words. Were they prophetic? Or were these strange events only coincidences? To me it matters not. Explain them how I may, I feel that I am, from the very necessity of the case, linked to a star—a star now utterly withdrawn beyond the reaches of my telescope as of my mortal eyes. I cannot turn my glass to the sky at hours when that constellation is visible, without seeking the Crown and peering through it into the vast recesses beyond, in the faint hope that I may see the returning wanderer, my MILLY. Never again may that star shine on me in this fleshy tabernacle of mine; but the time will come—and this it is that cheers and sustains me—when, by my reünion with her, this burden of life shall be lifted; this mystery solved.

WHICH IS THE SUPERIOR SEX?

[BEING NO. 3 OF "OUR WOMAN'S PLATFORM."]

The question as to which of the sexes is superior to the other, is, to our mind, a most absurd one. As well ask which is the divinest, Rain or Sunshine. God is enshrined and manifested in His numerous qualities in both sexes. It takes both of the sexes to display Him fully. Man possesses one portion of His qualities, Woman another. Each sex possesses characteristics that are a relief to the other, and which, by their opposite natures, serve to produce the life, the variety and the charms of existence. The delicacy and the grace of woman are "God manifested in the flesh;" the rugged sternness and strength of the man is God—as much and no more—disclosing another phase of His wondrous forms of life and action. The two sexes may be said to represent the two halves of Deity. Together they represent the whole—apart, neither represent Him fully.

The doctrine which we hold on the question of superiority may be very briefly summed up. We believe that both sexes are superior in their own sphere, and both are inferior out of it. In relation to the marriage life, we consider that there are certain duties and responsibilities specially suited to each sex, not because of any superiority of nature on either side, but because of special capabilities existing with each. We hold that, in married life, both sexes should waive their claim to absolute independence, and come together to act in accordance with the truest instincts of their natures, without any reference to the question as to who becomes the most exalted thereby. They come together to respond to the calls of love and attraction, not ambition; and, if great nature works harmoniously in both, leads woman to entrust, and man to accept, certain responsibilities—as she has done ever since the world began;—what trash to talk about superiority of position. Superiority of adaptation for certain duties may exist in man or woman, but nothing else.

We hold that men and women, in their marriage, never come together specially to govern or to be governed; they unite to gratify their love and share the blessings of those qualities reserved to each sex for the blessing of the other; but although this is true, out of their union grows all the necessities of a government on a small scale. As men and women, in the abstract, they are equal. Married or otherwise, in all that relates to judging for themselves respecting what is true, beautiful, or good, woman is for ever independent of man. She need accept no more than every instinct her soul responds to. Not for the sake of "authority"—not for the sake of exalting one sex above the other—but, for the sake of order and harmony, a deciding power; but in reference to their married and parental relation, husband and wife are no longer abstract man and woman. An organization has been formed; they sustain certain relations to each other and their children; and the thousand multiplied and complicated interests growing therefrom, require—not anybody's superiority—not big swelling authority—but order and system. After the best light has been obtained from either side, a variation of opinion may exist, while circumstances require that decisive action be taken. Here then, love, peace, affection, require that for order and harmony's sake, a deciding power should exist, which must be invested somewhere. Ever since the creation, woman, when taught only by her own heart, has invested this power in man, and man has accepted it. Her wisdom in conceding so much, and man's right in accepting, are based on the fact that all the instincts of her nature point that way. Man's right does not consist in any superiority of nature, but in the fact of a superior fitness for that particular work. All the instincts of a provider, protector, and statesman are born in man; he intuitively yearns, from his boyhood up, for objects upon which to expend his administrative qualities—not so with woman,—she has a sensitive love for humanity often keener than man's; but—saving exceptional cases—she desires to concentrate her cares upon her offspring, while for them and herself, she again desires a superior protector. The administrative quality does not prevail in her. All the manifestations of her being are of the delicate order: grace, skill and refinement are her joys. Strength, force and massiveness—the proper qualities to lean upon—are not hers, while they are man's. The difference between men and women is not a question of judgment or intellect; it is a question of strength. Woman can see the necessary course sometimes clearer than man, but she wants man to go ahead and carry her own conceptions into execution. Hence by his own instincts, and woman's allotment, he is, and must be, the executive of the family. As we have said, a true marriage compact, can bring no control of the husband between God and a woman's soul. Neither should it step between her and any intellectual conception or judgment. It does not abate the value of her opinion, nor declare her inferior in the least degree; it simply allots to man the right to decide upon certain points, because the responsibility, the labor, and the care, are, by the nature of both sexes, imposed upon him. While we believe that woman, by all the forces of her nature, is led to allot to man the dignified trust of protector and guide, we hold that these instincts do not prove any man's fitness for the task, or his suitability at any period of his career. They only prove what nature ultimately intends man to be. Nature often does things by anticipation. She filled this earth with gold and silver, ages before there was any man in existence to use it; and she has embedded this golden faith respecting man in woman's bosom, pointing to that condition of man's nature, when, by the possession of qualities responding to the confidence bestowed, he shall be entitled to so divine a trust.

Music.

CORRESPONDENCE.

May 12th, 1869.

Editor Musical Department—Dear Sir: Having received the first number of Volume III, Utah Magazine, I must say that it appears very plain that the management intends to spare neither pains nor expense in making it a first-class periodical. Knowing that you invite correspondence on musical subjects, and also knowing that your space is valuable, I will be as concise as possible.

I understand that it is your intention to insert a piece of music in every other number; I think you will find that there is home talent enough to warrant you in publishing a piece in every number. The choirs of this Territory, as a rule, have about one or two copies of the same psalmody to serve from ten to thirty members; the consequence is, the ever tedious and tiresome operation of copying has to be resorted to, which few know anything about save the leader. Now I think that if you were to publish a sacred piece one week, and a secular subject the next, you would not only add variety and interest to your department, but you would be the means of placing in the hands of choirs a sufficient number of copies of the music of Zion as to enable the leaders to dispense with a great deal of copying. One and all will be in favor of that idea.

And now, if you will bear with me a little longer, I will tell you the light in which I regard the musical portion of your paper. If properly managed—by encouragement, etc.—it will be the means of bringing out the talent that is at present lying latent for want of a stimulus in the shape of publication, and it will kindle the fire of genius that is in our midst to a greater extent than some people suppose. The development of the "divine art" in this Territory is, I believe, your object in adding a sheet of music composed mostly (I hope wholly) by home musicians, to your paper.

Brethren, you have set out in a very praiseworthy cause, and I hope that every musician and member of a choir will show that they appreciate the movement by patronizing a paper that is striving to please them. I would advise every leader of a choir to get up clubs, if it was only for the music department. * * * * Can you not get up a series of prizes for the best compositions, as they do in England. If anything will add interest to your paper it is this. Think about it.

Remain yours, etc.,

A. C. SMYTH.

It is our intention, as far as possible, to publish the compositions of our home musicians in preference to all others. The arrangement of alternate secular and sacred pieces is exactly what we desire; but there is great difficulty in getting in music as we need it at present. By-and-by we shall have a stock from which we can select. As to publishing music every week, that is desirable enough, but our correspondent is scarcely aware of the time taken and expense incurred in the setting of music under disadvantages.

In relation to the subject of prizes, we have it already in consideration. As soon as our plans are matured, we expect not only to give prizes for music, but for original stories, poetry, etc., and in fact do everything that will tend to develop home talent. It is our anticipation that the compositions published in the MAGAZINE will yet form a choice stock from which the proper parties can select a Psalmody for the people of Utah.

The Drama.

WE propose to re-view the works of Shakspeare, in the MAGAZINE, fragments of which will appear from time to time. We will open with Shakspeare's SUPERNATURAL CHARACTERS.—The subject of supernatural beings manifesting themselves in human affairs is most fascinating to genius. In the grand epic poems of the ancients, the human and superhuman divide the field; Milton made the action of his celestial and infernal powers the very body of his immortal poem; and even our atheistic Shelleys and Byrons can not keep out of the charmed circle. The subject of the metaphysical agencies of the world—the good and evil—incarnating themselves in the action of human life, gives to the poet at once such a vast field for his capacities, and such a unique character to his work. Hence it is a favorite with genius; but it requires the greatest masters to handle it, or it will fall into contempt. And it is vastly more difficult to give the supernatural an extensive treatment in an acting drama than it is in the epic poem.

Shakspeare in several of his plays, such as Hamlet, trod on the boundaries of the metaphysical world and introduced a ghost. He also in the "Tempest" still made further inroads upon it, and introduced the magician Prospero, with his familiar spirit Ariel, and others of the spirit class; but this was only a drama of magic on an uninhabited island. Even Shakspeare did not fully succeed in reaching the great epic theme of supernatural powers manifesting themselves in the affairs of nations, until he embodied them in his play of Macbeth, which as a dramatic composition is his masterpiece.

Mankind ever has been, and ever will be, deeply interested in the real or fancied visitations of beings spiritual, whose existence is prophetic of our hereafter life, and whose continuation in the drama of mortals foreshadows our own continuation. Nor does the evil quality of the superhuman lessen the intensity of the interest, for wicked and direful plays are ever performed in real life, and it is a certain explanation, aye even satisfaction, to believe them to be inspired and worked up by evil spirits, who are taking part with us and managing the issues against human good. The Arch Tempter ever has been, and ever will be, a potent center of interest and terror, not because he was once as a god in light, and now "archangel fallen," but because he was cast down into the very heart of human affairs, and is the great Tempter with his agents leading mankind to their perdition. As long as this state remains, he will share the dominion of the world with God, and be even a personage of more fascinating interest, for the dark and terrible in life is always the most bewitching. In Milton, Satan is the hero, and his wing is broader to overshadow us, because it has night as its fringing. So it is in the great drama of practical life. It was not Milton's design to make Satan his hero; but splendid genius finds its greatest triumphs on the dark sides of Nature. Thus with Shakspeare, and in showing us, with all the strength of his matchless genius, a soul, big in its twinship of good and evil, drawn by this fascination native in us, intensified by the potency of fiends, into the whirlpool of a drama worked up around him by infernal powers, he enters deeply into our human sympathies. In much we are all Macbeths, and like him we have not only to fight against ourselves, but the fiends also, and upon their own ground. The sun-tipt Michael himself can not hold the field on earth, though he did in heaven, against the Power of Darkness. Jude tells us that when these two great archangels were contending over the body of Moses, Michael was in himself worsted, and he dared not bring a railing accusation against his sable antagonist, but resigned the field of strife with "the Lord rebuke thee, Satan." How would it have stood had it been Macbeth, instead of Moses, that Michael and Satan were contending for? There is suggestiveness here that brings the interest directly home to ourselves; and hence Shakspeare in his Macbeth seizes strongly hold of our theological faith and our superstitions fears. As we are not chiefly interested in "Archangel Fallen" because he was once as a god in light, neither are we in Shakspeare's superhuman beings because they melt into thin air, but that, like the Arch Tempter, they are concerned with us and are working themselves out through our dramas. Herein was Shakspeare most happy in choosing a supernatural subject having so much reference to all mankind, and in creating beings like the souls of the weird dead, who when in life were potent enough to call up by their charms the spirit of a Samuel. Macbeth is Shakspeare's Saul, who, finding himself outside the circle of the Power of Good, seeks unto his Witches of Endor to know his destiny, and they call up spirits, not like the faithful Samuel, who will rebuke him, but those who will

MR. CHARLES WHEATLEIGH.—This popular comedian and character delineator has been engaged for a limited number of nights, and he made his debut here in the eccentric play of "Sam." The signature character is not nearly so much a type as that of Lord Dundreary, to which it is professedly a complement:—indeed Sam is no type at all. Lord Dundreary is a unique burlesque of the English peerage, "played out" in its manly and intellectual constitution, which characterizes the Norman-Saxon race, and which so strongly marked the old English barons. The very contrast between Lord Dundreary and Arthur Wellesly—the Iron Duke who beat all the marshals of Napoleon, who were of republican and plebian origin, closing with the lion of the world himself—is certainly "taking," and it "took" even more in England than in America, because it was a unique burlesque. But we should be pleased to learn, for our ethnological satisfaction, what precise individuality or nationality "Sam" types. He is certainly not a genuine English noodle of the aristocratic species, and he is as certainly not an "American cousin" or brother. He is a mongrel at best. Yet Mr. Wheatleigh played Sam admirably, and his grace and professional ease is a fine example of polish and artistic caste.

REFLECTIONS.

In life's early morn, the spring time of youth,
When the bright star of hope illumined my way,
And pleasure's gay sun, like the goddess of truth,
Seemed a pillar by night and umbrage by day—
A halo of pleasure attended me then
Ere yet I had mixed with the children of men.

Years rolled on apace, and the evils of life,
Like the mildew of ages, now thicken'd around.
As I ventured abroad naught but discord and strife
And malice and envy were there to be found:—
Religion and virtue had flown, and their trace
Was nearly invisible 'midst the disgrace.

The soul damning passions, upheaving and dark,
Like the lava of Etna, far-rolling and wide,
Swept furiously on till Virtue's frail barque,
Like a spot in the distance, was scarcely descried,
And the spirit of demons, conflicting and base,
Filled the annals of earth with deeds of disgrace.

But the bright star of hope bade me look to the West,
Where a standard is raised and a banner unfurl'd,
'Neath the shadow of which the poor and oppress'd
Rejoice—gathered in from a sin-stricken world,
Where the honest in heart from the nations abroad
May bask in the smiles of a merciful God.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY
Illustrated in its Great Characters.

CHAPTER IV.

MAXIMIAN AND THE THEBAN LEGION.

The old historians have thus pictured the state of the third century:—

"The armies disposed at their will of the supreme power. Their leaders by turn seized the power, and the infamous Cyriades, a Persian by birth, was the chief of these thirty tyrants who ruled the world for a period of several years; during their execrable reign evils of all kinds weighed down the empire; Britain was conquered by the Caledonians and Saxons; Gaul, by the Franks, the Germans and Burgundians, Italy, by the Germans, the Suevia, the Marcomans and the Quadi; Media, Macedonia and Thrace, by the Goths, the Heruli, and the Sarmatians; the Persians overran even to the very borders of Syria; civil war, famine and pestilence ruined cities and destroyed populations which had escaped the sword of the barbarians."

The state of the world at this period was prophetic of another great change. There was to follow the overthrow of the Roman empire, by the innumerable hordes which poured in from the north to re-people Europe with a dominant race, out of which a consolidated Christendom sprang. And again was there in God's grand epic a twin birth. It was the Mohammedian and Christian empires, which, for ages, were destined to struggle in a thousand battles for the sovereignty of the world; but Constantine the Great was first brought in to give the power into the hands of the Christians.

Diocletian, having risen to the imperial state of the Augusti, associated with himself a colleague in the person of Maximian, on whom he first bestowed the title of Cæsar, and afterwards that of Augustus. The former took the eastern division of the empire and the latter the western. Maximian, in his turn, associated with himself, for the conquest of Britain and Gaul, the heroic Constantius, father of Constantine the Great. But it was during the period when Maximian filled the rank of a Cæsar, or lieutenant emperor, under Diocletian, that there took place one of the most glorious tragedies of history.

Among the Roman legions, at the close of the third century, there was a host of the soldiers of the cross. These raised to the throne of the Augusti, Constantine the first Christian emperor. The heroic character of these soldiers, and their devotion to their faith, may be gathered by the following episode of the—

MARTYRDOM OF THE THEBAN LEGION.

Maximian having passed over into Gaul and conquered the factions of Amandus, Elienus and the Bagaudæ, or the peasants of Gaul, who had risen in a general insurrection, the Cæsar brought from the East a legion, called the Theban, composed of Christian veterans. These, together with his other soldiers, he designed to employ in persecuting the faithful. But the heroes of the cross refused to march at his cruel orders, and formed their camp at the foot of the mountain known now as the Great St. Bernard. The general, enraged, sent to the emperor Diocletian for reinforcements, who sent him troops with orders to decimate the rebel legion, and force the remainder to execute his will against the Christians. In the spirit of martyrs, they dared to disobey the earthly powers. A second time were they decimated, but still they resolved to die for him who had died for them, rather than execute the tyrant's will. Maurice, Exuperus and Candidus were their principal officers, and they exhorted these soldiers of the cross to follow their brethren to martyrdom rather than betray their religion. They then addressed the following noble manifesto to their general:

"We are your soldiers, my lord, but we freely confess that we are the servants of God; we owe to our prince duty in war, to God our innocence; we receive from you pay, He has given us life; we cannot obey you and renounce God our creator, our master and yours. If you ask of us nothing injurious, we will obey your orders as we have done to this time; otherwise we shall obey Him rather than you. We offer the service of our arms against your enemies, but we do not believe we are permitted to bathe them in the blood of the innocent. We took an oath to God, before we did to you, and you can have no confidence in the second, if we violate the first. You command us to seek out Christians, in order to punish them; you have no need of seeking others, behold we are such. We confess God the Father, author of all things, and Jesus Christ his Son. We have seen you put to death our companions without mourning, and we have rejoiced that they have been honored in suffering for their God. Despair has not driven us to revolt. We have arms in our hands, but we have not used them, because we prefer to die innocent, rather than live culpable."

Maximian now ordered his officers to give these Christian soldiers to the sword. Troops were marched to surround the legion and cut it to pieces. But these noble men, resolving to die as martyrs and not as rebels, laid down their arms and bared their necks to the strokes of their executioners. There fell of this famous legion six thousand men; and the earth that day was baptized with the blood of this little army of the soldiers of Christ. Their spirits ascended up on high to receive the crowns of the just and the faithful; while He who raiseth up and casteth down powers and dominions, to the fulfillment of his grand purposes, pursued His course to give to the disciples of his Son empires mightier than those of the Pharaohs, the Alexanders and the Cæsars. Truly worthy were the heroic six thousand of that Theban Legion to be ranked among the "World's Great Characters," for it is by such as they that the best issues of humanity are wrought out, and the matchless constancy of religion maintained.

ABDICATION OF DIOCLETIAN AND MAXIMIAN.

Diocletian gave to the world the first grand example of an abdication. Charles V. of Germany is cited by Gibbon as the only worthy correspondent; but the abdication of the latter, he says, was hastened by the vicissitudes of fortune and the disappointment of his favorite schemes, while that of the former was the close of a career of uninterrupted success, after he had vanquished all his enemies and accomplished all his designs. It took place in the twenty-first year of his reign.

The ceremony of abdication was performed in a spacious hall, three miles from Nicomedia. After delivering from a lofty throne a noble speech to the soldiers and people, Diocletian retired to his native country of Dalmatia. On the same day, Maximian, forced by the example of his benefactor, resigned the imperial purple at Milan; nor could this restless and ambitious prince afterwards prevail upon his illustrious colleague to leave his rural enchantments to resume the reigns of government. The elder Augustus, with a smile of philosophic pity, replied to Maximian that if he could show him the cabbages which he had planted with his own hands at Salona, he would no longer urge him to relinquish the happiness of his retirement for the pursuit of power. Nor was his conversation with his friends less fraught with the wisdom of experience. He was accustomed to say "How often is it the interest of four or five ministers to combine together to deceive their sovereign! Secluded from mankind by his exalted dignity, the truth is concealed from his knowledge; he can see only with their eyes, he hears nothing but their misrepresentations. He confers the most important offices upon the vice and weakness, and disgraces the most virtuous and deserving among his subjects. By such infamous arts; the best and wisest princes are sold to the venal corruption of their courtiers."

Such was the experience of the illustrious Diocletian. We would that men in power would digest this lesson.

Eighteen years of civil war and disorder in the State followed the abdication of the two Augustie. Constantius Chlorus, who had married the daughter of Maximian, after his divorce from St. Helena, had terminated his great career in death, and Constantine, the son of the wife of the divorce, was now emperor of the west.

The ascension of Constantine and the divisions in the empire at length gave to the old emperor Maximian an opportunity to leave his retirement and again lay claim to his ancient dignities. Warlike as ever, he defeated the emperor Severus and conducted him in triumph to Rome, where he caused him to resign the purple and was instrumental in his execution. Notwithstanding his age, Maximian passed the Alps and went over to Constantine, the sovereign of Gaul, carrying with him his daughter Fausta, whom he offered to that hero in marriage. The alliance between the two princes was contracted, and the marriage took place with great magnificence at Arles. Maximian now asserted his claim to the western empire, and conferred the title of Augustus upon his son-in-law; but Constantine retained in his own hands the power, and prepared himself for the next act in the imperial drama.

Maximian next joined his son Maxentius and fought against Galerius, who entered Italy with a powerful army to avenge the death of Severus. Galerius becoming invested with the imperial purple, raised with him Licinius and Maximin, and there were now six emperors, the example of which has no counterpart in history. For the second time, the butcher of the Theban Legion was forced to abdicate and he took refuge at the court of his son-in-law, Constantine.

But while Constantine was operating with a part of his army on the banks of the Rhine, Maximian inventing, or hastily crediting a report of that hero's death, ascended the throne of the West, seized the treasure, lavished it on the soldiers and put on the splendor of his ancient dignity. This news reaching the hero, he returned by rapid marches, and Maximian fled to Marseilles, upon which place Constantine ordered an immediate assault, but the garrison delivered up to him the city and the person of his father-in-law. A secret sentence of death was pronounced against the usurper, and it was given out to the world that, burdened by remorse and crime, he strangled himself with his own hands. Thus perished the Roman Emperor who gave to the Theban Legion a glorious martyrdom!

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

CHAPTER IV.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR AND HIS TIMES.

The early demolition and overthrow of the Assyrian and Persian monarchies, and the complete destruction of the works of art and the records of the learned by the Scythian hordes, whose boast was that "the grass never grew again where their horses' hoofs pressed the ground," have left but little material from which to form an opinion of the extent of the civilization enjoyed by the inhabitants of Nineveh and Babylon. Fragmentary references in the Bible, and the compilation of Assyrian and Persian traditions by the Greek historians, are our only sources of information. The recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh, are valuable only as novelties; proving that mankind in the earliest period of their history did do something more than eat and sleep; that they had some crude conceptions of the chaste and beautiful. Just as the rude drawing of a house, or a mill, by a child is valuable only as the effort gives promise of better things in his future. So it is with the rude sculptures exhumed from the ruins of Nineveh. They show at how early a period in man's history he sought to embellish and adorn; that the race, like the child, gave in their childhood of civilization and refinement, promise of a glorious future.

If we take all of the history of Nebuchadnezzar that is given in the book of Daniel as our guide, we can form but a low estimate of the advancement of the people of that age in the social and moral sciences. Nebuchadnezzar was evidently a man far in advance of his times in mental development; yet how low must have been his conceptions of Deity, and how great must have been his egotism, when he set up that image in the "plains of Dura" and called upon all people (under threat of the most fearful penalties if they disobeyed) to come and fall down and worship as God, the creation of his own hands, and the morbid conception of his own rude mind. What must have been the moral status of the people of that great nation, when the highest and most noble of all the tribes forming the Empire, or representatives of the whole, (for the whole people could not have been there) could sink their own moral natures so low as to worship that image at the dictum of a man—a king, though he was? When there were found only three men out of scores of thousands, who were true to their own conceptions of God?

Nebuchadnezzar was a man of irresistible will. Listen, if you please, to his knock-down argument on religious worship. When, by astounding proofs of power, he perceived that the God of the Hebrews was able to save his servants even from fire:—"Therefore I make a decree that every people, nation and language, that shall speak anything amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, shall be cut in pieces and their house shall be made a dunghill." This, too, after he had enjoyed many years of communion with the prophet Daniel, who possessed, unmistakably, one of the brightest intellects of that or any other age. Proving that God, through the labors of one of the wisest of His servants, could only make an impression upon the rude and uncultivated nature of the "Great King" by manifestations of irresistible physical power. It is an axiom of truth daily and hourly demonstrated in life, that the duller the ear addressed, and the greater the probability there is of disobedience, the louder and sterner must be the tone of command.

No brighter instance of wisdom in the divine government of mankind is recorded than that contained in the book of Daniel. Here was a "hard headed" and mighty monarch, who held, as it were, the destinies of the "chosen people" in his grasp, to be controlled and managed as an instrument in carrying out the Divine plans with regard to Israel. Dreams and visions were given him, not alone for his own sake, but also to make a Daniel necessary to him. Finally, to cap the climax, he was permitted, in a vision, to attend the Divine Court where his own case was adjudicated, and to hear the sentence passed upon him as a punishment for all his pride. His bright intellect became clouded, he lost his reason, and imagined himself a beast. A beast's hoofs were never cut—he would not permit his nails to be cut and they became as "birds' claws." Beasts were never shaven—he would not permit a razor to come near his head, and his hair became as "eagles' feathers." Beasts walked on four legs—he, being a beast, must do so too. Beasts were not confined in sumptuous apartments, and he would not be. Beasts ranged abroad in pastures and fed on grass he must needs do so too; and "the dews of heaven" settled upon him, and "he ate grass as an ox." Having recovered his reason, and taking a retrospective view of the past, aided no doubt by the Prophet, he was enabled to see clearly that the greatness and power of Israel's God filled the universe, and left no room for the gods of his former worship.

Now read his valedictory to his people and see the evidence of his having come forth into a new life. The starch is taken out of him wonderfully; and he begins to realize that to be a king is to be a father to his people and not a tyrant. He utters no threats of "cutting in pieces," nor of "making dunghills," but bears a simple and humble testimony to the goodness, power and greatness of the God of Heaven. We cannot possibly cast upon Daniel the imputation of being a toady and ministering to the vanity of a powerful king; therefore, how limited must have been the geographical information possessed by Daniel when he bore witness to Nebuchadnezzar, the "Head of Gold," that "wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the heaven, hath He given into thine hand and hath made thee ruler over them all;" the Assyrian Empire of that day being comparatively less in territorial area and in population than Great Britain!

THE MESSIAH.

Instruments Used in Handel's Day.

BY PROFESSOR JOHN TULLIDGE.

Handel's Oratorio of "The Messiah"—like the compositions of all great musical authors—received much opposition from the critics on its first representation. It is however now, beyond all doubt, that the critics were much prejudiced against Handel when he first produced "The Messiah" in London in 1741. It is also understood—by those who are acquainted with the history of this great work and its author's passionate and stubborn temper—that much of the opposition received from the critics was caused by Handel's determination to do what he pleased when composing for the principal singers. In fact, Handel did not fear the critics, nor the principal singers, nor his patrons. It did not matter to him how exalted their position, he was independent. He knew his own strength. His genius was as far above all other composers of his day as the sun compared to the light of the moon is in power and brilliancy. Therefore he would have his own way in composing his music, for he felt certain that his compositions would be successful at some period. Moreover, Handel carried in his train the instrumental and choral musicians, and that comforted him. There could be no surprise that his choral singers were fond of him, for his choruses are full of energy. When composing his choruses he became inspired and threw his gigantic mind into their construction and harmonization, and they have never been supplanted in the public estimation by any later compositions.

Handel, as noted in my opening article, was a magnificent organist. This induces me to show to my readers the method of the ancients in writing for the organ, and compare it with the method adopted by modern writers for this noble instrument. In Handel's day—and at a much later period—the performers on the organ were compelled to study harmony, or what is commonly termed thorough bass. Counterpoint was also included in their studies, for they had to play classical compositions from the subject with the bass figured. The inner parts were produced from the knowledge they had acquired in this branch of musical science. These necessary studies to the harmonist give him an understanding of the progression of fugal arrangements, and enable him to play the answer to the subject and counter-subject of the fugue without having them written in full; and without this essential knowledge an organist could not play from a figured bass. The organ player of modern date does not need this great knowledge. The composers and arrangers have provided a method that enables the organ student to become a tolerably good player with but little study, for it is now principally practice, for every note that is necessary to the accompaniment is written in the organ scores.

I will now slightly touch on the instruments used in Handel's time. The effect that is now produced when "The Messiah" is performed, by the invention and introduction of the improved modern instruments, and a clever arrangement for them, would electrify Handel were he living. Handel had but few instruments at his command. The violin, viola, violoncello, hautboy, trumpet and fagotti—or bassoon—were the few that Handel had to render his music effective with; but he knew how to use such as were in vogue in his day. This assertion can be easily proved by inspecting the delicate obligato accompaniments which enrich so many of his songs. It was the lack of these improved modern instruments that induced Mozart to write his celebrated instrumental accompaniments for this mighty work. It is evident, by the perusal of Handel's obligatos written for the instruments at his command, that he was fond of using them to beautify his organ accompaniments with their varied effect, but he could not bear to hear the tuning of any instrument in his presence. His ear was too fine, too sensitive, and they were always tuned before he arrived at any rehearsal or public performance. This reminds me of an anecdote on the subject:

At the introduction of one of Handel's compositions, he took his seat as usual at the organ to conduct the performance. All the instruments were turned before he arrived. A wicked wag, unknown to the performers, secretly visited the orchestra and altered the pitch of every stringed instrument. The wind instruments he could not manage, as the players would have seen the alteration, but the string were put, some a shade higher, some a shade lower, others a semitone higher, and the remaining portion a semitone lower, so that there were no instruments—but the wind—that were in tune with the organ. Handel had anticipated much pleasure and satisfaction by the performance of this composition, and placed himself at the organ with unusual good humor. At the opening harmony of the piece he had introduced the chord of the dominant seventh, on a pause. This was done to command the attention of the audience to the first movement. The combination consists of what is called the major harmonic triad with the seventh added—hence the term dominant seventh. The effect of that pause on Handel's nervous system, with the instruments out of tune, can be better imagined than described. Handel shook on his seat with passion; he pulled at his wig; tore it off; threw it about the platform; roared in perfect fury, and finally jumped up exclaiming, "O! O! te tam fillains; te tam scoundrels; I would kill te tam fillains," and away went the wig, which he had caught up, at the musicians in the orchestra. The music books that were on the organ-stand went in the same direction, and before he could be brought into a peaceful state of mind, the Prince of Wales—afterwards George II. of England—had to leave his private box and coax the composer into a good humor. The Prince was passionately fond of Handel's music, and was a great patron of the composer; hence his influence over him. During the interval of storm and peace the performers retired and again tuned their instruments, taking much care to have them in thorough tune this time, and the piece was then played to the composer's perfect satisfaction and the delight of the audience. Handel retired elated with his final success, and the trick played on him was for a time forgotten.

THE LADY AND THE WARRIOR.

[A LEGEND.]

BY JULIA BOWRING.

She stood beside him as he lay
  Upon the battle plain;
They parted once in other years,
  And thus they met again.
A cold dew damped his aching brow,
  His face was pale and wan,
His eye had lost its wonted fire—
  He was a dying man.
The night breeze fanned the lady's locks
  Of wavy golden hair:
She wore the cloister's sombre garb,
  But still was young and fair.
"Wild thought flash through my brain," she said,
  "Of each neglect and wrong.
Oh woman's heart is frail and weak,
  But woman's trust is strong.
When pleasure lit the castle halls,
  When bright eyes beamed with glee,
When beauties' lips thrilled magic lays,
  You thought not then of me.
The sunshine of my life is past—
  All past with love's decay;
And those who won from me thy heart,
  Oh tell me where are they?
Say, shall I bring them to thee now?
  To watch thy fleeting breath?
The ones so prized by thee through life,
  Should soothe thy hours of death!
Oh woman, oft how dark thy sky:—
  Pursue a wiser plan,
Place no deep trust in things of earth,
  And least of all in man.
I've felt the tempest of the heart,
  I've pined in cloister cell,
With mem'ries of a broken vow,
  I've learned the lesson well."
His cheek grew paler as she spoke:
  His sobs rose loud and strong,
As if the magic words had woke
  Thoughts that had slumber'd long.
"My brain is racked to agony,"
  He said; "That broken vow,
The hallowed past, the time misused,
  All come before me now.
Why do they haunt my dying hours—
  Those memories of old?
Oh could I but recall the past
  That vow my false lips told.
The sabre by my side will soon
  Be coated o'er with rust:
And I, too, like my gasping steed,
  Will sleep low in the dust.
Before the morning star shall fade
  From out the morrow's sky,
My star will set: Oh! Rosalind,
  Forgive me ere I die."
His voice grew feeble, yet it had
  A sad and mournful tone;
Oh how it touched her woman's heart
  His deep half-smothered moan.
He strove to raise his cold scarred hand,
  To clasp hers in embrace;
It fell,—his dim eyes closed,—and death
  Was written in his face.
She knelt beside that warrior brave,
  And kissed his pallid brow;
She would have spurned him once, but, oh!
  She could not do it now.
That battle-field so terrible,
  With dead forms gaunt and grim,
Had no alarms, oblivious,
  She saw but only him.
And through that long and dreary night
  Amidst that scene so dread,
Till morning came she watched and wept
  Beside her loved—her dead.
Oh woman's heart is frail and weak,
  But woman's love is strong,
And hers had lived through time and care,
  And braved the keenest wrong.

* * * *

Deep in the shade of convent cell,
  How many bright eyes wept,
As o'er that pale and lifeless one
  The midnight watch they kept.
A clasp of massive gold lay close
  Upon the throbless heart,
The portraiture of him who caused
  Its wildest, keenest smart.
And by the flaming light of torch,
  With sad and solemn tread,
The white-robed monks then bore her
  To the region of the dead.
And in that dark and mouldering vault,
  With death and gloom allied,
They chanted mass—then laid her down
  Close by the warrior's side.

THOUHGTS ON A SERMON.

BY A WOMAN OF UTAH.

I deem it not out of place to give expression, through your medium, to thoughts suggested by hearing Mr. Allen's sermon on Sunday afternoon.

How many are there, with anxious hearts and aching brains, yearning and gasping for Divine light, to brighten life's pathway; for an expansive and soul-satisfying creed; one that places no prohibition on a fearless investigation of truth of every kind. Yet of these, in that world which we too often denounce as all bad, but in which there are many, Oh, very many, of God's children calling loudly to him for light. And will he not heed them?. He that marketh the sparrow's fall, will he not hear His children cry to Him? When they raise their voices in supplication and prayer for divine guidance, for Heavenly light, will he not answer them? Yes, "God is His own interpreter, and He can make it plain."

Mr. Allen's idea of the popular religion of to-day is so true. The growing world calls for something more soul-satisfying than the dry ashes from the husks of a dead past, upon which, for many generations, the human family have existed—not lived, for their souls have been dwarfed, their minds circumscribed by prejudice and tradition. Until life within—the free and joyous soul-life that the Spirit of God alone can give, calls loudly for substantial food.

"Man's extremity is God's opportunity." He called Joseph Smith to a mission; that mission to declare a new age; an age that would criticise and test the wisdom of all previous ones.

Mr. Allen spoke of the refining and ennobling influence of self-denial. Where in the world can you find a people who more make this a principle of practical life than our own? Of this the women of Utah are illustrious examples. Can there be found among all the sects and denominations of the day, women who practise the self-abnegation, the true generosity that characterizes this small band of sisterhood? Although not a whit behind their sisters of "the world" in intelligence, culture and education, with all the intuition of true feminine nature, the same aspiration, the same desires, but with this difference: the world satisfies the women of the world, who live for its pleasures alone; but the women of Utah would live for something more—for a life beyond the grave. Where self-denial is practised for this object, the result must be purifying and ennobling.

It is not to be wondered at, that by some they are misunderstood. Their conduct, of course, is inexplicable. How can people appreciate a sentiment they never felt? The motives that may actuate women of a more advanced class cannot be understood by those unschooled in self-denial in the true spirit of Christianity and in the love of God.

THAT FAST FREIGHT LINE----THE U. P. R. R.

BY QUIZ.

In reïntroducing "QUIZ" to the public we present an old friend with a new face. A long time ago Quiz fled from our sight "like a beautiful dream," leaving us to settle his accounts. Not finding in literature that which would support Mrs. Quiz, six children, a buggy and a sleigh, he turned his attention to the patriotic purpose of promoting railway lines. He has been a railroad contractor, and returns to us with a soul full of confidence in Durant and John Sharp, and a pocket full of sub-contractors' checks. He has boosted railroads, puffed railroads, telegraphed about them, made toasts about them, and at the appropriate period went into raptures over the "last spike." Having done his duty to his country in this respect, he now feels himself entitled to do any amount of grumbling on the opposite side.

When Quiz undertook to support the C. P. R. R. and the U. P. R. R. and railroads generally, it was with the understanding that they were going to regenerate things, and get rid of a certain impression that we Utahites were "out in the wilderness." His understanding was that time in traveling and freighting was to be annihilated; and New York brought, at least, in the vicinity of Echo Canyon. In fond reliance on this blissful idea, three months ago Quiz sent to the aforesaid New York for three pounds of tea and a calico dress for Mrs. Q., and a box of toys for the young Quizes.

In perfect certainty that ox-team times were gone forever, and the days of lightning trains arrived, he confidently informed Mrs. Q. and the junior Q's, that they might in a fortnight, or less, expect to drink that tea, see that calico dress, and exhibit to an aggravated and distracted neighborhood of youngsters those magnificent toys. That tea is now —and has been for about twelve weeks past—somewhere between here and Chicago; that calico dress and those toys—if anywhere at all in the world—are in the same vicinity. Mrs. Quiz has lost her faith in railroads, and says emphatically—"hang the 'Last Rail' and them that laid it;" and the junior Q's are in an inconsolable agony of grief.

These are private sorrows, but Quiz has public ones to lament. On paying a casual visit to the office of the UTAH MAGAZINE about four months ago, he found that the managers of that office with the same fond belief in railroads and their wondrous celerity possessed by himself had entrusted goods to its tender mercies only four months before, which goods were then at about the rate of one package per week pouring in on the proprietors, having accomplished their journey at little less than half-mule speed.

Being at that time a railroad contractor, and being by his connections bound to sustain the character of railroads for swiftness, Quiz proved conclusively that all this was the proper thing under the circumstances. Urged by his persuasive eloquence, sometime last February the aforesaid proprietors again entrusted type, paper, presses and a variety of articles too numerous to mention to the Iron Horse. Whether the "Iron Horse" was sick, or went to see his relatives, or was short of oats, we cannot tell; but after from three to four months waiting, this magnificent animal brought to our peaceful vales about half of the above material; having accomplished four days' work in the short space of three months and a half: traveling nearly as fast as an ox team with their hind legs tied. The other half of the goods are—exactly, heaven knows where. They may be expected in, however, without fail, in less than eight weeks—unless goods should be delayed on the line.

The proprietors of the UTAH MAGAZINE having been induced mainly by Quiz's representations to trust their goods to this rapid mode of conveyance, he feels it incumbent upon him to ask the U. P. R. R. and America at large these questions:—Was it to promote this sort of freighting that he wore a hairy cap and a blue checked shirt for six months, and expended his soul on scrapers in Weber Canyon? Was it for this that he burnt three candles and an oil lamp on the night of the "Illumination?" Was it for this that he listened to the whole of the speeches of Governor Durkee and Mr. Hooper? Was it for this that he gave three cheers like a lunatic and rashly expended twenty-five cents in candy on the youthful Quizes on that glorious day? Echo answers—"Very likely it was," but he will not believe it. He has one pathetic appeal to make to the U. P. R. R., and then he subsides into peaceful literature for ever:—For the country's sake, do try and freight us goods to Utah—not so fast as a mule train, that would be asking too much, but do try to rival an ox team. If only this is accomplished he will die content. Deny him this, and there will be inscribed on his tombstone:—"Here lies a defunct and extinguished railroad contractor, who was prematurely killed by overfaith in the U. P. R. R."

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

CHAPTER IX.

THE ORPHAN JEWESS AND THE CHRISTIAN NOBLE.

As our hero and heroine are now before our readers, we will here take the opportunity of describing his person.

Walter has much physical maturity, and his character and mind are according to the indications of his boyhood. He has changed in nothing, but has become more developed in every thing that he was. Endowed with one of those extraordinary natures of intensity and self-motive force, that gathers all the promptings of life from within, and lives out itself as from strong necessities, he has unfolded Walter Templar, and was ever unfolding him. Nothing but himself could come out of himself, for he took not his impress from other minds, but impressed his own nature on his surroundings, and tinged all the circumstances of his life with the qualities of his own being. Italy stirred him, because he was full of impulses,—the pregnancy of a land of genius came over him because he had the attributes of genius in his soul. In his physical structure, he was also strongly marked, typical of capacity and force rather than handsome and winning. He was not so much the man to engage a lady's thought, as the one to command men, and agitate a nation with his impetuous intensity. In height he was five feet eleven and a half, and his organization was anti-corpulent, bony and like an iron statue. The head was large, but not massive, looking in the breadth of front-face, the cheek-bones prominant, the eyes dark, full of power and mesmeric qualities, and the hair hung about his head as a mass of black waves. Unlike Walter Templar, the youth DeLacy was fair, with hazel eyes and chestnut locks. He was frank, generous, bold and strongly attached to his friend, whose superiority he maintained; and whose intellectual and impetuous mind he followed. The young men were repeating in their persons the friendship which had existed between Sir Richard Courtney and the dead DeLacy.

As dissimilar as our heroes were, they were just the youths one would predict as certain to fall into some romance; or who, if they did not find it, would create one which would as certainly involve them in future embarrassment. Walter was not one to seek adventure, but he was one to create a romance. He was a law unto himself; and the restraints and artificialities of society were repugnant to him. By birth he was an aristocrat, but by instinct a republican. New forms and orders of things grew out of him; and natural, not artificial methods, impulse led him into for the expession of his character. The voice of society he heard not; the voice of his own conscientiousness was ever speaking to him. Out of the integrity of his own nature and thought, he felt, willed and acted with scarcely any reference to conventional propriety and the way marks of society. This is the peculiarity of young men of intense and conscientious purposes; but, however noble it might be in the abstract, society will not—cannot allow its manifestations. Its artificial voice must be respected. The world can pardon the love of adventure in youth, but it will not tolerate the strong, forceful innovation of thoughtful character. On the other hand, Frederick DeLacy was just the one for adventure, and was prepared to follow Walter into any extravagant romance. What had he left England for, if not for this? The days of knight-errantry to youth will never be out of date. In Italy, a land of banditti, Walter would have been pronounced by a physiognomist as the very man who, if molded by some desperate circumstances, would be likely to awe society in the character of a chieftain of the grand and noble type—a being as much to admire, devotedly follow and love as to fear. Now, to have organized a model banditti under the chieftainship of Walter would have been the very thing that young DeLacy would have voted for above all earthly glory. He knew that it would be a most honorable band, if Walter was its soul and head, and one that would only battle and astonish the world in some great cause. The Garibaldian type would have suited Fred—one to fight for "down-trodden Italy," or any other down-trodden nationality, or down-trodden anything anywhere. Youth-like, and full of its generous, big heart, Fred, as with thousands more at his age, was for a crusade of some kind in behalf of humanity and right against oppression and wrong. He had often heard the tradition of Sir Walter Templar's house, that its founder was an illustrous Grand Master of the renowned order of Knight Templars and his friend was certainly a fitting representative of such an ancestor. Why then should not Walter be Grand Master, or Grand Chieftain or Grand Somebody? was Fred's unanswerable question.

There was another extravagant romance that the young Englishmen were the very ones to fall into, and this one they found. The youths discovered the beautiful orphan Jewess and created themselves her very venerable guardians! What romance could be better? what character could the boys assume more becoming? Walter was twenty and Fred nineteen, and Terese fifteen. The very ones to stand together in the relationship of ward and guardians! It is true, however, that although Walter, her chief guardian, was only twenty, he was old enough in person and character to be twenty-two.

Terese, as we have seen, was sweetly melancholy and dreamy in her disposition—the ideal of an orphan maiden—a type of a daughter of Zion. She possessed rare musical gifts of nature, like many more of the Jewish race.

Often in pastoral solitude Terese would warble forth her soul in improvisions of genius, and on such an occasion Sir Walter Templar and Lord Frederick De Lacy introduced themselves to the gifted Hebrew child. Let us take our readers back to that episode of her history which branched out over the whole future of her life, blended with the history of our hero, and gave a leading thread to our story.

"Hark!" exclaimed Sir Walter in rapture, as the strains of the Hebrew maiden burst upon their ears as they wandered near the mountains admiring the scenery of that beautiful Italian village which gave her birth.

"The song of some mountain shepherdess. How very beautiful! What a rich voice, Walter!"

"Divine!" replied his friend in ecstacy, for music was with him a passion.

"What a pathetic strain, and how unconstrained, Walter."

"'Tis the improvisings of genius. How it changes: now plaintive, now tender, now yearning! It is borne upon the soft zephyrs of classic Italy, burdened with the soul of poesy and song."

"A beautiful shepherdess, I'll be sworn. By St. George, Walter, I believe it is the fairy of one of the romance I have been dreaming."

"The nymph of the mountains, then, Fred, waking the solitude with pastoral melody. She comes this way! We will not startle the fawn with rude abruptness."

The Hebrew maiden approached and was gently and gracefully accosted by the young Englishmen.

"Tell us, beautiful maiden, is it unlawful to speak with the mountain nymph who warbles such enchanting strains?"

"Oh no, young stranger," she sweetly answered Walter, smiling, "it is not unlawful: I am not the mountain nymph."

"Indeed you are. Is she not, Walter? I am sure you are a fairy, beautiful songstress. Now do tell us your fairy history."

"I am only Terese, and the villagers call me the orphan Hebrew maiden."

"An orphan and a daughter of Zion," exclaimed Sir Walter with thoughtful interest.

"Yes, Signor Stranger."

"A sweet singer of Israel maiden!"

"So the kind villagers tell me, Signor Stranger," replied the artless child of nature, naively.

The youths won from her the history of her orphan life. She had never met any one to harm her, and she was easily induced to tell her simple pathetic tale. Fred, with his free generous nature, wept like a boy, as he was, for he was himself an orphan. Walter—sublime Walter, was like himself, grand and profound.—He had been as an elder brother to Fred; why should he not be the same to Terese? Fred wished it. Walter, with his strong, impetuous nature, willed it so. He determined it, therefore it had to be. Terese, the orphan Hebrew maiden, henceforth was their protege—their sister. Walter willed it, and Fred knew that all Italy could not stand against that impetuous will.

Foster-brother Beppo opposed, but foster-brother Beppo could not stand against the master mind and wizard-like power of Walter Templar. He was created by nature to bow to his will even strong-minded, turbulent men. Never had he met a masculine mind whom he had not subdued. What wonder then that he should henceforth be the ruling star of the destiny of the orphan Hebrew girl. She did not know it, but from the first she loved him, with the self-abnegation of a woman's nature. Like her ancestress, Ruth, the language of her soul was: "Where thou goest, I will go; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

The young Englishmen traveled incognito. Where would have been the romance, unless they laid aside their family titles for that of the Unknowns? So Sir Walter Templar and Lord Frederick De Lacy became to the peasants of the country, plain Signor Walters and Signor Fredericks. With Terese, the orphan Hebrew maiden, what a trio they formed! What a traveling company for any extravagant romance, which even your cold-blooded, long-headed, unromantic statesman is as likely as any youth to fall into at twenty.

Here they were, three children of nature! Even Walter with his masterly intellect, was all that; perhaps he was more so, from the very force of his mentality, and the impetuosity of his nature, which like a torrent overlept the artificial.

Here they were, Fred, the last representative of a noble family, whose lands were in the hands of the supplanter. Here they were,—Terese, the orphan Hebrew maiden—a sweet singer of Israel—a child of the captivity of the chosen people—all of which characters, to the youths, made her their fitting companion. Here they were, and at their head, glorious, forceful, gifted Walter, a representative descendant of an illustrious Grand Master of the renowned order of Knight Templars.

What impropriety was there in these two English youths, seeking adventure, and this gifted maiden, with so many interesting surroundings, traveling together as a loving trio—two young brothers of a younger sister.

Fred, particularly, saw no impropriety, and he would have been only too delighted to have found several more such youths as themselves, and a few more maidens with the halo of romance, around Terese.

What an interesting company they would have formed! The boy, in fact, gave such a romantic brother-and-sisterhood preference over his model banditti. Thus these children of nature traveled together, well representing what they passed for—two friends, and Terese the sister of Walter.

The youths never dreamt of future consequences. Fred, as we know, was betrothed to Alice Courtney, by his dying father and Sir Richard, and Walter was to mate with his cousin Eleanor. But what had that to do with Terese, the orpan Jewess? She was a sister of their romance, and they had not been, as in after years, painfully startled with the revelation that the romance of a woman's life is love!

Since Terese became the companion of their travels, Walter would for a time take some delightful villa, in which he would surround his adopted sister with as many luxuries as consistent with pastoral gentility—especially those of art and refinement of intellect. Music was particularly attended to, for Walter was already skillful on several instruments, and an excellent vocalist, with a magnificent tenor voice. At college he made music a principal study, and he grasped it by intuition.

Hours would Walter Templar and Terese pass together in their reveries of music. In this they were indeed brother and sister. They shared a common genius; and had not Sir Walter Templar been an English nobleman, the world might have known him and Terese as celebrated among the most illustrious of the musical profession.

One of the episodes of the adventures of the young Englishmen in Italy was to rescue the great composer of music, Spontini, from the hands of banditti, which made such an innovation on Fred's romance, that he henceforth viewed such honorable fraternities more in the light of assassins and robbers. After that, also, their history became more regular, and their association with Terese a little more bound with the world's notions of propriety. Their fondness, however, for each other and unrestrained relations remained; and why should they not? They were most innocent, pure and natural. Indeed, there was the impropriety. A little more artificial, and their relations would have been more proper. The difference now was, that they became fellow pupils under the great Spontini. This grew out of the gratitude of the illustrious Maestro, who only trained the brightest stars; but to his gratitude was soon added admiration; for he found that both Walter and Terese possessed rare genius, and voices of the first quality. They became immense favorites with Spontini, not merely musically, but as two in whom the great man was personally and affectionately interested. They told him their history, and he the more readily extended a guardianship to Terese, because he foresaw what must inevitably be the result of the connection between Walter and the Hebrew maiden. Indeed, it was clear to him, even then, that the gifted young Englishman was master of the maiden's destiny.

Three years had passed since they became fellow pupils under the illustrious Spontini. Let us bring before us again Walter Templar and Terese, now the enchantress prima donna—now the Queen of song at Rome.

They are seated in their music room in a beautiful villa situated on the suburbs of the city. Walter is at the piano, pouring forth his inspirations, clothed in his magnificent voice, and Terese is putting in her part with her rich Hebrew tones. If our readers wish to discover the peculiar qualities and richness of the voice of the children of Judah, they have only to go to a Jewish synagogue.

Spontaneous improvising together were their most delightful practice. They spent hours daily in this exercise, so enchanting to them as composers and vocalists. They both possessed genius —were skillful musicians, and having made improvision a favorite exercise, they could pour forth together impromptu compositions, sometimes Walter leading the inspiration, and sometimes Terese. But the maiden had now become so much the expression of Walter's soul that she thought his thoughts, felt his feelings, and was inspired with his inspiration; she was a mirror reflecting his mind and genius. Using modern physiological terms, she was his medium; or as Spontini expressed it, Walter was her magician, and she the enchantress who worked her enchantments under the will and by the superior power of the master spirit.

But this was an awful power for a young man of Walter's character and forceful nature to hold over the plastic nature and yearning heart of the gentle maiden. The master of her destiny —aye, of her very soul, which he governed immeasurably more than he governed his own.

"Where will it end?" Spontini had been anxiously asking for three years.

"Where will it end?" The heart of Terese had been wailing since the hour it was first frightened with the revelation of its secret.

"Oh God of my fathers!" the Hebrew maiden would implore when alone in her chamber; "Oh God of Abraham, where will it end?"

"Oh God of my fathers, take not from the orphan daughter of thy ancient people the comforter whom thou hast sent!"

When struggling in vain to conquer her almost hopeless love, the soul of the troubled maiden would burst forth in wailings of pleading trust.

"Oh God of Jacob, who prevailed with thee, may I prevail with him! Give me the heart of Walter my beloved! Thou hast made him lord of my soul—God of the captive people, send not an afflicted daughter of Zion again into Babylon! Take not Jacob from her Rachel! Leave not thy handmaid in the darkness of Egypt! Give the balm of Gilead to my wounded spirit! Oh give me Walter's love!"

Thus would the gifted Jewess in the solitude of her chamber, pour out her afflicted spirit in strong, simple faith to Him who manifested his mercy and power in the midst of his people Israel. It was her anxious master, Spontini, who startled her into a knowledge of her heart's secret, by dwelling upon the fact of Walter's betrothal to his cousin, his prospective return to his own land, and marriage with Eleanor. She had so long known all this —been so familiar with it from the first! It was nothing to trouble Terese, who had Walter with her always! And she saw in the future no ominous cloud—none until Spontini pointed it out with a new light. When the revelation of the truth burst upon her consciousness, it overpowered her, nor could her kind sympathizing master console her.

A bird's eye view of a scene between the illustrious composer and his pupil six months prior to our introduction of Terese as the prima donna, will make our readers familiar with the cause of Spontini coming to Rome, to bring out his pupil in public.

"Consider, my child, Sir Walter Templar is an English nobleman."

"O! but he thinks not his Hebrew sister beneath him. He has so often wished I was his sister. O! say that you think that he will love me as something more, dear, kind Maestro. He does love me! O! say he does, good dear, Spontini. You think he loves me? I know you do; only your caution is timid, lest your words should make me hope too much. He always calls me his Hebrew maiden, and has said a thousand times how much he loves me in that character. I am sure I always thought he did, before I knew its meaning as now I do. O! say, dear, good, Maestro, you think he does."

"He is the promised husband of another, Terese."

"But she loves him not as I do. I am sure, I think he loves not her as he does me. He talks of her as a twin sister, whom he describes as much like himself. I know, by my own heart, that the love he entertains for his cousin is the deep, calm affection of a brother. Has he not ever been more like the lover of Terese than of Eleanor?"

"I grant it, my child; still he is her promised husband."

"A promise of childhood, formed by his uncle, and mother, Spontini. O what then has not the relations of the last four years promised me? It has made him master of my soul and destiny. Oh I fear my hereafter, as well as my present, if I lose him!"

"Be just, my child. Eleanor, looking upon Walter as her future husband, may love him as well as you can. What may he not be to her, my Terese?"

"And to me—to me! O what is he not to me? My universe! Take him away, and there appears a blank—a black impalpable abyss, into which I look with fearfulness. I strain my gaze to catch the glimmering of some distant star: but see no looming star for me."

"Look to art, my child. Terese, look to the star of fame before you. 'Tis bright, Terese! 'Tis glorious!"

"O dear Maestro! Life is stretched out before me like a sea troubled in every wave. If I cross it without my convoy, my barque will be wrecked."

Spontini had not the heart to urge more, and from that moment he strained every effort to bring about the union of Walter and Terese.

"Well, well child, say no more. I own Walter may be the lord of his Hebrew maiden for life," said the composer soothingly. The afflicted child threw her arms around her sympathizing master's neck, and wept. The comforting words of hope from his lips, for the first time, brought soothing feeling from the maiden's heart in gushes of relief. Spontini was much moved, and regretted not the hope he had given.

"We will storm him with the batteries of art. Music shall plead with him with her powerful voices. Spontini has a half-formed design. I tell you my child, your magician, Walter shall be the life-long master of Terese."

"O if I lose him, dear Maestro, then from me let all things pass away. I lose my all in him."

From that time Spontini began preparations to bring out Terese to the musical world. His design was to storm Walter's heart by the triumphs of the gifted girl, and make the love, which he not unlikely entertained for her, speak in unmistakable language. He could not give Walter a higher estimate of her talents and voice than he possessed; but fame could repeat it to him with a thousand tongues, and all Rome be brought to her feet. Could Walter be brought to declare, what he foresaw many a noble would, his declaration at least would not be unworthy of his character. His Hebrew maiden—his fellow pupil—his companion of a romance of years, would become Sir Walter Templar's wife. If he loved Terese, even jealousy of noble admirers would help Spontini's scheme. Thus far it had succeeded. Rome was at her feet. But they worshipped afar off. 'Twas Walter the enchantress wanted, not at her feet, but nestling on his great heart as her life-resting place. For this, she strained all her powers to their utmost tension, and his genius manifested through her, and her yearning love helped Terese mightily to win her triumphs.

There they sat, still in the music room of their beautiful secluded villa; still as usual, pouring forth their musical improvisions. They were a glorious pair! He, resembling a magnificent night; she as beautiful and gifted as ever sprang from Judah's royal house. To-night would be revealed to Walter his Hebrew maiden's love! How will the romance of the youths' commencing with the beautiful orphan Jewess, stand after the opera to-night? Will the end of that romance be the wreck of the gifted, loving Terese?

CHAPTER X.

ROME. NOBLE REVELERS.

"The new prima donna! The queen of song! The divine Terese!" shouted a gay company of noble revelers. In their dissipated gallantry, they sprang to their feet and pledged the lady in sparkling wine: and as each gallant tipped the glass of his fellow, he shouted the rival pledge to the fair Terese, each vieing with the other in naming the new Star.

Remote from this boisterous party sat two gentlemen drinking their wine in quiet propriety. They were both English, though one of them might have passed as an Italian, for he spoke the language of the country with the ease of a native and the elegance of a scholar. These two young Englishmen evidently bore no sort of relationship to the gay company, for they joined not in their pledge, even so much as by a notice, but quietly conversed together. They seemed to be quite unaware of the very presence of the gallants, and unconscious of their enthusiasm over the young musical star who had just burst upon the fashionable world at Rome, captivating with her rustic beauty and enchanting with her wonderful dramatic powers and gifts of song. It might be they were students, come to the capital of the Empire of Art for their finishing education. They looked not unlike artists of some class—perhaps painters, perhaps musicians, and if the latter, doubtless they were not so unconscious of the pledge of the revelers to "the queen of song,"—the divine Terese, as they seemed to be. It is certain, however, that if they were not artists, they had not claimed their social rank in the fashionable circles at Rome and were alike unknowing and unknown in their present situation. Perhaps, also, they were abashed by close proximity to gay men of rank and by quiet reserve invited no attention to themselves: perhaps they were lost together in conversation upon their favorite art.

"Gentlemen," said a signor Benedict, from among the gay young noblemen, "I have pledged the gifted artiste, not the lady —not the lady, by the mass."

"Ha! ha! not the lady, Marquis: of course, not the lady. Gentlemen, we absolve Signor Benedict from all imputation of pledging a woman —of drinking wine in honor of any creature in petticoats—save in her character as an artiste. You absolve our Benedict, noble gallants?"

"Certainly, certainly! Most willingly do we absolve the Marquis. No scandal to the Benedict about a petticoat."

"Signor Benedict, said Count Orsini, the leader of the revelers, "you are absolved by this solemn assembly of all appearance of pledging a woman!"

"By the bye, Count, you have not met your usual success with the new prima donna," retorted the Marquis Baglioni, the Benedict.

"Usual success!" laughed a middle aged English baronet. "Why, Marquis, your wording of the Count's ill luck in wooing the beautiful singer is very like a compliment. The irresistible Orsini has been repulsed by the gifted peasant, with as much hauteur as though she had been a princess of the proud Orsini house itself, and he but one of its serfs who had dared to aspire to her favor."

"The fashionable gossips will have it that the charming Terese sent back to the Orsini his eloquent billet doux—love offerings penned by a poetical secretary—unopened, together with the diamond coronet," observed the Count Cariati, with evident pleasure at the opportunity of being able to annoy his rival, "the coronet to be worn professionally, of course!"

"A sharp thrust, that," remarked the Benedict. "Better pattern after me, Orsini."

"O! I can afford Cariati's banter, since it but serves to remind me of former triumphs, in which the Count has been put hors-de-combat in our love passes. You will bear me witness, noble friends, that of all this company of irresistible gallants, none have been more successful with the lady than I."

"But, Count, you must acknowledge we have not met your repulse, nor had our gifts returned," said the English baronet.

"Ha, ha?" laughed Orsini, complacently: "my little episode was too significant a warning for others to attempt, where I had failed. Quite flattering, Sir Herbert, I assure you."

"Remember, Orsini, I have not made advances to your gifted countrywoman," said the Englishman.

"It would be in vain, Sir Herbert."

"I have cut the wings of as shy a bird ere now, Count."

"Come, friends, come! A common cause! We grant Sir Herbert to have been irresistible with the fair, and to be still a gallant worthy a beauty's smiles; but, in justice, we must claim the benefit for ourselves of youth—captivating, ingenious youth."

The vanity of the Englishman was piqued, for, though middle-aged, he was still a fine-looking man, who in his day, had been only too "successful" with the fair sex, to the sorrow of many a repentant deserted one.

"A princely dinner to this company of noble gallants, Count Orsini, that I will succeed where you have failed, and win the smiles of the beautiful Terese. Give me three months, and I will bring the Queen of Song from her rustic bower, to blaze her lustre on the fashionable crowd at Rome."

"As her accepted Knight, Sir Herbert? The favored lover who shall conquer the gifted Amazon who beat the Orsini?"

"Yes, Count: as the conqueror of her who discomfitted you."

"A wager, by the holy Virgin," laughed the handsome young noble, with pardonable assurance that the Englishman would fail where he had lost: "I accept the challenge. You are witnesses, noble friends!"

"Bear witness, gentlemen," joined in Sir Herbert; "and now pledge me success in wine, most loyal votaries in Bacchus and Venus."

"Pledge the daring Englishman!" shouted the company.

"I will lead the ceremony as a token of good will," said the Count Orsini. "Success to Sir Herbert, if he can win it!"

"If he can win it!" echoed the eldest of the Englishmen.

"By all the Saints," broke in the Benedict, "'tis the fellow-pupil of the fair Terese!"

"What, the young mentor of the prima donna, to whom I presume I am much indebted?" asked Count Orsini.

"Yes, the handsome cousin who pre-appropriates the gifted peasant," the Marquis replied.

"The solution of your non-success, Orsini," said another of the gallants.

"And the secret of the prima donna's rustic seclusion," added Cariati.

"Gentlemen," said Orsini, "we release Sir Herbert from his wager. Doubtless the affair will be repeated to the lady."

"I never repeat to a lady the disgraceful conduct of libertines, even though it should concern herself. I would not bring a blush to her cheek by a tale of libertines taken with her fair name."

"Libertines!" ejaculated the gallants, in surprise and rage. "Beware, young man!"

"But I would guard her person, and chastise an offender, at the first approach of outrage to her, personally."

The young Englishman had answered the revellers, without appearing to address them. Seemingly, he was continuing a conversation with his companion, which the gay company had not heard, because of their own clamor; yet, of course, the dissipated young nobleman knew that the remarks of the stranger were shaped for them.

"We are insulted, gentlemen!" exclaimed a passionate young noble, starting to his feet.

"And by two adventurers!" added another.

"Artists—fellows who live by their brains," said a third.

"Of which that noble lap-dog of Dame Fortune has but a small portion for his inheritance," said the other young Englishman.

"By the Pope," exclaimed the Benedict, half admiringly, "the fellows have mettle to beard us thus. As I'm a soldier, I think the artists worthy our swords."

"Peasants—not worthy a moment's notice of these noble gallants, Marquis," put in Sir Herbert, with a design to save his imprudent countrymen, as he considered them, from the fury of the fiery Italians.

"Countrymen of yours, Sir Herbert, and if peasants, excellent fellow-pupils of the haughty Terese."

"Your true plebeian is ever haughty and arrogant, if possessed of talents or favored by fortune," he replied.

"The baronet is an excellent example of your true plebeian," observed the youngest of the Englishmen, to the fellow pupil of Terese.

"Did you address your remark to me, sir," said Sir Herbert, furiously, approaching his countryman.

"My friend," answered the elder of the unknown Englishmen, "was refering me to the family of a rich plebeian who tricked his noble patron out of his estates: but the story can be of no interest to you, sir."

"None in the least," replied Sir Herbert, much annoyed and embarrassed. "I beg your pardon, young Englishmen, for taking up a link of your story, to which we have not been sufficiently attentive."

"This has gone too far, gentlemen," the passionate Orsini broke in. "We are all designedly insulted by two low-born adventurers."

"Let them leave the society of noblemen for their own. There are plenty of the artist crew in Rome," added another.

"Yes, yes! Let them leave and at once," shouted the company threateningly.

"And if the fellow pupil of the prima donna presumes on his favor with the Star, the Orsini will knight him, by breaking his sword across his back."

The young artist, if such he was, left his seat, and walking up to the Italian noble, said, with flashing eyes, "Count, long centuries ago, when the Orsini's held up a princely head, my ancestor knighted the chief of their proud house!"

"Nameless boaster," shouted the now maddened noble, drawing his rapier, "defend yourself!"

The young Englishman showed no sign of fear nor hurry, but with provoking calmness, tapping his own rapier, continued, "I have taken lessons from the best swordsman in Italy, as well as music lessons from the illustrious Spontini."

"Another Admirable Crichton!" sneered the Orsini.

"At your service, Count."

"Perhaps it will not be wise to tempt your skill," replied the young Italian Count, still sneeringly; and then he haughtily added, "As noblemen are not accustomed to fight with adventurers, it does not become an Orsini to cross swords with one whom Rome knows to bear no higher title than the fellow pupil of Terese, the prima donna."

"As you please, Count. I am not wonderfully desirous to claim the honor of knighthood from your sword, nor wish, unless tempted by a more serious cause, to run you through with mine," said the young Englishman, with provoking good nature and exquisite politeness.

"A braggart—a stage walker in heroics," shouted the gallants.

"At your service, gentlemen: if any of this brave company wish it; still, not myself eager for the honor. Sir Herbert Blakely, the story my friend was relating, in which you have manifested some interest, is of a certain baronet, of title very modern, who holds lands not his own, but lent to his father—a money usurer. The sequel, noble sir, is that the heir may some day redeem them from the son of the pawn-broker," and the two young Englishmen left the revellers much chagrined.

"By Lucifer, Sir Herbert, there is hidden meaning in all this," observed Count Orsini to the baronet, who was pacing the room venting his rage and mortification in muttered curses. Once or twice the Englishman was about to follow the daring strangers, but prudence forbade.

The sequel, which he had in his revenge already more than half determined on, was a very different one to that which his young countryman had prophesied. In view of such a result, he deemed it wise not to make public foot-marks for the future to discover.

"By the infernal powers! you are right, Count. The young bravo bore himself as haughtily to the Orsini as though he had been that same ancestor, rating for some insubordination the chief of your proud house, whom he knighted long centuries ago. Ha! ha! ha! you did not expect such a clear unhorsing as that, Count, in your tilting-match with the unknown. Let me see, gallants, the order of the day's tornament—thus it runs: The herald of the day enters, the challenge of the Orsini is proclaimed—the black knight bounds into the ring upon his warlike charger—visor down—name given—the Unknown—the Orsini is unhorsed—visor of the Unknown is raised—the conquerer of the Orsini is his own sovereign. By Jupiter! quite a romantic adventure, noble friends!"

Sir Herbert was evidently aiming to turn the sharp thrusts given by the young Englishman from himself to the Count; and he also designedly sought to enflame the fiery Italian against the strangers; but the rhapsody of the baronet rather amused than enraged him, for he took it as a mere display of Sir Herbert, to hide his own mortification at the references made to what he keenly suspected, was a secret chapter of the baronet's family history.

"Come, come, Sir Herbert, do not heal your wounds on my body. Return his thrusts with a sharp sword. Tut, tut, man, they had no point for the Orsini."

"I tell you, proud Count, his thrusts at you were pointed for you. Unless I much mistake, long centuries ago, when the Orsini held up a princely head, his ancestors did knight the Chief of their proud house."

"By the Pope! Sir Herbert, you are dealing in offensive riddles," exclaimed the young noble, in rage.

"The founder of the house and name of that dark, haughty young stranger was, long centuries ago, Sir Count, Grand Master of the renowned order of Knights of the Temple of Zion."

"Then, by the Temple of Zion! if thy suspicion be not groundless, Sir Herbert," exclaimed the Count, "thy countryman's words were not those of a braggart, for a chief of the Orsini house was a Knight Templar of that proud order, whose Grand Master swayed his baton over even princes."

"I much mistake, Count, if I am not right in my surmises, as to the identity of that haughty young Englishman. The fellow pupil of the prima donna—the favorite lover—the successful rival—the descendant of the Grand Master that knighted your ancestor—Sir Walter Templar is no unworthy match for an Orsini, either in love or knightly prowess," said Sir Herbert, pursuing his object to inflame the vindictiveness of the revengeful Italian.

"Gallants, we meet after the opera to-night at the palace of the Orsini. Again to the queen of song. Come pledge again the divine Terese, noble friends." Thus, the young noble, with an assumed lightness and indifference, sought to hide from his gay companions the black demon of revenge that possessed his soul, called up by the designing Englishman, who had discovered in his young countrymen two men whom he instinctively felt he had most occasion to fear in a future reckoning, which for twenty years he had hoped would never come.

As the revelers separated, Count Orsini whispered to Sir Herbert Blakely that his private box at the opera house would not offend the most fastidious friend. The wily Englishman understood the Italian; and, as they separated, his face wore a dark smile of wicked triumph.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

N. P. WILLIS.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of.

A CERTAIN CURE FOR CATARRH AND ALL Mucous Diseases of the head, nose and throat.

This is a Medicine never before used or known to the public. Dr. Cady, the discoverer, was a sufferer from this terrible disease for twenty years, and after testing all the remedies extant—without relief—in his efforts to obtain a cure he discovered this UNEQUALLED REMEDY, which cured him in the short space of eight weeks.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

HOW TO WIN A NOBLE NAME.

Would'st thou win a noble name
In the coming ages?
Would'st thou earn a future fame
In historians' pages?
Listen, then, and thou shalt hear
How thou may'st attain it—
Bravely working many a year,
In the end thou'lt gain it.

Enter boldly on the fight,
Good with Bad is waging,
In the sacred cause of right
All thy soul engaging.
Care not though the world may frown
On thine earnest striving,
Error must be overthrown—
Truth is ever thriving.

Heed thou, lest a bigot's zeal,
Thwart thy good intentions;
Mix not up the simple truth
With dim, obscure inventions.
Have a faith in man and God,
Pure and ardent burning;
In thy chosen pathway plod,
From it never turning.

Live not for thyself, but others
By thy working cherish;
Round thee thou hast many brothers,
Who, neglected, perish.
Sisters erring, weak and frail,
Whom, by kindly teaching,
Thou may'st raise within the pale
They despair of reaching.

ELLEN KENWAY.

I.

A sombre autumn evening on the beach at Southaven; and a steamer, just left the wooden pier, has ploughed up the bright water into foam, leaving a long wake of turbulence, and fouling the evening air with a tall pillar of smoke, that dispersed into wreathing clouds stretching far over the town.

There are many strollers on the wide, sheltering beach, many idlers and health-seekers. Away from these, along the shore, where it is little frequented, a girl is sitting alone on the shingle. You would hardly call her handsome, her features are a little too strongly marked for sculptural beauty, perhaps. There are some women whose beauty does not strike one all at once; it grows on us. Ellen Kenway was one of these. As she sits huddled up by the rocks on the beach, you can scarcely judge how dainty and well-formed is her figure, though rather small; but you can see she has jet-black hair, and large liquid eyes shaded by long lashes, and a delicate complexion, usually too pale, but now in a glow almost transparent.

It is a lovely sight before her. Close to her feet creeps up the snowy foam that the wave leaves for an instant on the opaque, dull bank of shingle, to die away the next, as in a dream, into tremulous threads of frosty silver, which are drawn back with the swash of the water, and wound again into the salt breast of the great sea. Ellen has taken no note of the scene; her whole thoughts and affections are wound up in the heart of Henry Elsey, like the wave threads in the ocean, none the less though believing she has poured out her heart's treasure as uselessly and hopelessly as a vial of precious attar wasted on the ground. Her eyes are fixed on the distant steamer fading away from her sight like the happiness from her life, and as she looks, two big, fierce tears grow into the dark eyes and glaze them over for a moment, but do not fall. She ought to have wept, and let the tears come. They would have brought calm, and with it truer perception, for tears clear the mental vision wonderfully at times. But with an effort she drove them back to scorch her heart instead of her eyes.

Perhaps, if you know the facts Ellen Kenway was in trouble about, you will be better able to judge of them than from the distorted picture her thoughts presented.

Mr. Robert Elsey was a very popular surveyor in the early railroad days, and had made a great deal of money by his profession. Although he had brought up his son Henry in his own office, he had no intention that he should succeed to his connection, for two reasons: first, because he intended to retire altogether from money-getting pursuits in a twelvemonth, and thenceforward to make a gentleman of his son; and next, because Henry Elsey was too delicate in health to follow any profession whatever, with a prospect of success.

On coming down to Southaven, the surveyor and his son made a good many friends among the influential people interested in the new line. I think Henry Elsey got through more picnics, and dinner parties, and musical evenings than surveying, during his stay. At all events, a tall, handsome young man of two-and-twenty, with good looks, easy manners and bright prospects, he was in great request. Besides, Doctor Lorry liked him; and, as Doctor Lorry concentrated in himself the entire good will of the townspeople, that was quite enough to make Henry Elsey a general favorite. It was at a picnic party he first met Ellen Kenway. He did not fall in love with her at first sight, but he admired her, and was fascinated by her, he hardly knew how much, till one day he awoke to the conviction that he was very much in love with her, and knew no happiness but in Ellen's society. This conviction grew on him; he became a frequent visitor at her house, till he had avowed his passion, and found it warmly returned.

With Ellen it was different: she loved Henry Elsey before the first day they met was over. The Southaven people declared she lost no opportunity of throwing herself in his way, and trying to secure a wealthy match. This is not correct; but that she loved him wildly and jealously was for her peace sadly true. She was not a match for him in point of position, the Southaven people said, and if by this they meant the position that money gives, they were right, for Ellen and her sister Lucy were the only children of a deceased clergyman, who left their mother nothing but a very small life annuity on which to bring up her two daughters. But that she loved Henry Elsey for his money's sake is a cruel falsehood. She would have loved him the same if he had not had a penny in the world.

It was not till the day before they were leaving Southaven, that Henry Elsey told his father of the state of his feelings towards Ellen Kenway. Now, Robert Elsey was not an unduly proud man as regarded himself, but he fondly overestimated his son, and his abilities, and the position he ought to take in life. A widower, moreover, and lonely in the world save his son, he was selfishly fearful lest any one, man or woman, should supplant him in that son's affections. He worshipped his son, and knowing that the cankerworm of consumption was already undermining his boy's life, he wished to keep Henry to himself until the end, which he knew could not be many years distant; or, if he could not do this, he wished at least to see him make some wealthy match as soon as his projected retirement allowed his introduction into better society.

Robert Elsey tried to reason with his son, but found reason unavailing against passion, and though he tried it long and patiently, he was fain at last to contend with his son's weapon—he tried passion too. It was new to Henry, for it was the first time he had ever had angry words from his father, and it made him gentler in his pleadings, though not less earnest. Robert Elsey, however, gave as his ultimatum that his son should break off the engagement unconditionally, on pain of being cut off immediately from present and future enjoyment of any part of his father's wealth; but that, provided he would give his word neither to see Ellen Kenway nor write to her for two years, if still desirous to renew the engagement at the end of that time, he would oppose no further hindrance to their union.

Henry Elsey was not the man to throw off all restraint, to rush into the world on his own resources, and carve name, and fame, and money to lay at the feet of a wife. To begin with, he had not the physical power. He could suffer better than he could do. When he had reflected a bit, he began to see that if he left his father it would take him at least as long to realize by his own exertions a very humble position to marry upon (even supposing his health endured the test) as the time he had to wait for his father's sanction. Still, he could not but feel that two years of his precarious life were like twenty taken from that of a hale and strong man.

Henry had one last interview with Ellen Kenway, and told her much of this. But though silent, she was unsatisfied. Loving him wildly and unreasoningly as she did, she would have had him break all ties of kith and kin for her, as she would have done for him. Thoughtless, or careless rather, of consequences, she believed him cold when he loved as deeply if not as madly as she. But Ellen was very quiet, dangerously quiet, and kept her thoughts in her heart, and they burnt it up. She thought him strangely guarded in his reference to the time when the two years' probation should be past, and she doubted his sincerity. She did not know he feared to raise his own hopes, much less hers, about a time which, for aught he knew, might find his head pillowed on the sod instead of on his Ellen's breast. He left her promising so far to jesuitise his promise to his father as to write a note once a month to her sister Lucy, as a token that he was living and faithful to Ellen so long as he continued to write.

If Ellen had known what he felt when he had carried away with him the feelings he would not exhibit before her, if Ellen had seen him walking that shore near where she sits at midnight, and heard his passionate cry for strength to endure and for life to last till he could make her his wife, she would not now be sitting in trouble upon the beach, pressing handfuls of sand between her hot fingers till the pebbles make the blood come, and crying to herself, "I would give my soul for that man's love."

It is a bad case when doubt takes possession of a woman's heart. A man will reason it out; women don't as a rule. They nurse it and keep it warm till it festers into distrust. It was mistaken kindness in Henry Elsey not to have told her that gloomy forebodings about his own life made him so quiet and reserved at their parting, while Ellen, mistaking the flush on his cheek for that of health, did not know of that anxiety. So that, when she turned over in her mind all that had passed between them twain, she began to doubt whether Henry Elsey had not been trifling with her love, and after amusing himself with her heart for a few months, had not sought the most merciful mode of ending a tie that was getting troublesome by talking of a broken engagement with a two year's silence, so that the whole weight of the blow might not come at once, but her love die a lingering death.

Perhaps she had been too eager, had craved too much for his love at first, had led him farther than he intended, until what he might have meant as a passing diversion had become irksome because serious, and needful to be stopped. It was this thought that made the fierce tears grow in her eyes for an instant, till pride drove them back to her heart.

II.

I do not think Ellen ever expected he would keep his word about the letters to her sister very long—only long enough to break the blow a little to her. And when, after a few months had passed bringing letters to Lucy for Ellen's eye, and each note became shorter and more guarded (colder, Ellen thought), I believe she was quite prepared for the time that came and brought no letter at all, and that grew from month to month till near a year elapsed with no letter, no news, no token from him she loved so dear. She found out that Henry Elsey had left London and gone away, somewhere abroad it was said, but she could learn no other tidings of him. Indeed, as things had turned out so much as she had feared when she sat that autumn evening on the shore and watched him carried away from her in the little steamer, Ellen ought to have raked out the embers of the fire that still burned in her breast with nothing to feed upon but her heart, and let the flame die out. But there are fires that burn in earthen temples like those that glow on Parsee altars, and never go out till the broken lamp itself is taken away to the Tower of Silence. Smothered fire, even, will break out again, sometimes after long intervals, like the flames of the fire-spirits of the gloomy caverns of the earth, that even the superimposed mass of an Etna or a Vesuvius will not keep down.

Ellen never blamed Henry Elsey. Had she done so she might soon have scared the wound in her heart, and it would have healed and left at most a scar. Though she was hopelessly convinced he had only amused himself with her, it never occurred to her to complain of man's making a plaything of so brittle and precious a toy as a woman's heart. She blamed herself for thinking of him and for loving him, and beside that, nothing but the cruel necessity that made her go on loving him helplessly.

Time is a gentle nurse, and soothes and softens down most strong feelings of good and evil, and it quieted Ellen, until the fire seemed to die out. It withdrew from all its outposts and sacrificed all its advanced trenches, in order to concentrate itself in one smouldering corner of her heart, as a band of insurgents, beaten in desultory warfare, will take up their abode in secret mountain fastness, from which nothing will ever dislodge them.

By-and-by care came, and trouble to the Kenways. The local bank in which Mrs. Kenway's annuity had been purchased failed, paying only a dividend of five shillings in the pound, and leaving the family thenceforth in receipt of only a fourth of their previous humble income. There might be enough still to keep their mother from want; but it was clear they must leave their neat little home for lodgings, and that both the girls must seek some way of earning their own livelihood. Lucy, the meeker spirit of the two, at once determined on seeking a situation as governess, and very soon succeeded in obtaining one through the help of friends. Ellen thought she should be at least able to support herself by giving lessons in music, in which she was no mean proficient. She went to Doctor Lorry to ask his advice on the subject.

If ever there was a genuine, good, kind-hearted man in the world, Dr. Lorry of Southaven was one. He was always helping some one with advice, or money, or a cheery word, and his advice and his pleasant words did as much good as his money, they said, or his physic. He was by common consent the general confident of the little town. He knew everybody's business, and had a hand in it, too, where a helping one was needed; and yet he very assiduously minded his own. There was only one other doctor in Southaven then; and when Dr. Lorry's popularity nearly ruined his opponent at the outset, it was he who set him on his legs again, and lent him capital without interest, and got him appointed to the Infirmary, and recommended him patients. Doctor Lorry was by no means a rich man, and yet he never wanted money to do good with. He never seemed to have any money, in fact, unless it was wanted to help some one else. He had been an intimate friend of Ellen's father, and always a welcome visitor at her mother's house since her father's death. But then he was welcome everywhere. There never was a doctor so welcome, in sickness or in health, as Doctor Lorry. I believe, had he not been half the wise and skillful physician that he was, the Southaven people would have paid him for his hopeful looks and cheery smiles. It was difficult to feel ill when you only looked at him—the very sight of him did you good.

Ellen Kenway had never lost the half wondering awe and esteem with which she regarded him ever since, as a little child, he used to take her on his knee and say, with a smile before which infantine disorders quailed in despair, "And how is my little friend to-day?" She thought him so wise then, and found him so good and genuine as she grew up, that she always reverenced him.

I should not like to say Doctor Lorry was a tidy man. But then he never had been married. As he came rushing in from the surgery to see Ellen, with the sleeves of a shabby coat turned back, and his black clothes all dusted over with white powder, he was not that, certainly. But he was such a busy man, always in a hurry. He had always just "been somewhere, and was going somewhere else in ten minutes." Nor had he a single handsome feature under his shaggy grey hair—that he used himself to say wore out a hair-brush in a fortnight in the vain endeavor to subjugate it—to afford excuse for a complaint on his appearance. He was only a straight-grown, square-headed man of five-and-forty, with the cheeriest voice and the frankest smile to light up his large plain face into the reverent beauty of good looks.

"My dear Miss Kenway," he said panting, but laughing fatigue to scorn, "I've been up all night and busy all day, and am off in ten minutes to Chillingworth, and I shall not be home till evening. I know all you have got to say, and I consider yours a favorable case—a little low, perhaps, but we'll soon pick that up; only music-lessons won't do, it's like physic to me to hear of it. Now," he continued, "do you think your dear mother would give me a bit of supper to-night when I get back? You won't mind if I tell you I've just sent some birds to Mrs. Kenway, will you? Now, don't there's a dear girl, think I am presuming on the loss of that little bit of money of yours. Nothing of the kind. The fact is, people will send me birds and things to that extent that I tremble to think I have at this blessed moment enough game in the house to transport half-a-dozen poachers. I don't know what to do with it. And there's one of those advertising wine merchants just sent me a lot of bottles as samples. I can't take wine till evening; so, good-bye."

He was not a polite man, you see. This was his abrupt way always; for he seemed to be locally omniscent, and knew all about people, and if he had a fault as a doctor, it was that he would never let a patient indulge in that lugubrious relief which the sick enjoy of detailing, with morbid relish the nature and symptoms of their complaints. His jovial smile seemed to recognize every ailment, moral or physical, as an old acquaintance; and he would tell you he knew all about you, and all about your disorders, and didn't want to hear you talk, then go and talk so fast himself that it was a mercy he didn't. Then, before you could reply, he would catch up his hat and talk himself out of the room, and talk himself down stairs, and you would hear his voice talking against the front door till it slammed him out into the street, and you began to wonder how ever he knew what was the matter with you.

At nine o'clock the doctor bustled in to sup with Mrs. Kenway—off his own game and his own wine—and he chattered all supper time so blithely that Mrs. Kenway and her daughter caught some of his humor, and would have hardly realized for the moment, even if they had thought, that they were nearly penniless and knew not where to turn in the future. And after supper Doctor Lorry insisted on having a sample of the music-lessons Ellen was talking about, and then he would sing, and make her accompany him.

"Now, Miss Kenway," he said, when she had done, "I must be going; I have a broken leg and a measles to see to-night, but music teaching won't do for you. Now you are prescribed for. And, oh, by the way, my dear Mrs. Kenway what a fortunate thing for Southaven this railway is. Property is fetching fabulous prices about your part. Now, you are thinking of leaving your cottage there, I know all about it, you know, and I suppose you will sell it, and directly you do you will have that little rascal of a Guyatt down on you to snap it up for a song. Now I don't want to take advantage, but if you will give me the first offer of it you'll do me a great favor—you will indeed. I'll get it valued for you; well, Guyatt shall value it if you like; so we'll consider that settled."

Next morning early he went and fixed that "little rascal Guyatt," an estate agent and valuer, who by the way was as good a friend as the doctor had in Southaven.

"I can't stop a minute, my dear fellow; but just go down this morning and value Mrs. Kenway's house for me, and get the conveyance drawn up at once. I think property is looking up here, owing to the railway. You'll just value it at nine hundred pounds, and get it transferred sharp before somebody outbids me, do you see?"

"My dear doctor, that won't do; why, it is not honestly worth more than——"

"Nonsense, Guyatt, your liver is out of order. I'll send you a pill and draught when I get home; but you get this done at once, and don't tell everybody else my business. I mean to make money out of it."

I believe he led Mrs. Kenway to suppose he was thinking of selling the cottage and garden to a hotel company as soon as the line was opened, and going to clear a heap of money by his bargain. At all events, he told her that he could do nothing at all with it for some time to come, and insisted on her remaining for the present as his tenant.

From that time Dr. Lorry became a frequent visitor at Mrs. Kenway's, and grew very fond indeed of hearing more of Ellen's music-lessons, as he called her pianoforte playing. And one day Doctor Lorry asked Ellen to be his wife. Although till lately she had never thought of him at all as a lover, and only respected him as a dear, kind friend, Ellen had, with her woman's foresight, detected some time before the meaning of the doctor's continuous visits. But though she knew beforehand what was coming, she was still unprepared with an answer. She loved Henry Elsey, faithful or faithless, with all her heart. She did not love Doctor Lorry, though she reverenced him for his kindliness of heart and his goodness to everybody. She even half doubted if his proposal was not dictated in some sort by a wish to benefit her family, as part of his scheme of universal benevolence, and not for her own sake. She wronged him here in her thoughts.

She told Doctor Lorry frankly of her love for Henry Elsey, and that she feared she could never love him as he deserved for his goodness to her mother, to her, and to everybody else; that she loved him as a kind, dear friend, but that he deserved a noble, true-hearted wife when he did marry, and not a foolish girl, who could never be to him all a wife should.

"My dear Miss Kenway," he said, "I feel I ask you to be my wife under a disadvantage. The worst of it is, I have no doubt you feel under some fancied obligation to me about any little trifles I may have done for your mother. Believe me truly, I had no thought of asking you to be my wife then, or of buying your love. I am an old man, compared with you. It has only lately seemed hard to me to think of passing away from the earth without knowing the sweetness of a wife's love. I do not ask you to crush out all the old memories of your heart. It is sad to kill the scent of a dried flower. I do not ask from you the love you could give Henry Elsey. But if you can only think of me in the light of a husband, I am sure you will do your duty to me as a wife, and I love you as I can love no other woman. Take time to decide, Ellen, and let me know;" and he kissed her on the forehead as he had done when she was a little child, and went out.

Ellen consulted with her mother, and laid her heart bare before her.

"I cannot love him, mother," she said. "I can only be his wife. I love Henry Elsey, and him only." Her mother knew that all their future depended on her daughter's decision, but she was silent. She would not influence her child's mind, though she knew it was a question between penury and comfort for life; and life is long, whatever poets say.

I think if she had spoken out, it would have been different. If she had been angry, and told her child their bread depended upon her accepting Doctor Lorry, Ellen would have said, "Mother, there is bread enough for you; I will go and earn mine as Lucy has done." Or, had she begged her daughter not to sacrifice her heart for her mother's sake, it wanted so little to move Ellen, that I think she would have said, "Mother, I will work for you, you shall not want; but forgive me in this, for my heart does not love him." But those mute tears did it.

And in six weeks, for the Doctor was a hasty, busy man, Ellen Kenway promised to love, honor, and obey Richard Lorry.

III.

Ellen did honor Doctor Lorry and did obey him, he was so good. He prescribed companionship for her mother, and brought Lucy away from her situation to act as his prescription, that Mrs. Kenway might not be lonely in the little cottage. All the excuses he made for looking after their welfare, some shamelessly transparent, and others inscrutably dark, need not be told here. Suffice it to say the Kenways wanted for nothing, there was always some artfully arranged surprise in store for them, yet so managed that they should be pained by no feeling of obligation. But Doctor Lorry did not know the wealth of love that lay hidden and dormant in his wife's heart, and which she could not give him. And yet Ellen sought to do her duty as a wife, and went through all the ritual with as much fervor as would pass for devotion from many a colder spirit. But in her heart of hearts she loved Henry Elsey still, though she struggled against it, and fought against it, and meekly went about her daily duties, respecting her husband all the while so earnestly, she would humbly have kissed the ground he walked upon, whilst she despised herself for so much as injuring him in thought.

Perhaps, I am not sure, if Ellen had had more of her husband's company she would have stifled this out into a dead memory, whereof only the fragrance should have remained. But Doctor Lorry's life was very much what it was before his marriage. He was seldom home, always full of plans to make every one happy—his wife among the rest—and bustling about on everybody's business. Ellen was too exacting in her disposition, too selfish and covetous, to be satisfied with aught but a man's whole heart at any cost; and much as she honored and admired her husband's generous devotion to others, she thought it robbed her of too much of his time and his thoughts, leaving her only a share of what she would have all and undivided. Nevertheless, I have said Ellen did not love Doctor Lorry—love him, that is as she could love; and yet she would have all his time and attention and thoughts to herself; and still yet she knew he loved her deeply, if undemonstratively. I have not said Ellen was unreasonable. But Ellen was a woman.

Two years passed away, and found Mrs. Lorry with a little girl of twelve months old, with the brightest, happiest smile that ever gladdened another's heart. Little Effie was almost as popular in Southaven as Doctor Lorry himself, and went about nearly as much for the purpose of exhibiting to admiring friends the astonishing proficiency she had attained in the use of her mottled little limbs. And yet, though she loved her little child tenderly, and respected her husband above all the world, Mrs. Lorry was not quite happy.

IV.

It was getting on for the twilight of an October evening when Mrs. Lorry took a quiet walk alone upon the beach. The air was chilly and the sands nearly deserted, but it suited Ellen's humor to be alone. She walked on till she came to the place where, four years before, sitting on the shingle, she had seen the steamer fade into the distance bearing Henry Elsey away from her sight. There she sat down.

The sea was breaking heavily along the coast, while the beach answered back its blows with sonorous peals. Then as each wave subsided into countless heaving eddies and whirls among the rocks in its retreat, the distant shore took up the peal and flapped and reverberated it against the far white cliffs, till it died away in silent echoes, that mingled with the hiss of the coming wave.

As she sat there listening to the murmurous ocean, and toying absently with the sands, she opened to herself the secret casket of her heart, that contained all the old embalmed memories of Henry Elsey, and spread out before her thoughts all the tokens of his faithless love which recollection still treasured up. She thought of what might have been could she have lavished her heart upon him, and wondered how it would have ended after all. And she thought of her husband and how, with all his goodness, her expectations were but disappointed, and her life lonely. She thought of her little Effie, and it came into her mind how wrong, and wicked and ungrateful she was, that her disappointments were of her own making, and that she would try earnestly to forget all the past and to give her husband her whole heart.

The twilight was deepening, and the clouds faded into a gathering haze of obscurity, leaving only the restless sea gleaming, still white, out of the dusk.

"Ellen," cried a voice, broken with joyful passion. "Darling, I have been faithful."

And in a moment, and before she had time for thought or reply, she was in his arms, and Henry Elsey's kisses burned upon her lips.

The next instant she had torn herself from his embrace; said, "Henry, I am Doctor Lorry's wife;" and while he yet stood transfixed and speechless at the words, she ran from him with a cry, and never stopped nor looked back till she found herself in her husband's house.

"Help me, my husband," she cried, trembling, and with tears, "for Henry Elsey has come back, and I have seen him, and I am afraid I love him still."

Doctor Lorry hushed and soothed her silently as a tearful child until she was calmer. Then, after a little thought, he said—

"And you shall see him again, dear wife; for if Henry Elsey is in Southaven he shall sup with us to night."

There was not a particle of jealousy or distrust in his nature, and he felt sure that Henry Elsey had a great deal to say to Ellen, which, perhaps, ought to be said, and had better be said under her husband's house than elsewhere. And in a minute Doctor Lorry was hurrying down the passage, unheedful or unmindful of his wife's earnest words—

"Do n't let him come, Richard—husband dear, keep him away from me."

But he found him, and presently the two men came in, the younger haggard and pale, and such a contrast to her hale husband with the hearty laugh.

The renewed meeting was reserved and quiet, and the meal passed in a painful and constrained manner, whilst even the Doctor's cheery humor fell flat, and for once was a dead failure. Supper over, he said—

"Now, I know very well, Mr. Elsey, all about your old engagement to Mrs. Lorry, and that there may be many little things you would like to talk over. I'm just off to see a couple of patients, and I'll be back and have a cigar with you in an hour."

And they two were left alone.

Ellen hardly knew afterwards how he explained himself, for her tears and excitement; but she knew Henry Elsey had loved her deeply all the long while. He had been ill, she knew; he had not written because he thought it kinder to let her suppose his had been a light love, than for her to wait and helplessly mourn for him during the remainder of a long sickness that, it was thought, death must soon end. She knew after a long time he had been away abroad to a warmer climate, and that there he had slowly regained a little health, that his physician said might, with care, protract his life for some years; but it had been terribly slow work. His father had died in the meantime, leaving him his property; and now, after lingering for years between life and death, he had made the first use of feeble health, which he never expected to regain, to come and lay his heart and his little life at her feet only to find her another's—a generous minded man's—who had put his honor in his keeping, and shut his mouth from saying more, for was he not her husband's guest? But she knew he had been faithful.

The doctor came home very cheerful, and chatted blithely about his patients and the gossip of the town, for he felt himself put upon his mettle to dissipate the traces of tears from his wife's cheeks, and to restore cheerfulness. Presently Henry Elsey left, and then Ellen broke out sobbing, and said, "Richard, dear, for the love of heaven don't let him come again—don't let me see him any more. I cannot bear it." And Doctor Lorry promised, and sought to comfort his wife, for he knew she had loved Henry Elsey.

He came once more, however. It was only a professional visit, but Ellen met him passing through the hall, and could not refuse to speak. Any one might have heard what she said—

"Good-bye, Mr. Elsey; don't despise me for being faithless."

"I cannot," he replied, "I am alone to blame. If ever you want to know where one lives who would render you service at the cost of his life, here is my address"—and he gave her a card—adding, "Forgive my saying so much. Good-bye." And he wrenched her hand so earnestly it made her give a cry of pain as he went out.

Ellen blamed herself, never him. She had been faithless, he faithful. And the old hidden fire leaped up into a fierce flame, that burnt up right, and truth, and duty, and consumed her heart's purity, like the fire that fell and burned up the altar and the sacrifice, and the water that was round about in the trenches.

A few days did it. Then she left Southaven, and shut herself out from her home and her little child, her mother and sisters, and all the sweet ties that bind up the pure already in sheaves in this world, to carry away with her the gnawing fire that burns for ever and ever. She left an open note on her table.

HUSBAND,—Forget me, always and for ever unworthy of you. Let little Effie think I died, and never know. ELLEN LORRY.

She found her way to the address Henry Elsey had given—it was her own doing, not his—and came into his room.

"Henry," she said, "I am come. I will go to the world's end with you. Take me away where I can forget and shut out the past, and not see or know his trouble."

It was not easy. The world is so small, you cannot get more than a dozen thousand miles away at most from the spot of any given grief or crime, and memory will reach farther than that—from this world into the next, it is said.

He took her away, and they traveled abroad and passed a life of excitement and pleasure that was wild and fearful in its intensity, and terrible and wearisome in its unrest. Switzerland, Germany, Italy, France, Spain—they tried them all in turn, but Ellen was restless, and would remain nowhere long; she wearied of constant wandering, and yet craved for the very excitement that palled on her.

At last Henry Elsey sickened and died, and she was left alone in a strange land; rich enough, as the world talks, but poor and wretched, and beggared of all that women hold dear—a self-branded outcast, shrinking from the pity of friends worse than the coldness of strangers; longing for the quiet home that was lost to her for ever, whilst she perished of heart-hunger and distress, nameless, in a far-off country. No home, and in a strange land.

There was only one thing Ellen looked forward to, for the wicked never look far forward. She yearned to see her little child again, and then to die.

It was a long journey, but she made it, and before she came to Southaven she tried to disguise herself in poor clothes. It was quite needless. No one who had known Ellen Kenway as Mrs. Lorry, seven years before, would ever have recognized her now. Something made her go first to the churchyard—perhaps her mother might be there. But no. There was none of her home-friends there that she could find.

She went on like a guilty thing up to Doctor Lorry's house. How she knew every window and shutter, and the old-fashioned front door, and the clean stone steps she had passed over as a bride—their very whiteness now reproaching her with pollution. She hung about in the shadow of the surgery lamp, waiting till she could think how to gain accessto the house without being seen.

Presently Doctor Lorry came out. He passed close, and never knew her. The lamplight shone full on his face as he brushed slowly by. Oh, how he was altered! His brisk step exchanged for a slow, labored walk, his face livid and careworn, and his hair white—white as snow. It was all white, and pure, and bright except her heart. Even the sorrow that had changed her husband's hair had bleached it pure white.

At last Ellen crept down the area steps to the kitchen. Perhaps their old servant might still be there. Timidly and trembling she knocked. The door was opened. Yes, the same dear, old motherly woman who had taken little Effie from her breast many, many a time.

"Do n't you know me?" sobbed Ellen, the tears streaming down.

"No, bless you," said the old servant; "but I see you are in trouble, dear soul. Come in and rest a minute, and tell me what is the matter," and she led her in.

Ellen sat by the deal table, full in the light, and took off her bonnet and let her hair down (grey, now) as she used to wear it.

"Heaven help us all!" cried the old woman; "but it is Mrs. Lorry. Oh, ma'am, the Lord forgive you, but you've broken his heart."

"Do n't, Ann, do n't. Have pity," Ellen cried with bitter sobs. "I know, I know. I have come back only for a little. I could not bear for him to know me. I saw him pass just now, and know it is true. But I want to look upon my little child before I die. I will not disturb her sleep. I will kiss her so softly she shall not wake, and then I will creep down and go out, and never trouble you any more for ever."

"Oh, mercy, missus," the good old woman said, wringing her hands, "do n't take on—do n't, there's a dear creature, for dear love; but you will never wake darling Miss Effie with your kisses any more—she has laid in the churchyard these three years."

With an exceeding great and bitter cry, Ellen ran out into the night, her head bare, her long hair fluttering in the bleak wind. She hurried on till she came to the long, dark beach, where the white waves were rolling in, angrily leaping upon the shore. There she flitted down to where the foam of the last wave was hissing and seething on the shingle, and, her feet already wet with the salt sea, stretched out her hands to confide her bitter remorse to its silent breast.

V.

"Why, my dear Ellen, if we have n't been looking for you for the last hour, and I 've been hunting all over town to find you. I 've been to mother's, and goodness only knows where, and here you are, sitting alone on the shore at ten o'clock at night, with the water up to your ankles."

Ellen looked up in amazement. There was Doctor Lorry, sure enough. She could not see his face, for it was so dark, but his voice did n't sound at all as if he was broken down with sorrow. She could hardly believe her own eyes.

"Kiss me, my own dear, good husband," she cried; "and tell me it is not true that I dare not hold you in my arms and love you with all my heart."

"I do n't know about that," said the doctor, kissing her and laughing outright, "but there is no mistake but what you are doing it at present, bless your heart. But it 's quite true that you must have been sound asleep here for three hours, the last part of the time with your feet in the water, and a great mercy it happens to be salt, and that you have a doctor for your husband. But what is this, my little wife? Tears?"

"Oh, thank heaven, my dear husband, thank heaven they are tears, and that they were only wept in a dream; for I have been foolish and wicked, and I can now love you with all my heart."

Oh, those white steps of home, how welcome they looked, and the bright windows that smiled welcome. But if you could have seen Mrs. Lorry run up to her little Effie's cot that night; and wake her up to be kissed, and fondled, and cried over, it would have done you good. She quite surprised poor old Ann, the housekeeper, by running down stairs and shaking hands with her, and kissing her on the forehead, and calling her a dear old thing.

After supper Helen came and nestled her head against her husband's breast, in supreme thankfulness to Him who sometimes guides sleeping thoughts now, as he did of old, to bless and sanctify waking hours.

"Ellen," said the doctor, very quietly for him, "I have something to show you that is sad—a letter. Can you bear to see it now?"

Yes, she could bear anything by him and with him.

So Doctor Lorry smoothed out a letter from his pocket, and laid it before her.

It was dated two days back, and ran thus:—

London, October 11th, 1849.

MY DEAR ELLEN,—I cannot die without letting you know I have loved you always to the end. I knew I should never be able to call you my wife, and it seemed to me it would be cruel to keep you waiting for you to be a widow, perhaps, as soon as you were a bride. I did not think to have lasted so long as this. The physicians have kept me alive by sending me to Madeira for two years; but I wanted to come home to die. Perhaps I did wrong in not telling you this; forgive me if so; it was meant in kindness and love. Perhaps I might have told you, but when I was well enough to write, I heard you had married Doctor Lorry—a man I respect and love—and I did not wish to disturb your peace. You have a good and noble husband. Love him for my sake and his own. Heaven bless you and him. I have been faithful.

HENRY ELSEY.

The letter was enclosed open in an envelope to Doctor Lorry. He was not jealous when his wife kissed it thankfully.

It was strange that Ellen should have dreamed so truthfully of the reason Henry Elsey had not written, and it was singular, too, that Henry Elsey died at nine o'clock that same night that she had dreamed of meeting him on the shore.—Cassell's Magazine.

LIKE UNTO BARKER.

A FRAGMENT.

When, some years ago, we listened, in this city, to the expoundings of Professor Barker, as he lucidly presented his scheme of the "winding-up scheme of all things," and showed us how the orbits of all the planets were getting smaller, and were gradually winding themselves up closer and closer to their centrals, like a boy winds up a leaden bullet on the end of a string around his finger; we did not feel so uneasy at the prospect of finding our planet and its inhabitants some fine morning falling splug into the sun, thereafter to stick like a wart on a man's nose—as we have done since we discover that the same fearful view of our destiny has been published to the world by a scion ific gentleman in the columns of the Boston Investigator.

According to our Utah friend, the Professor, the mountain chains were not upheavals from beneath as commonly supposed, but our own moons which, after giving us light for a sufficient period, got tired of the job, and following the movements of a spiral curve, one after another came squash on the earth's face like a soft crab, spreading themselves out in ridges, hollows and bumps, which we have vainly supposed to be portions of our own identical earth, but which have, really, no connection with this establishment, and could be easily removed from the earth proper by a knife passed underneath them—if you only had one big enough.

"Out of the mouth of two or three witnesses," it is said, and so Mr. Potter of Schroon Lake bears unconscious testimony to friend Barker of Salt Lake—perhaps these lakes have something to do with those remarkable views;—but Potter goes beyond Barker, and not only accounts for the existence of our continents by the falling of our old moons, but he explains the origin of our many colored races thereby, each of them belonging to a moon, which, when it fell, brought a different colored race upon this earth! As we have now but one moon left to fall upon us, it would be interesting to learn about where it may be expected to fall, if within a hundred years; if after that period—as we don't expect to live longer than that—it is of no consequence. As we have men of nearly every shade of color from black to white now upon the earth, it would also be interesting to learn from Mr. Potter what might the next shade of color be expected to be;—but we had better give the Mr. Potter's letter:—

MR. EDITOR:—When the world was created is unknown to us. When the human race was created is also unknown. The Caucassian race were the first inhabitants of this earth.

I suppose that Africa is the native country of the negro. Geological discoveries also have shown—that our earth has had five moons, or more, revolving round her in a former age, and that the formation of a strata of rock shows that many hundreds of feet below the present surface of the earth, a surface has been exposed to the action of the sea, light and heat, by the existence of shells, fish, gravel and marine and other plants; and that not merely one instance of this kind, but at least four consecutive layers or deposits of great depths betwe n each of the four surfaces.

I suppose that the great flood, was occasioned by one of these moons coming to the earth, which event was foretold by ancient philosophers and astronomers, who lived in those times.

I suppose that these moons were inhabited by different races of men—as many as are on the earth now.

I suppose that one moon, called Africa, was inhabited by the black race, a second one by the Mongolians, a third by the Malayans, a fourth by the Caucassians, and a fifth by the Americans.

I suppose that the flood recorded in the Bible was foreseen by Noah, who saw a moon approaching, and was satisfied that when it should come to the earth it would cause a great disturbance in the waters, and who, therefore, built the Ark, and entered it with all his family and the animals.

The floods come immediately.

Heaven, as commonly believed, is in the sun, to which this earth is being attracted. In due time the moon will be attracted to this earth, and drawn with it to the sun, where they will be smelted like a piece of iron in a furnace. Thus will be accomplished what is foretold in Scripture:—The elements will melt with fervent heat. * * * *

As heaven is to be in the Sun, and the earth is going there, it is comforting to think that we are all bound to reach that divine abode, if it is in a rather hurried manner. Whenever our earth is about coming in contact with this heavenly globe, it is to be hoped that due notice will be given, so that we may all get over on the other side; for to be squeezed to death, or mashed to pieces, between Earth and Heaven is contrary to our Theology, which objects to "forcing people even into the New Jerusalem against their will."

FOR A CORNER.

How we tremble as we see death marching on, laying desolate so many homes, lest he should stop once more to trail his icy garments over some loved one, on the light of whose smile so much of our happiness depends. In our selfish love we forget that the departure which causes us so much sorrow opens to them the portal of unalloyed happiness. Their trials are ended and a few short years at most will reunite us where parting will be no more. No more pain or death. And oh, how sweet the thought! to enjoy all our treasured dreams of purity, and love to bask beneath our Father's smile of approbation, and carry on our work of doing good. How strange the thought, when we look around upon forms blooming with youth and vitality, to think that we are all fellow-travelers on the road to death; that this little speck called time, hour by hour insidiously draws us on, casting us eventually upon the broad ocean of eternity. In the midst of all this, how good it is to realize, in the language of the poet, that—

"Life is ever lord of death,
And love will ever claim its own."

A VIEW OF EARLY TIMES.

OR, HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

CHAPTER V.

I believe I am on sure historical grounds, when I assert that the mechanical, social and philosophical developments, that render the nineteenth century so glorious in the annals of the world's history, had their origin in the necessities of man in the rudeness of his primitive condition. If the highest aspiration of the first man and woman was satisfied with aprons of fig-leaves as a covering for newly awakened feelings of modesty, we must infer that he had as yet made but slight progress in the mechanical or social arts. Is it too much to say that man did not then realize the need of a hat, a coat, a pair of breeches or a pair of shoes?

We have frequent examples in our own day of a like innocence of all realization of the need of raiment. A young and blooming New Zealand damsel considers herself the envy of her sex, when she is made possessor of a red ribbon and a feather; and considers herself "the observed of all observers," in view of the elegance of her attire, while destitute of the least article of dress beside the aforesaid ribbon and feather.

The King of the Mosquito Indians was made, a few years ago, the happy possessor of a second hand chapeau, and a cast-off military coat with bright epaulets, as a present from the polite captain of one of her Majesty's ships of war. Solomon in all his glory, did not pride himself more on his regal splendor, than did his dusky majesty in his cocked-hat and military coat. Sans breeches, stockings and all.

If the history of man in his primitive estate, as given in the book of Genesis, be true, he must have begun his existence in the new world in almost utter ignorance of all its conditions and his requirements as lord of the earth. Therefore, taking the Bible—that greatest and most ancient of all histories—as our guide in the investigation of the subject, we must infer that the human race began their earth-life at the bottom of the mechanical, social and philosophical scale. Evidently so arranged that he might grow and increase in knowledge;—that progress should characterize his mortal life as it shall and will characterize a future one.

In presenting to our readers the simple story how it was that the world grew from barbarism to the possession of its present arts and sciences, let us first go to Egypt, that land of mystery and enchantment, and trace from its early times the causes which, one by one, have led mankind to the comforts, conveniences and civilizing influences enjoyed to-day.

Lying between the plains of Shinar, or more properly speaking, the vast valleys through which the rivers Tigris and Euphrates flow, the land of Egypt is, with few exceptions, one continued scene of barrenness and desolation, watered by few streams of any size; the sojourners therein dependent, in a great degree, upon the sinking of wells for their supplies of water for themselves and their flocks. In the great exodus of many families and tribes from the parent hive of the human race, Mizraim and his descendants took their way south-west. If they were not herdsmen in the beginning of their migrations, the character of the country soon compelled them to adopt that mode of living. No people could live by the chase in those parched and desolate regions. The rich and succulent grasses, dried and cured by the drought and heat of summer, furnished a never-failing supply of food for their flocks; for the whole land being before them, they could pitch or strike their tents when circumstances compelled, or their love of change led them to do so. Traversing Arabian deserts by easy stages, and breeding and rearing flocks by the way; establishing laws by mutual concession, occasioned by mutual needs, distinctive rights in property became an established principle in their rude jurisprudence. The growth and increase of families into tribes, and tribes into nations, weakened the patriarchal authority, and transferred and subdivided the power of the great head patriarch among numerous representatives of the patriarchal order. The banks of the river Nile were finally reached by the children of Ham. The sight of a beautiful oasis in the midst of the solitudes of a comparative desert, no doubt, filled them with delight. The fruitfulness of the soil first led them to combine a limited agriculture with the rearing of flocks. As they gained experience in the arts of civilization and became localized in their tastes and habits, they, by easy transitions, became established cultivators of the earth. The need of implements, however rude, developed the mechanical arts. The need of more solid and enduring habitations than the tents of skins, schooled them in architectural science. A more compact population necessitated the enactment of social laws of a far higher grade than those needed in a pastoral life; hence, growth and development in social sciences followed as a matter of course. The creative instinct in man is of Divine origin. The combination of the elements in the production of an ocean steamer, that despite wind and tide, traverses the pathless deep, and finds its port of destination thousands of miles away with unerring certainty, is comparatively speaking as much a demonstration of creative power, as the creation of a world. If man through the combined experiences of a few hundred years can do so much, what may he not do with millions of years of experience under happier and more favorable auspices?

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

No. 1.—THE VISION OF THE CROSS.

How strange that the Cæsars, under whose dynasty came the sacrament of the Cross, should, by its emblem, open to humanity the imperial half of the dispensation of the "Son of God."

Every reader of history is familiar with the anecdote of Constantine's vision of the flaming cross in the heavens, inviting him to conquest and the empire of the world by that sacred symbol.

Not unlikely, the circumstance of that miraculous sign is somewhat of a fable, handed down by the early fathers of the Church; yet, even in that case, it would be superficial to philosophise away the vision of the first Christian Emperor, and much more so to treat this famous historical incident as crude imposture. There are both matter and method in it. It is like the capital mark of an era, and there is so much of a corresponding veracity in the entire history of the Constantine period that, in effect, the vision of the cross is a solid and transcendant circumstance. It is a fact that the great general who, more than any other of the successors of Julius Cæsar, resembled his illustrious prototype, did win the empire of the world through the symbol of the cross: the might of its faith in the hearts of his Christian soldiers nerved their arms to cut his path of conquest to the very heart of Rome and to the Cæsar's throne. It is a fact that he was the first Christian emperor, and that the cross became, through him, the symbol of the Roman legions as it did at a later period of all the mighty armies of Christendom.

The philosophical student of history may moreover give to Constantine's vision of the flaming cross a psychological credence—that is to say, believe in the genuineness of the vision—without claiming for it a miraculous origin or the interposition of the heavenly powers. It might have been merely a vision, a thought-dream—a phantom like Macbeth's dagger, of the mind, but one which led the Roman General into the path of glory and power; not hell accursed but blessed of Heaven with great results to a world. These Cæsars and Napoleons do thus dream, do thus see visions in which there is more than human inspirations; and those visions of empire become as grand facts of history. It is a poor infidelity that exhausts itself in caviling over what the faith of ages has received in honest conscience. His mind heated by splendid ambitions and prepared for the genius of an all conquering religion, so harmonious with his own genius—what more likely than that the vision of the flaming cross rose up before the imperial Constantine to lead him on to conquest backed by his christian legions?

Caius Flavius Valerius Claudius Constantine, surnamed the Great, was born A. D. 274, at Naissus, in Upper Mæsia. He was the son of Constantius Chlorus, who in 292 was appointed Cæsar or lieutenant-emperor. The father, whom we must consider as the prelude to the son in the great Christian drama, was a relative of Claudius II and a renowned Roman General. When the empire was divided between Diocletian and Maximian he was honored by the latter with the title of Cæsar, while the former conferred the same honor upon Galerius. The empire was thus divided between four sovereigns, that of the West falling to the share of the father of Constantine. After the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian the two Cæsars succeeded to the dignity of the two Augusti or emperors. Constantius Chlorus was renowned for his great exploits. He recovered Britain, defeated a powerful German army, built the city of Spires on the Rhine, and his dominion extended over England, Illyria, Asia and all the provinces of the East. He ruled with humanity, protected the Christians, loved men of letters and was altogether a magnanimous prince. It is related of him that having issued a decree ordering the faithful, who held places in the state, to sacrifice to idols, some of them in preference resigned their offices under him but the prince recalled them and named them before his court his "true friends." On the other hand, he bitterly reproached the apostates and sent them away saying: "No,—those who are not faithful to God, cannot be devoted servants to the emperor."

From such a father Constantine the Great sprang. The mother of our imperial hero was also illustrious. Her name was Helena: she was a christian princess, and doubtless the faith of the mother early impressed the mind of her son.

Constantine as a youth was remarkable for his noble appearance, his great strength and his exalted courage, for nature had moulded him with the soul and grand ambitions of a conqueror. He was sent to serve under Diocletian as a hostage for his father's loyalty. He distinguished himself in Egypt and Persia, and rose to the rank of Tribune. After the retirement of the two elder emperors, Constantine, fearing the jealousy of Galerius, the new eastern emperor, took refuge in Britain where his father reigned as emperor of the West. While on an expedition against the people of Scotland, Constantius died at Eboracum (York), bequeathing his imperial estate to his son Constantine whom he crowned at York. It was from England therefore that the first Christian emperor sprang, for he was not only of British descent by his mother's side, but in the land of his maternal sires he received from his father's hands the Cæsars crown. The West, from the earliest ages, has led the vanguard of the world's destiny and opened to humanity its new eras. Had christianity itself been confined to the East, it would have expired among the old civilizations which the ages had explored and the races of the decayed empires worn out. But young and vigorous Europe was rising, and barbaric nations were westward moving to remodel empires, and give to humanity a new order of things. But, as a prelude to this, the next movement in the divine epic, Constantine the Great, crowned in York by his father as emperor of the West, was ordained by Providence to march to Rome with his christian legions, meet on his way the vision of the flaming cross, win the undivided throne of the Cæsars, and share the dominion with the followers of Christ.

On the death of Constantius in England, the army of the West immediately proclaimed Constantine their emperor, but Galerius, emperor of the East, disapproved of the election, and appointed Severus as the successor of Constantius, while he recognized our hero as lieutenant emperor. But a new complication arose, for the army and people at Rome elected Maxentius, son of the old emperor Maximian, setting aside Severus. Constantine had now two rivals for his crown of the West, but while they contended violently with each other at Rome, he protected Gaul and the Rhenish frontier against the invasions of the Germanic hordes. It was at this juncture that Maximian came from his retirement and laid claim to his abdicated throne, putting aside Severus by assassination; but, he in turn, was overcome by his own son Maxentius, and forced to take refuge with Constantine. The old emperor, as we have seen, sought to win over his son-in-law to his side by promising to him the succession. Then came his conspiracy and usurpation of the empire of the West, followed by his tragic end in the dungeon of Marseilles.

Maxentius, hearing of his father's death, and having now a popular cause against Constantine, was upon the point of setting out for Gaul in the character of an avenger, when suddenly our hero, "very much like Cæsar under similar circumstances," says a historian, "led his legions to Italy, and, in spite of tremendous odds, triumphantly entered Rome." Just here comes the story of the vision of the flaming cross:

> One evening, while the army of the West was on its march to Rome, Constantine sitting in his tent, his meditative mind lost in its thought-dreams, his cogitations ran upon the perilous enterprise before him, its dangers and uncertainty, its glory, and dominion, should the issue be won. It was evening, the hour was seductive, his reverie partook of the splendor of his own genius and the ambitious inspirations of the conqueror. To minds like his on the eve of such vast occasions there is ever a pregnant desire to hear some oracle of heaven declare the coming fate. Great souls are the most superstitious; and those men who are endowed with that intuitive attribute called genius, are pre-eminently so. Thus was it with Napoleon whose very name suggests to us, if not the sombre superstitions of the monk, the grand superstitions of the conqueror and the empire-founder. When he from the West was about to land in Egypt for the conquest of the East, his mind wrought up by his perilous enterprise, he appealed to his oracle "Fortune." "Oh Fortune, but for two days more!" exclaimed that inspirative soldier. Similar was it with Alexander and Julius Cæsar, and thus now with Constantine the Great, as he sat in his tent at the close of a day momentous to the world. Suddenly, as the sun was declining, so runs the legend, there appeared a pillar of light in the heavens in the form of a cross, with the inscription in the Greek language—"IN THIS OVERCOME!" The extraordinary sign created in our hero an ecstasy of astonishment and a religious awe fell upon him. Forthwith he resolved to profess the faith of the cross. The next day, he caused a royal standard to be made like the flaming symbol which he had seen in the heavens, and commanded it to be borne before him in his wars as an ensign of victory and divine protection. From that time, the cross appeared on the shields of its heroes and the banners of the Roman army.

Scepticism might regard this vision of Constantine as a grand trick of a master mind to more securely win his Christian legions to his side and make them giants in his cause. No soldiers will prove such heroes as God-fearing men—no host of scared warriors destitute of the mighty inspirations of a religious faith can stand before them—none follow a general with such devotion,—none die in his cause with such fortitude. Constantine had seen a glorious example of the character of the soldiers of the cross in the martyrdom of the Theban Legion by the order of his father-in-law, Maximian. Perchance these considerations might have been in his mind when he set out for Rome to battle for an empire. The Christians were a rising people, and they were numerous and powerful at Rome. Their religion manifested an all-prevaling genius, while that of the Romans was degenerated,—the heathenisms of the East altogether worn out. The world needed for the very recuperation of its life-forces a new religious incarnation. Such was the Christian faith. Moreover it possessed the potent unity of the ONE GOD before the towering majesty of whom all forms of idolatry, in the world's upheavings must pass away. Similar views to these the great Mohammed took several centuries after, and similar Constantine might have taken in his day. But while we can imagine that such views did influence him somewhat, we can allow his vision to have been genuine, and the action of his Christian mother's faith upon his mind, a magic-like spell ruling him on that evening when he sat in his tent watching the declining sun. This is the simplest explanation and it requires not much of a miracle in the case.

FAILURE OF THE MESSIAH IN LONDON.

HANDEL AND THE CHESTER CATHEDRAL SINGERS.

BY PROFESSOR JOHN TULLIDGE.

In looking over my music to find a composition of Handel's I fell upon an old paper called "The Manchester and Salford Advertiser and Chronicle," published in England February 17, 1844.

In this paper I found a very able review of Handel's "Messiah," and reasons advanced for its failure in London, when first produced.

These reasons being so much like my own—given in the last article, I am induced to make a quotation from that able review:—

"In 1741, when Handel was in his 58th year, he produced 'The Messiah,' calling it a Sacred Oratorio, by way of distinction, as the words were all taken from the Holy Scriptures. It was first produced in London, and not only ill attended but ill received. The success with which, eight years before, his Oratorio of 'Athalia' had been received at a solemnity at Oxford, made Handel think that 'The Messiah,'—an infinitely better work—would be well received in London.

"It failed, however, partly because the critics of that day believed, or affected to believe, that its choruses were too numerous, and that its airs were inferior to those in other works of Handel; but chiefly because Handel had offended the nobility and patrons of the Opera by refusing to compose any piece in which Francesco Bernadi (commonly called Senisino) should have a part. This Italian vocalist was a popular favorite, and Handel's dislike to him caused such a powerful opposition that Handel was compelled to quit London in 1741, after the failure of the Messiah."

The opposition that Handel received from his enemies on many occasion would have crushed the inspirations and exertions of most composers, but Handel was a giant in spirit and nothing appeared to daunt his onward progress. Besides he knew the cause of the non-success of his great work on its first trial. He also knew that his "Messiah" would succeed and he was determined to try it the second time in Dublin. In Dublin he felt assured the same cause would not exist; there he would have an unprejudiced audience that would give his Oratorio a fair trial, and an impartial hearing.

On Handel's arrival at Liverpool, he found the packet boat was detained in that port by contrary winds, and feeling that he must occupy his leisure somehow, he forthwith ordered a post chaise to go to the city of Chester, and rehearse, with the Cathedral singers, a chorus called, "And with his stripes we are healed." Handel was not altogether satisfied with this chorus when sung in London, and he thought he would hear it again and make what alterations might appear necessary to him after another hearing. While the composer is on his way to Chester, I will leave him to relate how I received an anecdote of Handel's visit to the above Cathedral City.

In the year 1842, I left the City of York, to make a professional tour to North Wales. Having a great inclination to visit the Organist and Cathedral singers of the ancient City of Chester, I applied to Dr. Camidge,—the Organist of York Minister.—for a letter of introduction to those gentlemen. When I arrived at that city I presented my letter to Mr. Wilkinson, the Organist of the Cathedral, and he gave me a special invitation to attend that evening one of their social music gatherings at an Inn called the "Kitchen." This Inn, it appears, had been a place for the social gathering of the Organist and Choral Vicars for many generations.

The music room of the association contained the whole of Handel's Oratorios, and a small chamber Organ. In this room the singers were in the habit of rehearsing the works of Handel and other classical composers. On my entering the room with Mr. Wilkinson, the Organist, I was somewhat surprised by his introducing me as one of the four conductors of the York "Harmonic Society," and one of its principal tenors. I looked at him for an explanation, and he said "Dr. Camidge had mentioned it in his letter."

After the Organist and the singers had taken their seats, the parts of the Oratorio of "The Messiah" were handed round for rehearsal. "Mr. Tullidge," said the Organist, "is conversant with the great work we are about to perform, and courtesy, if nothing else, induces us to appoint him on this occasion to the task of rendering the interpretations of the recitatives and arias contained in this great work, according to his idea." Of course I could not object. We began, and both solos and choruses had been performed with much expression, and we were preparing to try "And with his stripes we are healed," when the Organist made a dead halt and said, "Mr. Tullidge, no doubt you have heard a verbal relation and seen in print the visit of Handel to this city." "Yes," said I, "but I should like to hear the original version of the story." Well," said he, "you shall. This Inn, called the 'Kitchen,' was the one Handel put up at when he did our singers the honor of paying them a visit. Handel had hardly seated himself when he enquired of the landlord if the Cathedral singers could sing 'music at de sight.' The landlord informed him that 'Mr. Janson, the choir master was an excellent music reader, and in fact, the Cathedral singers are all well practised in sight reading.' 'Good,' said Handel, 'send for them and bring in te dinner.'"

When the composer had satisfied his appetite, he rang the bell and ordered the Organist and singers to appear before him. "The great master was seated in the same chair that Mr. Edwards our Chairman is now occupying. The same Organ that I have been playing this evening was used on that night. The Oratorio began and both solos and choruses were creditably performed—so says our Ancestors—until they came to the chorus, 'And with his stripes we are healed,' when they all broke down. Handel was leading the Soprano boys with his violin, which instrument he took by the neck and threw it at Janson's head, exclaiming, 'You tam fillian; you tell me you read de sight. Oh! you schoundrel, you no read de sight.' Janson, not offended with the composer's fury, quickly answered, 'Yes, sir, we can read at sight, but not at first sight. Your music is too difficult for that.' 'Dat is good,' replied Handel, 'We 'll try again.' After repeating the chorus many times, they succeeded to the composer's satisfaction." Handel made his alterations, and the next morning posted to Liverpool, and the wind changing to the right quarter, he took packet and went to Dublin.

Review of Books, Etc.

LIFE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

We have before us advanced sheets of the "Life of Jefferson Davis," with a "Secret History of the Southern Confederacy, gathered behind the scenes in Richmond," which has been forwarded to us by the National Publishing Company of Philadelphia. The book contains "curious and extraordinary information of the principal southern characters in the late war, in connection with President Davis and in relation to the various intrigues of his administration." The author, Mr. Edward A. Pollard, in his opening chapters, relieves the Southern people from the crime of the Great Conspiracy against the nation. The early story of the war grew not out of the State conventions of the South. Washington City was the theater in which was rehearsed the great rebellion:

"There was the true dramatic center of the conspiracy, there the real springs of the plot; and the State Conventions passing pretentiously their ordinances of secession, and affecting deliberation where all had already been decided, were really but the puppets at the ends of the wires.

The true history of the war takes us then to Washington—takes us to a small but powerful company of politicians who had assumed there the question of peace or war. Among these brilliant conspirators stood conspicuous Jefferson Davis—alert, magnetic, keen in his ambition, his weak health restored by excitement, quickened with nervous transports, a man having many qualities of leadership, a nature easily inflated with great occasions, but without the true and robust pregnancy of a real greatness. For the present, however, he was the most observed of all the Southern Representatives at the capital, and took with facility and grace the position of their leader."

President Buchanan is next introduced, with a pen-and-ink photograph, which will not displease the Mormon reader, who remembers that the author of the Utah Expedition and the promoter of the rebellion is the subject of the sketch. Here he is with his message of 1860:

The message of the President, delivered to Congress in December, 1860, had an effect which has not been duly appreciated in history, and which was scarcely recognized in the newspapers of the day. Mr. Buchanan was timid, secretive, ingenious; one of those time-serving politicians, who had managed to keep constantly in public life, not an ostentatious partisan, but a traditional office holder, an "old public functionary," one of those men who make extraordinary success in the political arena without the force of merit and through the sheer ingenuity of the demagogue. He had neither courage nor intellectual decision. "To see him," said a distinguished Virginia politician who visited him during the impending difficulties of the country, "cowering beneath the full-length portrait of Andrew Jackson on the mantle-piece of the reception-room of the White House, munching a dry cigar, and asking querulously what he could do, or what he should do, was more than human patience could endure, or human pity tolerate." This despicable old man was grotesquely balancing on the question of peace and war. He was apparently resolved to trifle with the time-service of a great occasion, and he was desperately anxious to save the remnant of his administration from the imputation of a civil war.

But perhaps his message was more artful than weak. However low and unworthy the motive which dictated it, nothing could have better answered the purpose of giving a pause to the movement of secession, of suspending it, and of delaying, if not pacifying the excitement of the country. This result is performed with admirable ingenuity; and his message had thus a certain value in history, a decided appreciable effect, which has never been justly estimated in the accounts of this period. It took the sting from Secession; it neutralized for a time the complaints of the South, and it removed those immediate causes of alarm on which the Southern leaders had calculated to agitate their section and to precipitate its decision. If the country did not avail itself of this season of reflection, it was not Mr. Buchanan's fault. For nearly a month he held the secession conspiracy at bay, and if the interval was not improved by the sober second thoughts of the people, they have themselves to blame for the loss of an opportunity.

Floyd comes next with the first denouement of the rebellion:

Mr. Floyd was the first to take alarm at the news from Sumter. "He resigned," as a newspaper expressed it, "with a clap of thunder." The Southern leaders met in sudden and irregular conferences; it was a holiday season of the year and formal deliberations had to be delayed for a day or two; but Mr. Floyd in his resignation from the Cabinet had already suggested the measure of the opportunity and how adroitly the whole controversy might be turned on the single specification of the facts concerning Sumter. The conspirators awoke to a sense of their position, saw the danger on one side and the opportunity on the other. If they gave a week's respite to a plot actually in course of execution, they might be hopelessly lost. The season of delay and uncertainty was past. From the day the news from Sumter reached Washington the question of disunion and war was practically decided; one of the most extraordinary councils in the history of the country was determined upon; a revolutionary body sat in the shadow of the Capitol at Washington; and in a few weeks this strange authority had sent over the country the order which led to the seizure of all the forts in the south except two.

The above fragments, from the "Life of Jefferson Davis" and the "Secret History of the Southern Confederacy" will give our readers a view of its character. It is published by the National Publishing Company of Philadelphia, who call attention to the fact that the work is sold by subscription only, and that an agent is wanted in every county.

"The Manufacturer and Builder."—This is a handsome monthly magazine, published by Western & Co., 37 Park Row, New York. It contains thirty-two large quarto pages, profusely illustrated and filled with interesting matter, not only for manufacturers and builders, but also for general family reading. We recommend it to the public as a cheap and useful work, of great practical value to those engaged in manufacturing and building.

Music and the Drama.

The Howson Operatic Troupe.—The visit of this company is a sign of the times. Operatic performances presupposes a certain refinement and educational training beyond that of the ordinary drama. The public can appreciate tragedy and romantic plays in its first stages of civilization, but the success of the opera among any people is a proof of their artistic advancement. Italy is very properly the birth-place of the opera, for it is in harmony with the genius and artistic habits of the Italians, who are a nation of artists. No other land than Italy or France, could have given birth to the operatic form of music, for there is in its qualities and construction an elaboration and an exquisite refinement, with a certain intellectual abandon born of voluptuous genius. This is Grecian and Roman in its nature. Italy and France best represent those antique nations, who brought forth the drama and gave birth to art. It is only just to-day that even England has come up to the operatic state of refinement, and America has certainly not yet reached it. True, the British aristocracy have long been lovers and patrons of the opera, but they had received a continental finishing education, and were familiar with this form of musical performance, not in their own, but the Italian tongue. The English opera is very modern. It is the child of to-day. The famous composer Balfe may be considered its parent, and the well-known Pyne and Harrison Troupe as among the leading apostles in its practical performance. Since the introduction of the English form, the opera has gained ground in America and England; and it has at length reached Salt Lake City, in the advent of Madame Parepa-Rosa, and now of the Howson Operatic Troupe. The latter sing in English; and very wisely do they thus in singing to an American or English public. We are interested in the extension of operatic performances in our own tongue, confident it never will be greatly successful either in England or America in the Italian language; for though a very select circle of society would, undoubtedly, appreciate the execution, the general public never could. We are, therefore, also very much gratified with the last announcement of Messrs. Clawson and Caine of an operatic season. True, it is the form of "Opera Bouffe," but that is the best form, perhaps, that could be introduced for a season to afford sufficient variety and spicy entertainments, which the public generally seem to need. The Howson Troupe opened Monday evening, May 31st, with a charming operatic burlesque, entitled "La Grand Duchesse De Gerolstein." The principal singing was excellent, and the burlesque action very amusing. Miss Emma Howson well sustained her reputation as the "celebrated Prima Donna," in the character of "La Grand Duchesse," and her sister Clelia Howson, that of the "Fascinating soubrette," in the interesting part of the peasant girl Wanda, who is the rival complement of the burlesque "La Grande Duchesse." Indeed, the Misses Howson are properly denominated the "charming Sisters." They come to represent the comic opera, and not the tragic opera, of which we can rank only such as Malibran, Grisi, and Jenny Lind as its Queens and Grand Duchesses. Mr. Frank Howson, who sustained the part of principal vocalist in the male cast, is a good singer with a good voice; and the two other gentlemen of the troupe, Messrs. Jerome and F. A. Howson, are excellent in the comic action, in which, however, our own burlesque favorite, Mr. Philip Margetts, quite equalled them. We wish the Management the deserved success, during the opened season of "Opera Bouffe."

The Professor Abroad.—Professor John Tullidge has not yet returned to the city, from his class-teaching tour in the Southern settlements, but we expect him to be at the "head of his department" directly. In his correspondence, he says "I am pretty well satisfied with the setting of 'Beautiful Spring;' however, in the fifth bar before closing—not the Finis, but D. C.—there is a B instead of G in the vocal bass. In the organ part it is all right. It is on the word 'now.' The mezzo-soprano got the B, and it being a 'third,' the doubling of the note is bad."

There is another item in the Professor's letter which corrects a mistake, and gives a note of explanation on theory. In the editor's reasons for publishing Fries, &c., of a certain form, through blots on the manuscript, the "little triplex" was rendered "grand triplex." The professor says, "Now, the grand triplex form is a big thing. It contains three movements, each movement having many periods, according to the composer's idea. The simple, or little triplex, was the form meant. The "grand duplex" is still a bigger thing than the "grand triplex," being the form which is chosen for classical instrumental compositions."

On the return of the musical editor, he will give to students, on theory, occasional lessons on "thorough bass" and "counterpoint," to render the department educational.

New Engagements.—Miss Annie Ward has been engaged as a member of the stock company of the Salt Lake Theatre. We understand that further engagements will be made with professional ladies. The management seems resolved to secure an irreproachable stock company. This is as it should be, and we hope the public will duly appreciate the efforts made to keep our Theatre in the first rank and afford the very best of entertainments.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XI.

SIR HERBERT AND HIS MENTOR.

Sir Herbert Blakely was correct in his surmises, as to the identity of his young countryman, and that which he had in his rage and mortification so adroitly turned upon Count Orsini was the literal truth.

As soon as Sir Herbert reached the hotel where he was staying, he locked himself in his apartment, more, however, from an instinct of human nature, when on a secret track, than from any fear of intrusion. Your miser will lock himself in his den with his gold, even if within an impenetrable castle,—your plotter will do the same; and villainy stealthily closes its doors and whispers. "The walls have ears."

The supplanter was alarmed! That was the chief instinct which prompted him. The meeting with Sir Walter and Lord Frederick brought up the unpleasant fact that he was not yet the owner of the De Lacy estates. He was still but the mortgagee: and as the rental paid the interest, he was in fact the tenant of young Lord Frederick, in which character Sir Richard Courtney had very strictly held him. As we have seen, at the last attempt of the Blakelys to force the transfer of the De Lacy estates by purchase, the boy Sir Walter suddenly appeared in the foreground strongly marked, and gave to lawyer Wortley the checkmate. Since then, Sir Herbert feared the rich impetuous Sir Walter Templar more even than he did his uncle Courtney, and infinitely more than he would have feared young De Lacy unsupported by his guardian and friend Walter.

"Hell and furies!" burst from Blakely, when he had locked himself in his private room.

"Hell and furies! That cub of Satan has again thrown down the gauntlet to me. Curse him! He means war, just as I have expected since the young tiger showed his teeth so fiercely when a boy. Boy! He is as Wortley named him, a young Satan. Courtney was lion enough to face—but his tiger nephew! Wortley feared the young devil; and the lawyer would prosecute a case against the archangel Gabriel, if he was but himself legal armor proof. Aye, Wortley was right: it is this Sir Walter Templar whom I shall have to meet in the case. As for the houseless whelp of the De Lacy,—this young beggar lordling—pshaw. I should not fear a host of them. They would only help each other to pawn themselves for more."

Sir Herbert took from the cupboard a bottle of brandy, and after a deep draught, lighting a cigar, he threw himself into a luxurious chair, and for an hour followed torturous intricacies of plots, and shadowings of something darker still.

In his dark reverie, Sir Walter Templar constantly rose before him in the character of the Avenger. He remembered, most distinctly, the haughty semi-challenge the boy sent him by Wortley proclaiming himself the Avenger of the De Lacys, which now, as a man, he had with sufficient significance endorsed to his own face that afternoon in the presence of the revelers. Walter was unchanged! The young men were repeating the friendship which had existed between the uncle and father. Sir Richard Courtney and the dead De Lacy were transmigrated in their representatives. To break this friendship which had been the safeguard from the first, and which promised to rebuild the fallen house, stately as of yore, Sir Herbert would have compassed sea and land. In hope that some subtle management might perchance bring this about; he had traced Europe to find their track. He had suddenly and when least expected, discovered them that afternoon, and their first meeting was ominous in the extreme. Thus Sir Herbert thought; and at the end of his dark reverie, he started to his feet and drank a second glass of brandy.

"I must find out their certain identity," he muttered; "and then if nought else will sweep these spiders from my walls—by the Fiend! let one or both—well 'twere better not to mouth the deed, but to execute!"

A soft insinuating knock at the door, at this moment, flashed a shade of relief across the dark and troubled countenance of the baronet, and he hastened to let in the personage who so insinuatingly demanded entrance; for, in spite of its persuasiveness, there was in the knocking a certain expression of a right to come in. It was such as a guardian might give at the door of his ward.

"Ah! 'tis you?"

The personage smiled an answer as though he thought the question unnecessary. Sir Herbert was too cloudy in his mood for smiles, and retorted impatiently—

"Humph! Who in the Fiend's name could it be but you? You are a soft voice in the hurlyburly—sunshine in a thunderstorm—by Satan, the only time you do shine: a zephyr when you should be a hurricane—a fawn when you are wanted to be the hyena:—Only I grant though you have enough of that animal in you."

Unruffled was the personage thus addressed. There was a persuasive elasticity of bearing marked in this personage and a classical wickedness sat on his face which was illuminated by his bewitching smile. 'Twas Snap—in the spring of their life the valet-secretary of Sir Herbert—now the companion-mentor. The servant had himself become a master. He was master now of the living languages of the civilized world of the present—master of some of the dead languages of the defunct civilized world of the past—master of vast and subtle knowledge of that past and present, distilled from every essence his mental chemistry could test. He was the master of knowledge: therefore the master of men. "Eat of the tree of knowledge that you may become as Gods" was the arch-tempter's first lesson to man in Eden; and Snap had eaten of that tree: hence the wicked classicality now chiselled on his countenance, for the growth and elaboration of mind will adorn the mortal with the beauty of Satan, or re-stamp on him the image of the Creator.

Snap was now the master—his knowledge had made him his master's master. Unruffled he met Sir Herbert's storms. Those storms he had to meet, but he was their potent ruler. Without the least animosity, he always received these private vents of Sir Herbert's temper upon himself, and would reply as serenely and good-naturedly as now,

"The calm should come and smooth the ruffled tempest, Sir Herbert. Two tempests meeting would but hurt each other, and wreck more than designed. When you are the storm, 'tis most fitting I should be the calm."

"Blockhead! How often have I insisted that your calm only makes my tempest more furious?"

"And I have just as often insisted the reverse you must admit."

"Had I not been cursed with such slimy things as you to monitor me, I should be less the storm," observed the baronet, self-excusingly.

"Then may the leopard change his spots and the Ethiopian his skin," answered Snap, with quiet irony, for he would sometimes help his master to self-command by pouring oil on the fire, knowing he was always humbled by his own blazing and more manageable afterwards.

"So, so; you are for showing me the hyena, are you? rascal!" blazed Sir Herbert.

The mentor had resolved to lesson his master, for now Sir Walter Templar had suddenly appeared, he wished him to be both manageable and under self-restraint from his furious passion.

"I knew you, Sir Herbert, in your mother's arms. You were ungovernable there. Perhaps 'twas her gentleness that gave you this ungovernable temper. That dovetails with your philosophy, I think."

"Stop! Not her, Snap; not my mother, now! Had she lived beyond my childhood, I might have been—pshaw! I never knew thee such a fool before. Tell me of my father, not my mother. I have nothing in common with religion, except one poor article of faith—it is that my mother in is heaven! My father's location is rather more questionable."

"Your father was a master among men," said the mentor in a dissatisfied tone.

"Did I speak disrespectfully of my father? Then I beg his pardon," said Sir Herbert, apologetically, "and yours too, for my worthy sire is your deity, the only one you ever worshipped; and since thy study of sages has made thee arrogant, thou must e'en be mentor to my father's son. I like it not, though, sometimes."

"You go where you will, my hand but guides you safely where your will or passions lead. I advise you in the tenor of your father's wisdom."

"Well, well, Snap, I share with you a common admiration of my worthy sire, and therefore I follow him. 'Tis my mother I refuse to follow. I would have you conjure up the devil at my elbow—not my mother—not my mother, Snap."

In spite of his evil life and ill-regulated character, the sacred memory of a mother preserved Sir Herbert Blakely "not all dross." There was something of sentiment in his heart left, slumbering, but strong—the germ of good planted in his nature, not growing but yet there, choked with the weeds of evil. The angel-wings of a guardian mother touched him, and a shadow of sadness passed over him in her spirit presence. Much needed was the talisman of a mother's sacred memory then—much needed the sanctification of her spirit-presence, when the dark shade of assassination was rising in the background to damn her son to deeper perdition. But her son wanted her not now—he felt not at ease with the memory of his mother before him: the meeting that afternoon with Sir Walter Templar and young De Lacy made him never less disposed to listen to the whisperings of a guardian mother's spirit. Ilis mentor designed not to call her up, but unwittingly he had done it.

"You would have the devil at your elbow, my master?" he said.

"Aye, and make him black enough to hide my mother from me."

"Shall I put my argument thus?—Was not the boy ungovernable in temper, who taunted the De Lacy with the mortgage on his family estates, and threatened to have him horsewhipped from the lands of his race?"

"Ah, I feel the spur!"

"Was not the boy ungovernable who received well deserved chastisement from the young De Lacy's hands, and like a beaten cur, slunk away crowned with derisive acclamations of his schoolmates?"

"Damnation! you have struck the spur deep enough, Snap. I am myself again. And now what have you discovered? I saw you leave directly after my passage of arms with Orsini. I know your habits. You followed the track of those haughty countrymen of ours?"

"I did. But first commend me to the inspiration of that ruby nectar. Ah! that's nectar indeed!" he observed with epicurean pleasure, as he quaffed his goblet of wine. "I wonder not our heathen deities so loved it. Even our orthodox Solomon says wine maketh glad the hearts of gods and men. It always overflows me with the milk of human kindness. Depend, Sir Herbert, it is better to be good-natured with all the world;—aye, good natured and kind to those whose house you pull about their ears, and not vindictive even to your antagonist. It gives you such an advantage over the world: your own good nature is never the sword that turns against yourself."

"Out upon your philosophizing, now! But tell me if you discovered aught of those young Englishmen?"

"I give you your father's philosophy, my master. 'Tis also mine. You need it, believe me, and never more than now; therefore, I give it."

"Tell me of those haughty Englishmen, I say!" impatiently exploded Sir Herbert.

"I am ready with my budget, when you are to receive it."

"You provoking villain! I am in a furore of impatience to have it."

"And, therefore, unready, my master. One cannot hold a consultation standing. There's gravity in sitting. How can you resist the luxurious tempting of a seat. This room-pacing agitates the atmosphere and flutters one's ideas into confusion."

The mentor, as soon as he entered the room, had thrown himself languidly into one of the tempting easy chairs, and his master now followed his example.

"Was it not that cub of Satan who bearded us, Snap?"

"I think so, Sir Herbert."

"I verily believe he would have measured swords with us all and thought it pastime!"

"Not unlikely."

"You followed them you say?"

"I struck direct towards Spontini's villa."

"Well?"

"And saw them enter."

"That's not much discovered. I never doubted that he was the fellow-pupil of the prima donna."

"And I made it a point to be certain of everything. The oracle of science says demonstrate. I extend the maxim and make it my rule of life."

"But, Snap, is it Sir Walter Templar?"

"I think so, my master."

"So do I think; but did you not know him? Methinks, at Cambridge you had opportunity enough to know him."

"Ah, but he was then a beardless youth. Now his chin is continental, and Nature has given him the lion's mane."

"By the infernal powers, I'll have this lion's skin off, Snap!"

"First put on the sheep's skin yourself. Believe me, Sir Walter Templar is too much the lion to be overmatched in his own character. I like the sheepskin best, my master."

The mentor was ever philosophizing. It was an instinct with him.

"So you think, Snap, we have found the lion?" queried Sir Herbert.

"I thought I knew him as Sir Walter Templar as soon as he made his debut; and then he acted so much like Sir Walter Templar! Yes, I think his identity almost as good as demonstrated."

"Find out quickly, and then to action," broke in Sir Herbert with determination. "I am resolved, Snap, to end the matter at once. We have had too much of the sheepskin—too much waiting and hunting for opportunities. If we have found our men, why then we will make our opportunity now and here; for we cannot find a better place than Italy to strike the balance of account between Courtney's nephew and myself. Now, if those Englishmen who bearded us this afternoon were Courtney's nephew and this landless lord—for, by heavens! he shall be landless—then the shaft Sir Walter Templar turned against me this afternoon was designed as a reiteration of his old challenge. Of course you understand it so, Snap?"

"Exactly, my master, and I also think the fellows found us before we found them."

"You mean that young Templar was there with his friend De Lacy expressly to cross my path and commence the threatened hostilities between us?"

"That is my opinion. They had evidently premeditated war with us, or they would not have turned upon you for aiming to screen them from the fury of Orsini and his fiery companions."

"Then we must to work—to war with this haughty young Templar—war to the death!"

Sir Herbert delivered himself furiously, adding, with less fierceness, but deep resolve in his expression, and a dark, iron determination in his countenance—

"I swear, Snap, by the memory of my father, and the promise I willingly gave to him on his death-bed, that those broad estates and proud old castle for which he and I have aimed for so long shall be mine, if I have to cement my claims upon them in blood and strike the blow with my own hand!"

"I am as resolved upon the matter as yourself, Sir Herbert. I also gave my dead master, your father, my promise. It was to help his son to the utmost in the issue, and to advise and guard him."

"Yes, yes, Snap; it was at his death-bed, and at the same time I gave my pledge."

"And now I swear with you that the De Lacy inheritance shall be yours, even if we purchase your claims and possession in blood; but it shall be neither your hand nor mine which strikes the blow."

"Ah! Say you so? That's brave, my loyal mentor! I am right glad that you have joined me in the resolution, for I have always remembered that I gave my father another last promise, somewhat forced from me, I own;—it was that I would take your advice in the matter and do naught without your approval. He knew us both, Snap; and though I have often writhed under restraint, I have ever found that you have guarded me both against myself and others, and I have had too many proofs of your loyalty to me to regret my promise."

"Thank you, my master, for that," answered the servant with evident gratification and some show of feeling. "And at the outset let me advise you not to take Count Orsini into your counsels, for Orsini is an evil counsellor—I mean an unsafe one."

"But we must change the programme," observed the baronet somewhat dissatisfied."

"Oh, I am not withdrawing from your purpose, Sir Herbert; but I know what Orsini will propose, and know Orsini's instruments. Now in your father's hands there were instruments enough, but he used them with a scientific nicety. Sometimes they hurt others, sometimes themselves. Sometimes he reached his evil through instruments of good; sometimes his good through instruments of evil. He moulded men by their passions, their vices and their virtues. Observation had made him wise. The first kindness I ever received was from your father—that made me his slave, though I knew he was kind to me to use me. All were in his hands but instruments to his ends. I am your father's pupil; and though I have since added subtle wisdom from a thousand sources, and read in many languages the works of a hundred sages, I endorse the philosophy of his broad observation of the world and sound judgment: Your programme must be changed; we will change it; but let me first have time to analyze and demonstrate upon the matter awhile. We will find the instruments we need, but they must be your fathers, not Orsini's instruments."

CHAPTER XII.

GENIUS ON THE ALTAR.

The magnificent opera house at Rome was crowded with the elite of the Eternal City and connoisseurs of the operatic stage, to witness another triumph of the new prima donna.

The most that was known of the gifted Terese by the curious at Rome was that she was a rustic gem from some beautiful, remote Italian village, whose surroundings were favorable to the birth of poesy and song, in wild luxuriance. But she was a gem of the first water, and as the fashionable world generally discovers its choicest brilliants in the mire of the vulgar populace, the lustre of this new star was no shocking scandal upon aristocratic mediocrity. The example is so often repeated in life that it has become less offensive by its very familiarity.

But the musical education of Terese came with prestige. She was known to be a favorite pupil of the celebrated Spontini, who had come with her to Rome to pave her way and witness her triumph. She now held the sceptre of queen of song in that classical land of art, where musical talent is a common gift.

In one of the most select boxes, and opposite that of Count Orsini, were seated three gentlemen whose interest in the result of the opera and the success of the prima donna was greater than that of the whole besides of that crowded house. They were Spontini, Sir Walter Templar and Lord Frederick De Lacy. The maestro appeared somewhat nervous and anxious.

"Walter," whispered Lord Frederick, "do you think Spontini is doubtful of the success of Terese?"

"Has she ever failed? Terese fail! Pshaw!"

"As a singer, Walter, no, I grant; but as a composer?"

"I tell you, Fred, she will not fail!"

"Why, upon my honor, Walter, you are as impetuous upon me as though I was trying to prove she would."

"Did you not intimate a doubt?"

"My dear fellow, I asked if Spontini doubted."

"He does not."

"How know you?"

"His own reputation is her guarantee."

"So I have considered; still he is anxious."

"I have observed it."

"What can it mean!"

"I know not."

"It must have reference to Terese's opera."

"I tell you, unbeliever—you rank, ungallant infidel, the fairy of our romance will not fail in her enchantments. Terese is no mean composer."

"Saint George defend me! Did I say she was? Great Vesuvius! I would sooner be near thee than whisper to this volcano here any doubt of the perfection of Terese."

The conversation of the young Englishmen will be better understood when it is known that Rome, who had gathered for three months to witness her great impersonations of the best operas of the day, this night not only came to hear her in a new piece, but also to witness her triumph or failure in her debut as a composer. The opera was her own, composed under the supervision of the great Spontini. This gave much interest to the piece, and the musical world was all excitement to have the issue. But there was a secret connected with the opera which none but the composer and her master knew. Others shall be startled with it soon!

"By all the popes Rome ever had, I 'll swear Spontini is anxious now, Walter!"

"I did not say he was not."

"And I only said he is."

Spontini, who had overheard enough of the conversation to give him the cue, observed,

"Be satisfied, Signor De Lacy; I will answer for my pupil's success as a composer."

"And I, too, will be her guarantee," added Sir Walter.

"Oh, then, Signor Frederick, you may be more than satisfied, for Walter's judgment upon my pupil's opera will have more authority than that of any man in Italy."

"Do not mock me, maestro. Treat me not as a conceited puppy. I have self-confidence, earnestness of purpose, love of art—aye, talent, if you will—for I acknowledge a faith in myself, but I know a thousand things I cannot do as well as a few I can perform. I know as honestly what I am not as what I am. Think me not a puppy, Spontini. I am not that."

"Spontini has no mockery for Walter Templar, child. He understands the self-consciousness of nature. Bah? I hate to hear: 'You flatter me, Signor;' 'you expect too much from me;' bah! that man is what you English call humbug."

"He wishes others to believe all he disclaims," observed Fred.

"Oh, yes, Signor; he is one of the most important pillars of society," remarked the composer, sarcastically.

"How is it, maestro, that genius appears so presumptuous and sublimely egotistical, when in fact it is childlike?"

"And because childlike it asserts itself," answered Spontini.

At this point the orchestra commenced the overture, and Walter Templar followed the complex movements of the piece with intense interest and the appreciation of an experienced reviewer. To him the poetry of music found the interpretation of language in his own nature, for he was skilled in harmonic combinations.

"A splendid and well developed prophesy of Terese's opera," burst from Walter, as the orchestra concluded.

"Assure my unbelieving friend, maestro, or he won't believe me," added Walter, pleasantly, for he was greatly delighted with the success of his dear companion and fellow-pupil.

"You are an ungrateful fellow, whose judgment upon the opera will have more authority than any man in Italy," laughed Fred, tormentingly.

"Ah! Signor Walter did not so well understand Spontini's words as he soon will," said the composer mysteriously.

"I have heard the maestro say," again put in Fred, provokingly, "that this ungrateful friend of mine has the best voice in Italy."

"I cry you mercy, De Lacy!"

"Signor De Lacy is right, Walter. Holy mother! I never knew the English had voices until I heard yours."

"A first class composer, too. Eh, Spontini?"

"I know no secret of theory, Signor De Lacy, that Walter shares not, and I can do nothing he cannot do. He has sucked my art from me as you would the juice from an orange. He blends the impassionate genius of my country with the irresistible character of his own. Were he in the professional arena, with his gifts and Napoleonic impetuosity embodied in music, Spontini would have to give place to his pupil."

"You are unjust to yourself, maestro, though your opinion is very gratifying to my vanity."

"I have said it, child. Rome hears the impassionate soul of Terese, bursting into song. Rome bows to the enchantress; I see her take her powers from her magician. Not more could that overture have been Walter's had he and not Terese composed it."

"Nay, nay. Terese has genius and one of nature's best voices. That is not my gift."

"Still your soul inspires her."

"Then Terese will not fail; for Walter's motto is 'I never fail!'" added Fred, still pursuing his playful persecution.

"By the blessed Virgin, I hope she will not!" exclaimed Spontini, with the same anxious manner marked by De Lacy.

When the prima donna appeared the house sent up such an exclamation of welcome which none but the passionate, enthusiastic children of sunny Italy could give.

Doubtless Terese felt the electrifying thrill of the applause, but as she came to the foreground to give the first solo touches, her eyes sought the box in which sat her master and the two young Englishmen. There was her world. If she won not him who was to her the soul of all things, however great Rome might declare her success to her it would be failure most agonizing. She cared not though that whole house cast her off so she was taken to the heart of that solitary box. There was the resting place she sought—there would she rest forever as the heaven to which her longing soul soared on the wings of love. If she reach it not the universe will be to her a blank.

"Signor Spontini, how denominate you the opera?" interrogated Walter, as the prima donna concluded her opening aria.

"As does the programme in your hand," answered the composer, drily.

"But the subject? the character? the plot? the issue?"

"It is a history growing out of a pastoral episode."

"But there are so many. Which one, Spontini?"

"That of the Peasant Girl! See your programme, child."

"Now, maestro, do n't jest with our impatience. I do think you and Terese have christened the opera to puzzle us. Come, come, what part does she play?"

"Her own," the composer replied, still evasively.

"Very satisfactory," said Walter, a little piqued.

"I think Spontini and Terese could have been bought over, Walter," put in Fred.

"How?" he asked.

"Had you accepted an engagement as her primo tenore."

"Preposterous! Fred has rated the price of your confidence too high, Spontini."

"You could play many a part to disgrace your rank and family more than by illustrating the works of art," the composer remarked.

"But on the stage of public life, Signor Maestro?"

"Do not nobles, then, Signor Walter, appear on public stages? Believe me, young man, genius has a higher title than social rank, and art degrades no man—not even a king," replied this illustrious son of song proudly. Doubtless Spontini was right: and even nobles and princes have endorsed his claims for his class by their companionship with men of rare talents, and their profound homage paid to the monarchs of art.

The second scene had commenced, in which Terese appeared. It represented his first meeting with the "Peasant Girl," in the beautiful Italian village which gave her birth.

"By heaven! our first meeting. The subject of the opera is her own history!" ejaculated Sir Walter, bounding with his impulsive instinctiveness into the opening plot.

"Umph! Is that very wonderful to you, Signor Walter?" queried Spontini.

"No!" he replied strongly and sharply, like one suddenly awakened to powerful interest too intense for conversation.

Spontini laid his hand upon Sir Walter's arm and expressively and pleadingly said:

"The subject and moral of the opera is 'Genius upon the Altar!' Shall she be consumed? Shall there be another example given that the divine fires which genius blazes forth to the illumination of the world has been kindled for her own sacrifice? Will the offering be accepted, yet not consumed! Will the child be spared? Oh! Signor Walter, Signor Walter, it is you who must give the judgment. You are to our Terese as the voice of fate to night!"

Spontini turned to watch the progress of the piece, leaving Walter to answer as he designed, in the deep silence and feeling of his own soul. Nor was there one in the house who followed the development of the piece more intently than Walter Templar. He entered into the powerful impersonation of Terese in her character of "The Peasant Girl," felt the fullness of her tender pathos, and heard with inexpressible emotion the irresistible pleadings of a soul for its mate, and the idolatry of the human heart for its idol.

From their first meeting, Walter was personated with Terese throughout the opera. He was her primo tenore represented by another. His very thoughts, sentiments and character were interpreted, and his own history blended with hers. As Spontini had remarked of the overture, so with the opera, Walter's part would not have been more his own had he composed it, and he soon fully understood the voices of love which he had heard in the overture, prophesying of the drama of "The Peasant Girl's" life. The strain which she sang at their first meeting, was sweetly mournful the same, except the scientific dressing, as when he heard it gushing spontaneously from the gifted maiden's soul. It was as the yearning of a daughter of Judah to hear the "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people." As if in answer to the Hebrew maiden's strain, the comforter was near! Walter was he! He saw in the operatic mirror the leading episodes of their life since that first meeting. A new revelation flashed before him in the transformation change from gratitude to the dearest sentiment of the heart—the birth of love in Terese's soul—the all-in-all of a woman's life.

The last scene was powerfully moving and full of the most touching pathos. It was love clinging to her idol, and pleading with irresistible voice! Genius was upon the alter offering herself to her demi-god! Would he accept the offering, or would she be consumed by her own fires! The audience was left to imagine the issue, which all good-natured would give, as happy. But Terese must wait for her fate to speak the issue. The great voice of applause which Rome set up, proclaimed her triumph as an artiste and composer, but none only these concerned, knew that the opera concealed her own history. Genius had conquered the public. Would the woman prevail with her beloved?

From the private door of the opera house an elegant carriage was just starting, bearing Spontini and Terese to their beautiful villa on the suburbs of the city. Sir Walter and Lord Frederick usually accompanied them, but now they bid good night to the maestro and his pupil.

"It is a beautiful evening, Spontini. Fred and I will indulge in the luxury of a walk home," said Sir Walter, commanding himself to hide the powerful emotions which made every nerve of his strong but high-strung system quiver. It was the first words he had spoken since the startling revelation of the prima donna's love first burst upon him, they broke a heavy spell and acted upon him like the first bursting sob from a woman's overflowing grief—not, however, in the language of a woman's gush of nature—tears: but that of proud, powerful natured man—his soul bursting into vocal utterance.

"O Terese, Terese!" he exclaimed, as he seized her hand in a grip so strong in the intensity of his feelings, which would have made her cry out with pain had not her emotion been as great as his.

"O Walter, Walter!" came in reply, in tones as from a human soul trembling on the brink of its perdition and crying to her only one with power to save.

"To-morrow!" he said, in a choked voice. "To-morrow, dear Terese! I must pass this night of chaos in self-communion."

Walter handed Terese into the carriage almost in a state of unconsciousness and she shrank into the corner like a poor, frightened, fluttering dove. She was glad to be alone with her master, as was Walter with his friend. But no conversation passed between the young Englishmen on their way home. A firm warm grasp of the hand between the friends, told in silence of confidence and sympathy.

When they reached home, Fred retired to bed without any exchange of thought with Walter, who, under strong emotions or great revolutions of mind, resembled sable night, into whose dark profounds you look with wonder and awe. There were times when this picture of night which he saw in his friend's character made him tremble, and he would hide it in a sunnier prospect.

OUR CHOIR.

Our choir would scarcely be excused
Even as a band of raw beginners:
All mercy now must be refused
To such a set of croaking sinners.

No grumbling bull or growling bear
Is needed while our basso thrives:
No screaming loon need wake the air
While our soprano's throat survives.

He snarls and snorts and snuffles through,
As though the notes had bit and stung him:
She aims to hit the farthest pew,
And show the voice they 've got among 'em.

And so she drawls in barbarous time,
Prolongs her shrieks and sounds appalling:
Each note a fraud, each yell a crime,
Each hymn a mass of hideous squalling.

Our alto, wheezy, crude and fat,
Explodes in wild, sepulchral tones:
Now emulates the midnight cat,
Now chills the soul with dismal groans.

Our other alto, bright and sweet,
Sings only when the notion takes her,
Or when her beau is in his seat,
Or when the sense of duty makes her.

One tenor with a spacious nose,
Fills that, and thinks his duty done.
No matter how the organ blows,
Nor how the frantic metres run.

Another rolls his milky eyes,
As though the roof gave inspiration;
Alas! if heaven should hear his cries,
He 's doomed to instant strangulation.

And then the being who presides
At all this whooping, frightful row,
The organ man whose form bestrides
This Babel, built I don't know how.

His sole endeavor seems to be
To test the bellows-blower's wind,
To break the heart of harmony,
With all his soul and strength combined.

And so he plucks the noisiest stops,
And bangs away with feet and muscle,
Till when the game is up, he drops
Undone and beaten with the tussle.

And meanwhile, we the heirs of Zion,
The chosen ones—the meek and lowly—
Must listen as though Judah's lion
Were making all this roly-poly!

For me, I hate the cursed noise,
The usual psalms, the organ's clatter:
I can't discern angelic joys
In such a crash and crush of matter.

I long to pull the basso's nose,
To tell those females what 's decorum:
I ache to tread the tenor's toes,
And flog the organ man before 'em.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The Object of "Brown" Bronchial Troches is to obtain prompt relief. Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and Singers use them, and for any Throat trouble they have been found to give relief.

They were introduced in 1853. It has since been proved that they are the best article in the world for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough of Consumption, and Throat troubles.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are also held favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat for which Troches are a specific having made me often a mere whisperer.

N. P. WILLIS.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of.

FOUR-SCORE.

Four-score, four-score to-day!
I 'm almost home, they say.
And I 'm waiting now to hear my Father call:
He bids me patient be,
And He will come for me,
My tottering steps to guide that I may not fall.

As I look far back
O'er the lonely track
I 've wandered through so wearily since my good man went away,
To my old brain it seems
Full of dim and misty dreams,
And I hear his loved voice saying, "Dear, you 'll come to me some day."

Around our hearth-stone bright,
With the glow of fire at night,
There gather'd seven dear and childish forms of beauty rare:
And its fitful shadows played
O'er each bent and glossy head,
As in tender tones his lips poured forth a blessing and a prayer.

And now I 'm all alone,
For He called them one by one,
'Till the dear pet lamb alone, of all our flock was left.
Then with anguish keen I cried:
"Spare this, my joy and pride,
For if Thou callest him, then indeed am I bereft."

But He knew what was best,
And where my heart should rest,
So one bright morn He whispered, and my darling slid away
Into His arms outspread—
So He has all my dead,
And now I'm waiting to be called, and He may come to-day.

Four-score, four-score to-day,
I 'm very old, they say;
Just pull the blanket over me, for I 'm very, very cold.
But there 's no one to sorrow,
And I may be young to-morrow,
For I see my darlings beckoning me to come into His fold.

THE COMPENSATION HOUSE.

"There 's not a looking-glass in all the house, sir. It 's some peculiar fancy of my master's. There isn't one in any single room in the house."

It was a dark and gloomy-looking building, and had been purchased by this Company for an enlargement of their Goods Station. The value of the house had been referred to what was popularly called "a compensation jury," and the house was called, in consequence, The Compensation House.

It had become the Company's property; but its tenant still remained in possession, pending the commencement of active building operations. My attention was originally drawn to this house because it stood directly in front of a collection of huge pieces of timber which lay near this part of the Line, and on which I sometimes sat for half an hour at a time, when I was tired by my wanderings about Mugby Junction.

It was square, cold, grey-looking, built of rough-hewn stone, and roofed with thin slabs of the same material. Its windows were few in number, and very small for the size of the building. In the great blank, grey broadside, there were only four windows. The entrance-door was in the middle of the house; there was a window on either side of it, and there were two more in the single story above. The blinds were all closely drawn, and, when the door was shut, the dreary building gave no sign of life or occupation.

But the door was not always shut. Sometimes it was opened from within, with a great jingling of bolts and door-chains, and then a man would come forward and stand upon the door-step, snuffing the air as one might do who was ordinarily kept on rather a small allowance of that element. He was stout, thickset, and perhaps fifty or sixty years old—a man whose hair was cut exceedingly close, who wore a large bushy beard, and whose eye had a sociable twinkle in it which was prepossessing. He was dressed, whenever I saw him, in a greenish-brown frock-coat made of some material which was not cloth, wore a waistcoat and trousers of light color, and had a frill to his shirt—an ornament, by the way, which did not seem to go at all well with the beard, which was continually in contact with it. It was the custom of this worthy person, after standing for a short time on the threshold inhaling the air, to come forward into the road, and, after glancing at one of the upper windows in a half mechanical way, to cross over to the logs, and leaning over the fence which guarded the railway, to look up and down the line (it passed before the house) with the air of a man accomplishing a self-imposed task of which nothing was expected to come. This done, he would cross the road again, and turning on the threshold to take a final sniff of air, disappeared once more within the house, bolting and chaining the door again as if there were no probability of its being reöpened for at least a week. Yet half an hour had not passed before he was out in the road again, sniffing the air and looking up and down the line as before.

It was not very long before I managed to scrape acquaintance with this restless personage. I soon found out that my friend with the shirt-frill was the confidential servant, butler, valet, factotum, what you will, of a sick gentleman, a Mr. Oswald Strange, who had recently come to inhabit the house opposite, and concerning whose history my new acquaintance, whose name I ascertained was Masey, seemed disposed to be somewhat communicative. His master, it appeared, had come down to this place, partly for the sake of reducing his establishment—not, Mr. Masey was swift to inform me, on economical principles; but, because the poor gentleman, for particular reasons, wished to have few dependents about him—partly in order that he might be near his old friend, Dr. Garden, who was established in the neighborhood, and whose society and advice were necessary to Mr. Strange's life. That life was, it appeared, held by this suffering gentleman on a precarious tenure. It was ebbing away fast with each passing hour. The servant already spoke of his master in the past tense, describing him to me as a young gentleman not more than five-and-thirty years of age, with a young face, as far as the features and build of it went, but with an expression which had nothing of youth about it. This was the great peculiarity of the man. At a distance he looked younger than he was by many years, and strangers, at the time when he had been used to get about, always took him for a man of seven or eight-and-twenty, but they changed their minds on getting nearer to him. Old Masey had a way of his own of summing up the peculiarities of his master, repeating twenty times over: "Sir, he was Strange by nature, and strange to look at into the bargain."

It was during my second or third interview with the old fellow that he uttered the words quoted at the beginning of this plain narrative.

"Not such a thing as a looking-glass in all the house," the old man said, standing beside my piece of timber, and looking across reflectively at the house opposite. "Not one."

"In the sitting-rooms, I suppose you mean?"

"No, sir, I mean sitting-rooms and bed-rooms both; there is n't so much as a shaving-glass as big as the palm of your hand anywhere."

"But how is it?" I asked. "Why are there no looking-glasses in any of the rooms?"

"Ah, sir!" replied Masey, "that 's what none of us can ever tell. There is the mystery. It 's just a fancy on the part of my master. He had some strange fancies, and this was one of them. A pleasant gentlemen he was to live with, as any servant could desire. A liberal gentleman, and one who gave but little trouble; always ready with a kind word, and a kind deed, too, for the matter of that. There was not a house in all the parish of St. George's (in which we lived before we came down here) where the servants had more holidays or a better table kept; but, for all that, he had his queer ways and his fancies, as I may call them, and this was one of them. And the point he made of it, sir," the old man went on; "the extent to which that regulation was enforced, whenever a new servant was engaged; and the changes in the establishment it occasioned! In hiring a new servant, the very first stipulation made, was that about the looking-glasses. It was one of my duties to explain the thing, as far as it could be explained, before any servant was taken into the house. 'You 'll find it an easy place,' I used to say, 'with a liberal table, good wages, and a deal of leisure; but there 's one thing you must make up your mind to; you must do without looking-glasses while you 're here, for there is n't one in the house; and, what 's more, there never will be.'"

"But how did you know there never would be one?" I asked.

"Lor' bless you, sir! If you 'd seen and heard all that I 'd seen and heard, you could have no doubt about it! Why, only to take one instance:—I remember a particular day when my master had occasion to go into the housekeeper's room, where the cook lived, to see about some alterations that were making, and when a pretty scene took place. The cook—she was a very ugly woman, and awful vain—had left a little bit of a looking-glass, about six inches square, upon the chimney-piece; she had got it surreptious, and kept it always locked up; but she 'd left it out, being called away suddenly while titivating her hair. I had seen the glass, and was making for the chimney-piece as fast as I could; but master came in front of it before I could get there and it was all over in a moment. He gave one long piercing look into it, turned deadly pale, and seizing the glass, dashed it into a hundred pieces on the floor, and then stamped upon the fragments and ground them into powder with his feet. He shut himself up for the rest of that day in his own room, first ordering me to discharge the cook, then and there, at a moment's notice."

"What an extraordinary thing!" I said, pondering.

"Ah, sir," continued the old man, "it was astonishing what trouble I had with those women-servants. It was difficult to get any that would take the place at all under the circumstances. 'What, not so much as a mossul to do one's 'air at?' they would say, and they 'd go off, in spite of extra wages. Then those who did consent to come, what lies they would tell, to be sure! They would protest that they did n't want to look in the glass, that they never had been in the habit of looking in the glass, and all the while that very wench would have her looking-glass, of some kind or another, hid away among her clothes up-stairs. Sooner or later, she would bring it out too, and leave it about somewhere or other (just like the cook), where it was as likely as not that master might see it. And then—for girls like that have no consciences, sir—when I had caught one of 'em at it, she 'd turn round as bold as brass, 'And how am I to know whether my 'air's parted straight?' she 'd say, just as if it had n't been considered in her wages that that was the very thing which she never was to know while she lived in our house. A vain lot, sir, and the ugly ones always the vainest. There was no end to their dodges. They 'd have looking-glasses in the interiors of their work-box lids, where it was next to impossible that I could find 'em, or inside the covers of hymn-books, or cookery-books, or in their caddies. I recollect one girl, a sly one she was, and marked with the small-pox terrible, who was always reading her prayer-book at odd times. Sometimes I used to think what a religious mind she 'd got, and at other times (depending on the mood I was in) I would conclude that it was the marriage-service she was studying; but one day, when I got behind her to satisfy my doubts—lo and behold! it was the old story: a bit of glass, without a frame, fastened into the kiver with the outside edges of the sheets of postage-stamps. Dodges! Why, they 'd keep their looking-glasses in the scullery or the coal-cellar, or leave them in charge of the servants next door, or with the milk-woman round the corner; but have 'em they would. "And I don't mind confessing, sir," said the old man, bringing his long speech to an end, "that it was an inconveniency not to have so much as a scrap to shave before. I used to go to the barber's at first, but I soon gave that up, and took to wearing my beard as my master did; likewise to keeping my hair—" Mr. Masey touched his head as he spoke—"so short that it did n't require any parting, before or behind."

I sat for some time lost in amazement, and staring at my companion. My curiosity was powerfully stimulated, and the desire to learn more was very strong within me.

"Had your master any personal defect," I inquired, "which might have made it distressing to him to see his own image reflected?"

"By no means, sir," said the old man. "He was as handsome a gentleman as you would wish to see, a little delicate-looking and care-worn, perhaps, with a very pale face; but as free from any deformity as you or I, sir. No, sir, no; it was nothing of that."

"Then what was it? What is it?" I asked, desperately. "Is there no one who is, or has been, in your master's confidence?"

"Yes, sir," said the old fellow, with his eyes turning to that window opposite. "There is one person who knows all my master's secrets, and this secret among the rest."

"And who is that?"

The old man turned round and looked at me fixedly. "The doctor here," he said. "Dr. Garden. My master's very old friend."

"I should like to speak with this gentleman," I said, involuntarily.

"He is with my master now," answered Masey. "He will be coming out presently, and I think I may say he will answer any question you may like to put to him." As the old man spoke, the door of the house opened, and a middle-aged gentleman, who was tall and thin, but who lost something of his height by a habit of stooping, appeared on the step. He was, in appearance, a man who had experienced considerable in the years he had lived, and from his dress, which had at one time been excellent, but which now was seedy and faded, one could easily judge what occupation he followed. I said he was middle-aged, but upon a close scrutiny of his features, they would indicate that he had passed the meridian of life and was on the home-stretch. There was a serious expression upon his face just as the door was opened, but as he entered a visible change passed over it, and an assumed cheerfulness lit up his whole countenance. Old Masey left me in a moment. He muttered something about taking the doctor's directions, and hastened across the road. The tall gentleman spoke to him for a minute or two very seriously, probably about the patient up-stairs, and it then seemed to me from their gestures that I myself was the subject of some further conversation between them. At all events, when old Masey retired into the house, the doctor came across to where I was standing, and addressed me with a very agreeable smile.

"John Masey tells me that you are interested in the case of my poor friend, sir. I am now going back to my house, and if you don't mind the trouble of walking with me, I shall be happy to enlighten you as far as I am able."

I hastened to make my apologies and express my acknowledgments, and we set off together. When we had reached the doctor's house and were seated in his study, I ventured to inquire after the health of his poor gentleman.

"I am afraid there is no amendment, nor any prospect of amendment," said the doctor. "Old Masey has told you something of his strange condition, has he not?"

"Yes, he has told me something," I answered, "and he says you know all about it."

Dr. Garden looked very grave. "I don't know all about it. I only know what happens when he comes into the presence of a looking-glass. But as to the circumstances which have led to his being haunted in the strangest fashion that I ever heard of, I know no more of them than you do."

"Haunted?" I repeated. "And in the strangest fashion that you ever heard of?"

Dr. Garden smiled at my eagerness, seemed to be collecting his thoughts, and presently went on:

"I made the acquaintance of Mr. Oswald Strange in a curious [illegible] I was on board of an Italian steamer, bound from Civita Vecchia to Marseilles. We had been travelling all night. In the morning I was shaving myself in the cabin when suddenly this man came behind me, glanced for a moment into the small mirror before which I was standing, and then, without a word of warning, tore it from the wall and dashed it to pieces at my feet. His face was white livid with passion—it seemed to me rather the passion of fear than of anger—but it changed after a time, and he seemed ashamed of what he had done. 'Well,' continued the Dr., relapsing for a moment into a smile, 'of course I was in a devil of a rage. I was operating on my under-eyelid with a view to the thing gave me caused me to cut my face. Besides, altogether, it seemed an outrageous and insolent thing, and I gave it to poor Strange in a style of language which I am sorry to think of now, but which, I hope, was excusable at the time. As to the offender himself, his confusion and regret, now that his passion was at an end, distressed me. He sent for the steward, paid most liberally for the damage done to the steamboat property, explaining to him and to some other passengers who were present in the cabin, that what had happened had been accidental. For me, however, he had another explanation. Perhaps he felt that I must know it to have been no accident—perhaps he really wished to confide in some one. At all events he owned to me that what he had done was done under the influence of an uncontrollable impulse—a seizure which took him, he said, at times—something like a fit. He begged my pardon and entreated that I would endeavor to disassociate him personally from this action, of which he was heartily ashamed. Then he attempted a sickly joke, poor fellow, about his wearing a beard and feeling a little spiteful in consequence when he saw other people taking the trouble to shave; but he said nothing about any infirmity or delusion, and I shortly after left me.

"In my professional capacity I could not help taking some interest in Mr. Strange. I did not altogether lose sight of him after our sea-journey to Marseilles was over. I found him a pleasant companion up to a certain point; but I always felt that there was a reserve about him. He was uncommunicative about his past life, and especially would never allude to anything connected with his travels or his residence in Italy, which, however, I could make out had been a long one. He spoke Italian well and seemed familiar with the country, but disliked to talk about it.

"During the time we spent together there were seasons when he was so little himself, that I, with a pretty large experience, was almost afraid to be with him. His attacks were violent and sudden in the last degree; and there was one most extraordinary feature connected with them all—some horrible association of idea took possession of him whenever he found himself before a looking-glass. And after we had traveled together for a time, I dreaded the sight of a mirror hanging, heedlessly against a wall, or a toilet-glass standing on a dressing-table, almost as much as he did.

"Poor Strange was not always affected in the same manner by a looking-glass. Sometimes it seemed to madden him with fury; at other times, it appeared to turn him to stone; remaining motionless and speechless as if attacked by catalepsy. One night—the worst things always happen at night, and oftener than one would think on stormy nights—we arrived at a small town in the central district of Auvergne; a place but little known, out of the line of railways and to which we had been drawn, partly by the antiquarian attractions which the place possessed, and partly by the beauty of the scenery. The weather had been rather against us. The day had been dull and murky, the heat stifling and the sky had threatened mischief since the morning. At sundown, these threats were fulfilled. The thunderstorm, which had been all day coming up—as it seemed to us, against the wind—burst over the place where we were lodged with very great violence.

"There are some practical-minded persons with strong constitutions, who deny roundly that their fellow-creatures are, or can be, affected, in mind or body, by atmospheric influences. I am not a disciple of that school, simply because I cannot believe that those changes of weather, which have so much effect upon animals, and even on inanimate objects, can fail to have some influence on a piece of machinery so sensitive and intricate as the human frame. I think, then, that it was in part owing to the disturbed state of the atmosphere that, on this particular evening, I felt nervous and depressed. When my new friend Strange and I parted for the night, I felt as little disposed to go to rest as I ever did in my life. The thunder was still lingering among the mountains in the midst of which our inn was placed. Sometimes it seemed nearer, and at other times further off; but it never left off altogether, except for a few minutes at a time. I was quite unable to shake off a succession of painful ideas which persistently besieged my mind.

"It is hardly necessary to add that I thought from time to time of my traveling companion in the next room. His image was almost continually before me. He had been dull and depressed all the evening, and when we parted for the night there was a look in his eyes which I could not get out of my memory.

"There was a door between our rooms, and the partition dividing them was not very solid; and yet I had heard no sound since I parted from him which could indicate that he was there at all, much less that he was awake and stirring. I was in a mood, sir, which made this silence terrible to me, and so many foolish fancies—as that he was lying there dead, or in a fit, or what not—took possession of me, that at last I could bear it no longer. I went to the door, and, after listening, very attentively but quite in vain, for any sound, I at last knocked pretty sharply. There was no answer. Feeling that longer suspense would be unendurable, I, without more ceremony, turned the handle and went in.

"It was a great bare room, and so imperfectly lighted by a single candle that it was almost impossible—except when the lightning flashed—to see into its great dark corners. A small rickety bedstead stood against one of the walls, shrouded by yellow cotton curtains, passed through a great iron ring in the ceiling. There was, for all other furniture, an old chest of drawers which served also as a washing-stand, having a small basin and ewer and a single towel arranged on the top of it. There were, moreover, two ancient chairs and a dressing-table. On this last stood a large old-fashioned looking-glass, with a carved frame.

"I must have seen all these things, because I remember them so well now, but I do not know how I could have seen them, for it seems to me that, from the moment of my entering that room, the action of my senses and of the faculties of my mind was held fast by the ghastly figure which stood motionless before the looking-glass in the middle of the empty room.

"How terrible it was! The weak light of one candle standing on the table shone upon Strange's face, lighting it from below, and throwing (as I now remember) his shadow, vast and black, upon the wall behind him and upon the ceiling overhead. He was leaning rather forward, with his hands upon the table supporting him and gazing into the glass which stood before him with a horrible fixity. The sweat was on his white face; his rigid features and his pale lips showed in that feeble light were horrible, more than words can tell, to look at. He was so completely stupefied and lost, that the noise I had made in knocking and in entering the room was unobserved by him. Not even when I called him loudly by name did he move nor did his face change.

"What a vision of horror that was, in the great dark empty room, in a silence that was something more than negative, that ghastly figure frozen into stone by some unexplained terror! And the silence and the stillness! The very thunder had ceased now. My heart stood still with fear. Then, moved by some instinctive feeling, under whose influence I acted mechanically, I crept with slow steps nearer and nearer to the table, and at last, half expecting to see some spectre even more horrible than this which I saw already, I looked over his shoulder into the looking-glass. I happened to touch his arm, though only in the lightest manner. In that one moment the spell which had held him—who knows how long?—enchained, seemed broken, and he lived in this world again. He turned round upon me, as suddenly as a tiger makes its spring, and seized me by the arm.

"I have told you that even before I entered my friend's room I had felt, all that night, depressed and nervous. The necessity for action at this time was, however, so obvious, and this man's agony made all that I had felt appear so trifling, that much of my own discomfort seemed to leave me. I felt that I must be strong.

"The face before me almost unmanned me. The eyes which looked into mine were so scared with terror, the lips—if I may say so—looked so speechless. The wretched man gazed long into my face, and then, still holding me by the arm, slowly, very slowly, turned his head. I had gently tried to move him away from the looking-glass, but he would not stir, and now he was looking into it as fixedly as ever. I could bear this no longer, and, using such force as was necesssary, I drew him gradually away, and got him to one of the chairs at the foot of the bed. 'Come!' I said—after the long silence my voice, even to myself, sounded strange and hollow—'come! You are over-tired and you feel the weather. Don't you think you ought to be in bed? Suppose you lie down. Let me try my medical skill in mixing you a composing draught.'

"He held my hand and looked eagerly into my eyes. 'I am better now,' he said, speaking at last very faintly. Still he looked at me in that wistful way. It seemed as if there were something that he wanted to do or say, but had not sufficient resolution. At length he got up from the chair to which I had led him, and beckoning me to follow him, went across the room to the dressing-table and stood again before the glass. A violent shudder passed through his frame as he looked into it; but apparently forcing himself to go through with what he had now begun, he remained where he was, and, without looking away, moved to me with his hand to come and stand beside him. I complied.

"'Look in there!' he said, in an almost inaudible tone. He was supported, as before, by his hands resting on the table, and could only bow with his head towards the glass to intimate what he meant. 'Look in there!' he repeated.

"I did as he asked me.

"'What do you see?' he asked next.

"'See?' I repeated, trying to speak as cheerfully as I could, and describing the reflexion of his own face as nearly as I could. 'I see a very pale face with sunken cheeks——'

"'What?' he cried, with an alarm in his voice which I could not understand.

"'With sunken cheeks,' I went on, 'and two hollow eyes with large pupils.'

"I saw the reflexion of my friend's face change, and felt his hand clutch my arm even more tightly than he had done before. I stopped abruptly and looked round at him. He did not turn his head towards me, but, gazing still into the looking glass, seemed to labor for utterance.

"'What,' he stammered at last, 'Do—you—see it—too?'

"'See what?' I asked, quickly.

"'That face!' he cried, in accents of horror. 'That face—which is not mine—and which—I SEE INSTEAD OF MINE—always!'

"I was struck speechless by the words. In a moment this mystery was explained—but what an explanation! Worse, a hundred times worse, than anything I had imagined. What! Had this man lost the power of seeing his own image as it was reflected there before him? and, in its place, was there the image of another? Had he changed reflexions with some other man? The frightfulness of the thought struck me speechless for a time—then I saw how false an impression my silence was conveying.

"'No, no, no!' I cried, as soon as I could speak—'a hundred times, no! I see you, of course, and only you. It was your face I was attempting to describe, and no other.'

"He seemed not to hear me. 'Why, look there!' he said, in a low, indistinct voice, pointing to his own image in the glass. 'Whose face do you see there?'

"'Why, yours, of course.' And then, after a moment, I added, 'Whose do you see?'

"He answered, like one in a trance, 'His—only his—always his!' He stood still a moment, and then, with a loud and terrific scream, repeated those words, 'ALWAYS HIS, ALWAYS HIS,' and fell down in a fit before me.

"I knew what to do now. Here was a thing which, at any rate, I could understand. I had with me my usual small stock of medicines and surgical instruments, and I did what was necessary: first to restore my unhappy patient, and next to procure for him the rest he needed so much. He was very ill—at death's door for some days—and I could not leave him, though there was urgent need that I should be back in London. When he began to mend, I sent over to England for my servant—John Masey—whom I knew I could trust. Acquainting him with the outlines of the case, I left him in charge of my patient, with orders that he should be brought over to this country as soon as he was fit to travel.

"That awful scene was always before me. I saw this devoted man day after day, with the eyes of my imagination, sometimes destroying in his rage the harmless looking-glass, which was the immediate cause of his suffering, sometimes transfixed before the horrid image that turned him to stone. I recollect coming upon him once when we were stopping at a roadside inn, and seeing him stand so by broad daylight. His back was turned towards me, and I waited and watched him for nearly half an hour as he stood there motionless and speechless, and appearing not to breathe. I am not sure but that this apparition, seen so by daylight, was more ghastly than that apparition seen in the middle of the night, with the thunder rumbling among the hills.

"Back in London in his own house, where he could command in some sort the objects which should surround him, poor Strange was better than he would have been elsewhere. He seldom went out except at night, but once or twice I have walked with him by daylight, and have seen him terribly agitated when we have had to pass a shop in which looking-glasses were exposed for sale.

"It is nearly a year now since my poor friend followed me down to this place, to which I have retired. For some months he has been daily getting weaker and weaker, and a disease of the lungs has become developed in him, which has brought him to his death-bed. I should add, by-the-by, that John Masey has been his constant companion ever since I brought them together, and I have had, consequently, to look after a new servant.

"And now tell me," the doctor added, bringing his tale to an end, "did you ever hear a more miserable history, or was ever man haunted in a more ghastly manner than this man?"

I was about to reply, when we heard a sound of footsteps outside, and before I could speak old Masey entered the room, in haste and disorder.

"I was just telling this gentleman," the doctor said, not at the moment noticing old Masey's changed manner, "how you deserted me to go over to your present master."

"Ah! sir," the man answered, in a troubled voice, "I 'm afraid he won't be my master long."

The doctor was on his legs in a moment. "What! Is he worse?"

"I think, sir, he is dying," said the old man.

"Come with me, sir; you may be of use if you can keep quiet." The doctor caught up his hat as he addressed me in those words, and in a few minutes we had reached The Compensation House. A few seconds more and we were standing in a darkened room on the first floor, and I saw lying on a bed before me—pale, emaciated, and, as it seemed, dying—the man whose story I had just heard.

He was lying with closed eyes when we came into the room, and I had leisure to examine his features. What a tale of misery they told! They were regular and symmetrical in their arrangement, and not without beauty—the beauty of exceeding refinement and delicacy. Force there was none, and perhaps it was to the want of this that the faults—perhaps the crime—which had made the man's life so miserable were to be attributed. Perhaps the crime? Yes, it was not likely that an affliction lifelong and terrible, such as this he had endured, would come upon him unless some misdeed had provoked the punishment. What misdeed we were soon to know.

It sometimes—I think generally—happens that the presence of any one who stands and watches beside a sleeping man will wake him, unless his slumbers are unusually heavy. It was so now. While we looked at him, the sleeper awoke very suddenly and fixed his eyes upon us. He put out his hand and took the doctor's in its feeble grasp. "Who is that?" he asked next, pointing towards me.

"Do you wish him to go? The gentleman knows something of your sufferings and is powerfully interested in your case; but he will leave us, if you wish it," the doctor said.

"No. Let him stay."

Seating myself out of sight, but where I could both see and hear what passed, waited for what should follow. Dr. Garden and John Masey stood beside the bed. There was a moment's pause.

"I want a looking-glass," said Strange, without a word of preface.

We all started to hear him say those words.

"I am dying," said Strange; "will you not grant me my request?"

Doctor Garden whispered to old Masey, and the latter left the room. He was not absent long, having gone no further than the next house. He held an oval-framed mirror in his hand when he returned. A shudder passed through the body of the sick man as he saw it.

"Put it down," he said faintly—"anywhere—for the present."

No one of us spoke. I do not think, in that moment of suspense, that we could, any of us, have spoken if we had tried.

The sick man tried to raise himself a little. "Prop me up," he said. "I speak with difficulty—I have something to say."

They put pillows behind him, so as to raise his head and body.

"I have presently a use for it," he said, indicating the mirror. "I want to see——" He stopped, and seemed to change his mind. He was sparing of his words. "I want to tell you—all about it." Again he was silent. Then he seemed to make a great effort and spoke once more, beginning very abruptly.

"I loved my wife fondly. I loved her—her name was Lucy. She was English; but, after we were married, we lived long abroad—in Italy. She liked the country, and I liked what she liked. She liked to draw, too, and I got her a master. He was an Italian. I will not give his name. We always called him 'the Master.' A treacherous insidious man this was, and, under cover of his profession, took advantage of his opportunities, and taught my wife to love him—to love him.

"I am short of breath. I need not enter into details as to how I found them out; but I did find them out. We were away on a sketching expedition, when I made my discovery. My rage maddened me, and there was one at hand who fomented my madness. My wife had a maid, who, it seemed, had also loved this man—the Master—and had been ill treated and deserted by him. She told me all. She had played the part of go-between—had carried letters. When she told me these things, it was night, in a solitary Italian town, among the mountains. 'He is in his room now,' she said, 'writing to her.'

"A frenzy took possession of me as I listened to these words. I am naturally vindictive—remember that—and now my longing for revenge was like a thirst. Traveling in these lonely regions, I was armed, and when the woman said, 'He is writing to your wife,' I laid hold of my pistols, as by an instinct. It has been some comfort to me since, that I took them both. Perhaps, at that moment, I may have meant fairly by him—meant that we should fight. I do n't know what I meant, quite. The woman's words, 'He is in his own room now, writing to her,' rung in my ears.

The sick man stopped to take breath. It seemed an hour, though it was probably not more than two minutes, before he spoke again.

"I managed to get into his room unobserved. Indeed, he was altogether absorbed in what he was doing. He was sitting at the only table in the room, writing at a traveling-desk, by the light of a single candle. It was a rude dressing-table, and—and before him—exactly before him—there was—there was a looking-glass.

"I stole up behind him as he sat and wrote by the light of the candle. I looked over his shoulder at the letter, and I read, 'Dearest Lucy, my love, my darling.' As I read the words, I pulled the trigger of the pistol I held in my right hand, and killed him—killed him—but, before he died, he looked up once—not at me, but at my image before him in the glass, and his face—such a face—has been there—ever since, and mine—my face—is gone."

He fell back exhausted, and we all pressed forward thinking that he must be dead, he lay so still.

But he had not yet passed away. He revived under the influence of stimulants. He tried to speak, and muttered indistinctly from time to time words of which we could sometimes make no sense. We understood, however, that he had been tried by an Italian tribunal, and had been found guilty; but with such extenuating circumstances that his sentence was commuted to imprisonment, during, we thought we made out, two years. But we could not understand what he said about his wife, though we gathered that she was still alive, from something he whispered to the doctor of there being provision made for her in his will.

He lay in a doze for something more than an hour after he had told his tale; and then he woke up quite suddenly, as he had done when we had first entered the room. He looked round uneasily in all directions, until his eye fell on the looking-glass.

"I want it," he said, hastily; but I noticed that he did not shudder now, as it was brought near. When old Macey approached, holding it in his hand, and crying like a child, Dr. Garden came forward and stood between him and his master, taking the hand of poor Strange in his.

"Is this wise?" he asked. "Is it good, do you think, to revive this misery of your life now, when it is so near its close? The chastisement of your crime," he added, solemnly, "has been a terrible one. Let us hope in God's mercy that your punishment is over."

The dying man raised himself with a last great effort, and looked up at the doctor with such an expression on his face as none of us had seen on any face, before.

"I do hope so," he said, faintly, "but you must let me have my way in this—for if, now, when I look; I see aright once more—I shall then hope yet more strongly—for I shall take it as a sign."

The doctor stood aside without another word, when he heard the dying man speak thus, and the old servant drew near, and, stooping over softly, held the looking-glass before his master. Presently afterwards, we, who stood around looking breathlessly at him, saw such a rapture upon his face, as left no doubt upon our minds that the face which had haunted him so long, had, in his last hour, disappeared. —Rugby Junction.

LOOK THROUGH MAN TO THE CREATOR.

(A reverse of 'Look through Nature up to Nature's God.')

Through Humanity look upward,—
After ye the olden plan,—
Look through Man to the Creator,
Maker, Father, God of Man!
Shall imperishable spirit
Yield to perishable clay?
No sublime o'er Alpine mountains
Soars the Mind its heavenward way.

Some within the humblest flowret,
"Thoughts too deep for tears" can see.
Oh the humblest man existing
Is a nobler theme to me!
Thus I take the mightier labor
Of the great Almighty hand:
And through Man to the Creator,
Upward look, and weeping stand.

Thus I take the mightier labor,
Crowning glory of his will;
And believe that in the meanest
Lives a spark of Godhead still:
Something that by Truth expanded,
Might be fostered into worth:
Something struggling through the darkness,
Owning an immortal birth."

THE DOCTRINE OF OUR DIVINE ORIGIN:

ITS AGREEMENT WITH OUR NATURE.

We assert that, to truly feed such a great and unbounded nature as man's is, a religion is required whose views of the origin and destiny of man's spirit shall be as exalted and unbounded as the immensity of his desires. Man needs a religion capable of explaining the affinity of his soul with the majestic and the eternal—one that can also explain why a type of the attributes of Deity is found within him, and tell how it is that such restless and insatiable ambitions are implanted within his nature.

It was one of the teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith that all men and women, without exception, are sons and daughters begotten unto the living God, from whom their attributes have been derived; hence their wide and insatiable character.

This doctrine is, to our mind, a simplifying and natural one; for then all the creative, acquisitive and governing powers with which we operate continually on a small scale are seen to be but counterparts of powers which the Creator, in the vast range of his almighty movements, calls into action above, germs and buddings of his Divinity seeking to unfold itself; hence the wonderful variety and scope of such powers. Thus we learn that every true affection of the heart, every natural ambition, every yearning or striving of the spirit is an impulse of that lofty nature we have received from Him, and that all are eternal and inseparable attributes of our endless being, capable of being and intended to be, infinitely and boundlessly expanded and developed, under the guidance of the Almighty until the Great Father is glorified and reproduced in the perfections of the hearts, minds, and persons of his children; and, consequently, the reason why, wherever human foot has trod, these impulses and ambitions are found expanding their force within the human breast.

Looking around upon this world looking back upon man's history, scriptural or "profane," how simplified and intelligible, in this light, does all appear!

Because man has had infused into him the germ of His qualities who is above all, therefore he is independent in his character. He laughs at prison walls, and dares the martyr's flame to rob him of his will, and therefore he soars ever after the beautiful, the holy and the true.

Because man is divine in his origin, and has come forth from the Author of creative power, and is necessarily imbued with a love for the mighty and supreme, his soul is stirred by any of the great manifestions of his Father's hand in the natural world.

Because of this oneness of nature, therefore it is thundered in our ears by the Deity, Be ye perfect, even as I, your Father in heaven, am perfect! And last, but far from least, because of this great truth, the very code of laws that govern Deity itself will suit us, and are urged upon us by the Lord.

Gloriously does the doctrine of the divine origin of man lift the barriers of darkness from round about our path and destiny, while together to its proof comes rushing from manifold points a scattered mass of testimony. It is seen in the sublime conceptions, the huge efforts and the glories of six thousand years. It is heard also in the responses of the human soul, and found corroborated in the divine teachings of remote and separate ages. Borne on the same tide, and flowing to the same point, come once mysterious movements of the Almighty; and incomprehensible familiarities manifested between God and man explained and reasonable now. Clothed with point, and filled with something like meaning and purpose, comes now also, in this light, the promise of God to man of "thrones, dominions, principalities and powers." Similarly intelligible and forcible is made the promise that we are to be "joint heirs with Jesus Christ," while, as a substantial reality, we can now read those great words—"To him that overcometh will I give to sit down upon my throne even as I have overcome and sit down on my Father's throne." It takes this principle to make sense of the Gospel propositions and promises; without it, they are absurdities—big words with a milk-and-water meaning.

But it may be said, "How great is the distance between man and his God!" Yes, truly; and so is the distance between the little, sleepy, listless, incapable and helpless being we call an infant, unable to move its own head or frame a single word compared to man moving in the pride of his physical strength and intellect. And yet that tiny huddled heap of humanity, oh miracle! becomes a man, rears temples and binds nations together by telegraphic wires!

Yes, the divine origin of man is written in every breast—is seen in the untiring qualities of the mind, ever crying, "On, on to new conquests, new honors, new discoveries and new means for gratification." It was heard in the declaration by man of his own immortality ere the voice of Jesus was heard upon the earth, and it was corroborated, carried on and glorified in his principles and promises when he appeared.

This principle, then, is our natural food. It alone, of all creeds concerning our origin, is in full harmony with the vastness and sweep of our power and aspirations hence it alone is worthy of us. So natural, so sweet so good, so true does it come to us, that we feel it belongs to us as light belongs to our eyes, and was meant for us as much as the juice of the grape for our lips. In other words, it is calculated to satisfy, develop, brighten and make glorious the powers of man's spirit, and thus produces proof that it was and is a heaven born truth sent for man by the same God who made the earth for our feet and light for our grateful eyes.

AN EXTRAORDINARY MAN is eight men, not one man; he has as much wit as if he had no sense, and as much sense as if he had no wit; his conduct is as judicious as if he were the dullest of human beings, and his imagination as brilliant as if he were irretrievably ruined. But when wit is combined with sense and information,—when it is softened by benevolence and restrained by principle,—when it is in the hands of a man who can use it and despise it who can be witty and something more than witty, who loves honor, justice, decency, good-nature, morality and religion, ten thousand times better than wit, wit is then a beautiful and delightful part of our nature.

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY, ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

No. 2.—THE FIRST CHRISTIAN EMPEROR.

After his vision of the cross, Constantine consulted several of the principal teachers of the Christian religion, and publicly avowed a profession of the faith. He thus endeared to himself his veteran soldiers who were mostly Christians, and then he hastened into Italy with his army.

The army of Constantine consisted of 90,000 foot and 8000 horse; but it was at the head of only 40,000 that he marched to meet an enemy four times superior in numbers to his own. But the soldiers of our hero were veterans from Gaul inspired with the faith of a new religion. After storming the city of Susa, Constantine met a numerous army of the Italians on the plains of Turin, which he routed. He afterwards made his entry into the imperial city of Milan, and victory in Italy everywhere followed his conquering host. Armies mighty in numbers and commanded by the flower of the Roman generals were crushed by the valiant Constantine.

At length, the illustrous champion of the cross vanquished Maxentius himself, and entered Rome a conqueror. His was a triumph in the world's history worthy even the immortal Julius Cæsar, whom more than any other till the advent of Napoleon the Great, Constantine resembled.

When Constantine drew nigh to Rome with his veteran army of Christian soldiers, he issued a proclamation to the Romans. He said he came not to make war upon them, but to deliver the capital from the execrable rule of a monster.

Our Christian hero had heard his oracle speak, whether from the heavens or from the temple of his own ambitious soul, it matters not to those who estimate the grand results of ages rather than trifle in quibbles over their uncertain causes. In effect, he had seen his vision, was inspired by its omens, and his legions believing therein, were as a tower of almighty strength around their general. It is the logic and form of facts that tell in the world's great events; and an army inspired with an almost supernatural confidence in divine protection is one of the most stupendous facts; nor is the might of that army less, because of its superstitions and grand fanaticism. Constantine and his army represented that fact; but how stood the case with Maxentius? He, too, sought for oracles and wooed a propitious fate; and just here we have a fine example of superstitions which are as hideous catacombs of mummied nations and superstitions of a new religion, whose very forms of idolatry is pregnant with a living faith.

On one side, we have Constantine and his vision of the cross; on the other, Maxentius inviting victory to his arms by magical services and incantations. He sacrificed lions and caused pregnant women to be opened to examine the children in their wombs, and consulted auguries. The answers were unfavorable, and Maxentius in a panic deserted his palace, and, with his wife and son, retired to a private house. But this prince, whose conduct bears such a marked contrast with that of his heroic rival, sent out his generals with an army of a hundred and sixty thousand infantry and eighteen thousand cavalry to meet the army of Constantine. The vast host of the idolater, passing the Tiber, encountered the soldiers of the Cross and the battle raged.

Meantime Maxentius, kept from the glorious strife of contending hosts by his cowardice and superstition, was giving public games in the circus in honor of his exaltation to the imperial throne. At this moment when the two hostile armies of the empire were engaged and Rome treated to its holiday, a terrible shout from the city shook the circus as the multitude came rushing towards it. "Death to the traitor! Death to the coward and the traitor! Glory to the invincible Constantine!" Rome had mutinied.

Maxentius fled from the circus, and ordered the senators to consult the sybilline books, and was answered that on that very day the enemy of the Romans would perish miserably. Encouraged by this, he left Rome and joined his army which was soon afterwards routed by the legions of Constantine. With his panic-stricken soldiers, he regained the bridge of boats which he had built across the Tiber, and was drowned. The bridge had been treacherously constructed as a snare for his rival's army, but Maxentius himself fell into it. The next day, his body being found, his head was cut off and carried through the streets of Rome on a pike.

Galerius, who still held the rank of the Augusti, had appointed Licinius emperor of the West, but Constantine made common cause with this rival, who had espoused his sister Constantia. Galerius soon afterwards died, and Jovius Maximin succeeded him and affected the title of emperor, but Constantine and his brother-in-law, Licinius, destroyed his army, and thus in A. D. 313 the empire once more became divided between two rulers, Constantine for the West and Licinius for the East.

On the following year, Constantine attempted to overthrow Licinius to unite the empire in himself, but he could only wrest Illyria from him. A peace of nine years was then concluded between the imperial brothers-in-law. During this period, Constantine, like a wise statesman, consolidated his power and effected great radical reforms in the civil, military and judicial administration of the empire.

One of the first acts of Constantine, after his triumph, was to ordain that no criminal should suffer death by crucifixion, which was, undoubtedly, inspired by the sacred awe attached to the Sacrament of the Cross, as well as from motives of humanity. And as early as A. D. 312, he granted toleration to the Christians and restored to them the property which his predecessors had confiscated. Edicts were promulgated declaring that they should be relieved of all their grievances and received into places of trust and authority in the State. Sunday was also set apart and every attempt to restrain the religious liberty of the followers of Christ was punished by the imperial champion of the Cross with severity. Being associated with the State, the new religion spread throughout the whole empire and the power which had been formerly wielded by the pagan priesthood passed now into the hands of the Bishops and clergy of the Christian church.

Licinius, the emperor of the East, on his side, pursued a different policy to that of Constantine, emperor of the West. He sought to renew the persecutions against the Christians, and to rally around him the pagan priests. This Licinius was the son of a peasant of Dacia, who, by his remarkable courage, had won his way to the rank of the Cæsars; but, reaching supreme power over the Eastern division of the empire, he gave himself up to intemperance and shameless excesses. Being himself extremely ignorant, he called literary men "a poison and a public pest," and caused them to be put to death for no other crime than their intellectual manifestations. In this, he did nothing worse than that which many a sovereign pontiff since has done; but Constantine's genius and policy as a statesman led him, like his father, to patronize men of letters, and to act the part of a magnanimous prince. Thus it is fortunate for the world, when these imperial Cæsars—these lions of the earth find their destiny on the side of human progress and the development of new civilizations. Their ambitions—aye, their very crimes—then become glorified in the great results which they work out for mankind.

Constantine, through his wise administration in the State and the army, after a gradual consolidation of his power during the term of peace between himself and his imperial brother-in-law found himself in a position, in A. D. 322, of carrying out his long cherished design of uniting the empire in his own person. Licinius, by his attempt to repeat the persecutions against the Christians and restore the pagan priesthood, gave the desired opportunity; and, having been conquered by the troops of his brother-in-law, he was beheaded.

Again was the Roman empire consolidated in a successor of Julius Cæsar, and if his reign is marred by the usual acts of conquerors who sweep every obstruction from the path where their vast ambitions lead and crush out the life of their rivals with an iron heel, that reign was glorified by great deeds, wise administrations in the State, and radical reforms. The Roman empire lived again in its fullness of strength, the commonwealth thrived. Yet was he an imperialist, and not a republican, an absolute prince, and not a lover of popular governments. Like the first Cæsar and the last Cæsar—our own Napoleon—he was the outgrowth of republicanism and the elected of the popular voice of the army, but he became himself the very embodiment of empire. For several centuries, the army had been in the habit of putting the State up at a price and chosing their emperors according to this will or caprice; but Constantine now by a superior will brought order out of chaos and constructed a powerful machinery of a regular constitutional government. It was an imperial form, but it was a legitimate form and not an empire merely in name. With a genius for State-building, equal to his genius for conquering, he separated the civil from the military administration, but united both in the hands of the sovereign. Though a warrior by profession and instinct, after his elevation to the supreme power, he applied his great abilities to the work of the commonwealth; and, with the exception of a brief war with the Goths, in A.D. 332, his reign was one of peace and prosperity to the State. He created a heirarchy which has been, from that day, the model of the European monarchies. He organized a standing army of 300,000 men and 29 naval squadrons; and, to support this vast machinery of his empire, he instituted a regular system of finances, and imposed taxation that seemed equitable to the people.

Shortly after the establishment of Christian dominance in the Roman empire, Constantine removed the seat of his government from the capital of the Cæsars to Byzantium, the design being to call the place New Rome, but the name of Constantinople became the denomination of the new capital. This change in the seat of government weakened the fabric of the State, and exposed the Roman empire to a more speedy disolution. The design was for a happier centralization of a dominion which had spread over the world; but this change broke a national unity which was not restored until Charlemagne from the West consolidated a Christendom to succeed that of Constantine the Great.

It was in the reign of the first Christian emperor, (in 325) that the famous Council of Nice was held. The Church, having entered upon a state of grandeur and temporal power gave trouble to the emperor to preserve its harmony. On the one side were proud absolute prelates representing the orthodoxy, on the other, daring innovators. Arius, chief of a new sect of schismatics sprang up, and Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, took the innovators under his protection and propogated their doctrines. This prelate drew over to their side Constantina, sister of the emperor; daring bishops favored the schism, and terrible disputes and bloody combats ensued. Constantine, in order to stop the disse the established Church of the empire. From that period dates the union of Church and State.

One of his biographers thus describes our imperial hero: "This prince had a majestic port and a great soul; he was brave, hardy, provident in his enterprises; but he joined great vices with these good qualities. * * * Constantine truly merited the surname of Great, if we take this epithet in its entire acceptation. What prudence did he not display in avoiding the perils which he encountered on his route towards the empire! What intrepidity in confronting the most frightful perils! What valor in attacking and conquering enemies equally redoubtable for the bravery and the numbers! What courage and wisdom in holding, during thirty years, the reins of an empire which was offered at auction! What consummate skill, to govern in peace so many different people, and to assure their happiness by causing them to submit to equitable laws!"

On the side of his defects, the portrait of Constantine is drawn as an unnatural father who put to death his own son at the instigation of a step-mother, as an inflexible husband, who commanded his wife to be strangled in a bath, as a cruel politician who, from State policy, shed the blood of his nephew, young Licinius. His embracing of Christianity is said to have been also the result of his ambitious policy; and the fact that he did not receive the sacrament of baptism until a few minutes before his death, is instanced by writers as a proof of this. We think, however, that this circumstance is rather a proof of the genuine conversion of Constantine to Christianity in his form of faith, if not to the entire sanctification of all the purposes of his life. We are too much in the habit of judging the world's great characters as we would the archangels of heaven, forgetting that the one is human and the other purified and perfected—aye, we say purified, for those very archangels had once in their composition much of dross and evil passions. Ask Lucifer, son of the Morning, if that is not true! On one side, great souls are splendid to the dazzling of ages—to the admiration of worlds. Look on their reverse side: it is dark and forbidding as the wing of Night. Thus was it with the character and life of Constantine the Great; and the fact that, during his sixty years of mortality, he worked to the fulfillment of his own imperial programme and only in his last moments, received the sacrament of service to a higher monarch than himself, is at once a characteristic of men of his class and an evidence that his vision of the cross was genuine to him.

Constantine was preparing a war against Persia when he suddenly fell ill and died on the day of Pentecost (A. D. 337), after having been baptised by the bishop of Nicomedia. He was buried in the Church of the apostles at Constantinople.

NOTE.—The author (E. W. Tailidge) of "The World's History, Illustrated in its Great Characters," has opened his encyclopedia of philosophical biographies with Constantine the Great. To make the subject complete, he deemed his four preliminary chapters necessary to give the historical linking. Constantine the Great seems to be the proper character to open the imperial division of the subject. There are some characters whose very biography is the religious history of the times and who are themselves the souls of their age. Such was Elizabeth of England, whose biography is the world's history illustrated in her. The other half of the Protestant subject is "William the Silent," founder of the Dutch republic. It is such a class of persons that the author has chosen to dramatically illustrate the world's history, which will be an encyclopedia of biographies, not a continuation of chapters.

MENTAL PHILOSOPHY.

BY JOHN NICHOLSON.

The advocates of the combined principles of physiology, phrenology and physiognomy claim that in them is incorporated the true key to the science of mind. The truth or falsity of this assertion, in the opinion of the writer, remains yet to be proved. Arguments and reasons can be adduced in support of either the affirmative or negative side of the question, but, however much we may reason on this or any other subject, in the absence of stern, stubborn facts to demonstrate the matter to a certainty, there must inevitably be doubts remaining to be cleared up. It is also affirmed, by the exponents of the principles alluded to, that every inherent quality of the mind is indicated by a visible outward sign, and that a thorough knowledge of those signs will enable a person to judge their fellow men as easily as they would read a book. If the system is thus perfect,which yet remains to be proven, it would be safe to say that more of ist votaries have attained to a point of perfection to enable them to minutely determine the qualities of mind possessed by individuals, although some doubtless come near the mark in many particulars. It savors too much of egotism to claim infallibility for any system, the perfection of which has not yet been thoroughly manifested. It can, however, be claimed in behalf of phrenology, etc., that the system incorporates many indisputable truths which are simple enough to be tested by anybody of ordinary intelligence. Nearly EVERYBODY IS A PHYSIOGNOMIST AND PHRENOLOGIST, and many unconsciously pride themselves on their proficiency as such. People are often heard to say, "I always form an opinion of a person at first sight." From what are such opinions formed? From impressions made by the subjects of such opinions. Whence come the impressions? They must be derived from something heard, seen or felt. That something must surely be indicative of qualities of mind possessed by the persons who make the impressions. That impressions regarding individuals pass through one or other or all of the senses is evident from the fact that one may stand in close proximity to a person, and if they are not permitted to see, hear or touch them, they will be unable to form a judgment or opinion in relation to the individual. This shows that impressions, good, bad or indifferent, are generally caused by external indications, although an observer of individualities may be unconscious of this fact through ignorance of the means through which his impressions are derived. Although this is the case, yet there is doubtless a higher method of gauging human character and capacity than that which is manifested through the outward senses by external indications. It is a surer method than the application of the principles of phrenology, etc. "It is a more sure word of prophecy." The name most befitting the inestimable gift would be SPIRITUAL DISCERNMENT.

This is a special gift of the Almighty, and is generally bestowed on those of a highly susceptible and spiritual nature. Such are not dependent upon the outward senses to "judge a righteous judgment," for even if not otherwise aware of the proximity of individuals or spirits, they can "feel their presence." This was the gift exercised by the Savior when He read the very thoughts that were passing through the minds of those with whom he associated. It is a power that can scarcely be explained and certainly cannot be understood except by those who have, in some degree, experienced and enjoyed it. When compared with this power, the attainments to be arrived at through phrenology, etc., are as nothing. Therefore, whatever ideas the writer may give in relation to the best mode of judging capacity, etc., let it be understood that he does not claim infallibility for the system and is far from laying such claim for the ideas he may advance, realizing that he knows but little. However, having been requested to write something on the subject, he will endeavor to do so; but, on account of his limited knowledge, his productions will necessarily be somewhat fragmentary.

Correspondence, Etc.

[NOTE.—Under this heading we insert small, unpretending compositions, that lay no special claim to literary ability, but which are sent with a desire to give variety and a home character to our columns.]

The following, for an unpretending effusion, has some good points. The writer should try again:

THE ANGEL'S WHISPER—TO MOTHER.

Dear Mother, take comfort, let your bright eye be tearless,
Lament not the loss of your darling who's gone;
Far remote from earth's din, in the angels' bright dwelling,
My young heart is beating in love with your own.

In solitude lonely, bid Father be cheerful—
I know that his heart oftimes aches for his boy;
Drive the dark clouds away that around him are hovering,
His sorrow is deep—he's a stranger to joy.

My Brother I left on the earth—how I love him!
In infancy's home, I remember that he
Was indulgent and kind—ever truthful and loving—
Ask him, dear Mother, does he think about me.

You ask me, dear Mother, if I'm happy—and wonder
Who cares for your boy in his new home above
'Mong blest ones in glory—I'm a gem in the circle,
Where innocence basks in the sunshine of love.

On the rough track of life, with the eye of an angel,
I'll watch you, dear mother, where e'er you may roam
And when in ripe years you have ended your journey,
To a bright world above I shall welcome you home.

The ties that unite us are strong and enduring,
Our love for each other no power can destroy;
Though my life on the earth pass'd away like a shadow,
I shall be for ever your own darling boy.

THE BOOK OF MORMON.

Now cometh the record once written on gold,
That angels from heaven rejoice to unfold,
'Tis clear as the crystal and bright as the light
When morning streams over the shadows of night.

A whisper of words that have slept in the dust,
Yet graven on plates never dimmed by the rust;
They rise from their tomb as the righteous awoke,
When Jesus their slumbers of darkness had broke.

The peal of the thunder that told of his death,
The voice of the stormy wind's hurrying breath,
And sweetness of accents that dropped as he came,
To heal all the sick, and the blind and the lame.

Let glory be sung in the lands of our birth,
That God has presented this book to the earth—
A beacon that ages unborn will yet bless—
A standard to gather the poor from distress.

Music and the Drama.

THE HEART THAT SINGS.

We remember an anecdote of one of the world's great singers that has in it a pretty moral. In his boyhood, his ear was so finely attuned that he could not endure the least discord. His father also possessed a magnificent voice, and his brothers were fine singers. So they often held in the evening, family concerts to the admiration of hundreds of passers-by. The youngest was the one who afterwards became celebrated as a singer, and his brothers were not of the same mother. It happened that his mother, poor soul, had no voice to sing, but she had a heart attuned to the praises and glory of God. Now the music sung at evening by the family was always sacred, for the Patriarch of the household was a very Abraham in his religious character, and his wife was a Sarah, possessing "the heart that sings," and an only son. The youngest led as the "soprano boy," the patriarch whose voice at seventy was like a trumpet in its tones and as flexible as a woman's, also sung the "soprano," and the brothers tenor and bass. But the mother—the Sarah of the family—could she be left out of the evening concerts of praise and glory to God, when she was gifted with the "heart that sings" and the soul which, in praise, worships the Creator? No, the mother could not be silent; her part had to be rendered also; but the ear of her boy Isaac could not endure his mother's discord; and so after a while, he would exclaim, disgusted, "Mother, be quiet; don't make such a noise; you put us out of tune." Sarah would burst into tears to hear her Isaac thus chide, for her soul was in tune, if her voice was in discord. "Isaac, Isaac," Abraham would say, "let your poor mother sing; her heart sings!"

Now, there is in a city with twenty thousand God-loving people ten thousand voices that can sing in tune, and thousands besides whose hearts are in tune to the praises and glory of God, though their voices would make some little discord. Wherefore, then, should not the ten thousand voices sing the praises of their God in the sacred songs and hymns of the Church? Wherefore should not the twenty thousand hearts that sing all join in to swell the theme of worship? Think you not there is many a Sarah in Israel whose poor heart is made very dull when that heart has the hymn of praise in it big with speech, but must not give it vent lest some Isaac should chide—"Don't make that noise, you put us out of tune!" How is it, moreover, when a deathlike silence sits upon ten thousand hearts that can sing with ten thousand voices that could, with a fair training of congregational singing, swell out a sonorous harmony to fill the great tabernacle of the congregation with a [illegible] of praise, joined in by "every heart that sings." And if there are good mother Sarahs, whose voices make some little discord, can't father Abraham's voice and Judah's voice and Reuben's voice and Isaac's trumpet-tones drown it in the harmony? We object to the great singer Isaac having all the song to himself, and to his rebuke—"Don't make such a noise, you put us out of tune!"

SHAKSPEARE'S WITCHES.

Shakspeare's Witches are not mere beings, but supernatural beings, yet the subject is so nicely managed that these unreal things not only originate the theme and shape the action, but they themselves form so much of the body of the play. They are as much realities upon the stage as Macbeth and Banquo. Thus our dramatist has brought into palpable relation, performing before the audience, the beings of two worlds. Herein is Shakspeare's triumph, that he has given his spirits a dramatic substance.

There are other pieces put upon the stage in which the deities of mythology are introduced, but they never impress the audience with the feeling of reality. We [illegible] but [illegible]. They are more of the fairy class of pieces, suitable only for the Christmas holidays, and are not presentable as solid dramatic performances. This is somewhat the case with Shakspeare's play of the "Tempest," which, if presented at all with due effect, requires all that a Charles Kean can do for it in fairy-like embellishments. In this drama of magic, Shakspeare has not evolved a legitimate subject of supernatural beings entering into the action of human life. They smack too much of a defunct mythology. They are [illegible] and references, without, to us, the reality of [illegible], which made them to the Greeks much what the God of Israel and his [illegible] were to the Hebrews—at once a part of their religion and their history. [illegible] Ceres, Juno, nymphs, etc., are introduced, but they are too remote from the class of spirits, either good or evil, who will harmonize with the Hebrew or Christian theology, and they take too little hold of the superstitions of modern times. A [illegible] of supernatural beings brought into a modern play must be in harmony with the theology and superstitions of the times. It must be [illegible] Hebrew or Christian in origin. Our poet evidently felt much of this when composing the "Tempest," which called forth from Prospero, as an apology for the [illegible] of [illegible], one of Shakspeare's most splendid passages, in which we have [illegible] a deep vein of [illegible] metaphysics.

> These our actors,
> As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
> Are melted into air, into thin air:
> And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
> The cloud-capped towers, the great globe itself,
> Yea, all which it inherits, shall dissolve,
> And like this insubstantial pageant faded,
> Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
> As dreams are made of, and our little life
> Is rounded with a sleep.

But in the play of Macbeth, though the witches [illegible] melt into thin air, yet we have substance in effect. Between its supernatural beings and action and our own spiritual [illegible] there is both a metaphysical and common [illegible] as [illegible] a relation with the superhuman [illegible] have the souls of evil incarnating [illegible] and the duplex subject held between the [illegible] common action. They [illegible] but seem like the spirits of evil beings [illegible] their wicked part in the other world, [illegible] They are still taking [illegible] earth, and their [illegible] attachment in them toward mortal [illegible] life was also theirs in its relation [illegible] but as the [illegible] more from the [illegible] and they are made more modern [illegible] Israel, who was [illegible] in the [illegible] the weird [illegible] to have [illegible] to [illegible] they implored [illegible] our [illegible] that she had been [illegible]

THE ODDITIES AND HUMBUGS OF LIFE.

BY QUIZ.

It is a long time now since Quiz, in the fullness of his soul, commenced to enlighten the public on the nature of Humbugs in general. He had given the subject up for a time, but Humbug is too important a subject to pass over lightly; he therefore returns, determined to give the reader (who is, of course, no humbug), the benefit of his vast experience on the subject. For the sake of those not personally acquainted with the lucubrations of his gigantic brain, he begins again at the beginning, with the charitable purpose of never stopping again until he has exposed everybody but himself.

Fearful lest we hurt anybody of too delicate a texture, we now present our pathetic preface as of old.

The oddities and humbugs of human life constitute our theme—those petty and unobserved weaknesses that exist in each of us, known well enough to everybody but ourselves. These we shall seek to point out—to portray; that, seeing, we may avoid. Only one thing at the start we must set down, and most positively insist upon, if we never have our own way again as long as we live, whatever we paint, whatever we portray, we never by any means refer to—the reader.

It was our practise when we were a little boy, (we never were a big one, we took to being a man directly after that), to stand inside the porches of house doors in the big city of London and watch the passers-by. Here we made our first acquaintanceship with the "oddities of life," but they were of a peculiar kind; that strange conglomerated crowd embracing every variety of the human species, running after money and dear life in one of the world's large cities; oddities of costume, carriage, countenance, and gesture—oddities slovenly, smart, dandified, neat or showy, knowing, gawking, contemplating, quizzing, manly, dignified, easy, awkward and affected; some of these we may succeed in portraying.

Another feature of our experience, however, did not lie in the mere oddities of life, but in a department with a harder name—the humbugs of life; their name is legion—humbugs imposed on society—humbugs imposed on one's self. At these we propose to let fly the satirist's shaft.

There are, doubtless, individuals in this community, as everywhere else, good illustrations of each species of character we shall introduce. We shall not aim at them but at the class, and if individuals belong to such class, we cannot help it; we wish they did n't.

"THE PUBLIC WANT."

One of the most prominent and soul-comforting facts discovered by Quiz, shortly after entering life, was revealed in the pleasing assurance imparted to him all round, that nobody ever did anything specially for their own glory or good, but all that was done, whether in the way of private or public enterprise by anybody, was most decidedly originated and carried on solely for the welfare of the public at large. This delightful fact was soon impressed upon my youthful understanding in a variety of ways. I learned it from my first schoolmaster. This generous man, as he informed us in a little circular upon his taking "Barking House Academy," had felt moved thereto by "an earnest desire for the welfare of the children of the neighborhood," and not in the least by any reference to sundry shillings which the urchins were to pay him per week. Hardly had I got over the infliction of so much uncalled-for benevolence upon my youthful person before I found that all my school-books, from the primer upwards, had been written for me on the same principle. Every author, as was most prominently manifested in his preface, had observed that the last author of a similar work had failed to make the spelling of d-o-g dog and c-a-t cat, sufficiently clear to my youthful comprehension, or he had noticed, with sorrow of spirit, that the picture of the cat alphabetically accompanying the big letter C, was too much like a dog to do any good, "with a view, therefore, to remedy this defect and to meet the necessities of the public," (not his necessities by any means) he had sacrificed his time to get out a better book.

Could I fail to believe under these circumstances, in the intense moral elevation of the world in which I had so recently arrived? Especially, in after years, when I learned that the same reckless expenditure of benevolence had been going on long before I was born, for the very clergyman who married my parents had "taken up his cross," in accepting six thousand dollars per year, most particularly with a view that such young rascals as myself might in a legal and proper way become a resident of this particular section of the solar system.

But clergymen and schoolmasters were not the only individuals, I discovered, who were living perpetually on the altar of sacrifice. No indeed! the whole neighborhood were affected with the same sacrificial spirit. Store-keepers sold at alarming sacrifices—selling "below prime cost" was the natural bent of their disposition. They could n't help it! A man cannot go against his nature, hence they never made anything, except it was accidentally or through subordinates against their strict orders. The very keepers of common ale houses—sellers of Alton ale, a species of drink popular with many in England—modestly unfolded their unpretentious desires in the following interesting disclosure: "Established to supply the public with pure Alton ale." Was it not good to go to all the trouble of establishing themselves that a thirsty public might have pure Alton ale? Why not let them get it how they could? Simply because the overflowings of their generous natures drowned every other consideration. Yet infatuated clergymen were at that very time insisting upon the fallen nature of man and its tendency to evil, when here was alehouse nature, to say the least, wastefully throwing itself away, for no other purpose in the world than that an ungrateful public—from whom of course they never expected the least return—might be supplied with Alton ale in purity. Is it wonderful, that finding myself surrounded with so much philanthropy, I determined upon going into the same business myself?

If these things had not been sufficient to give my youthful mind that philanthropic bias for which all the Quizes have been so eminently distinguished, and which philanthropy is now expending itself in these very articles—published solely for public good—I should have, of necessity, caught the disease, when on going out into "the wide, wide world"—the very widest with which I am at any rate personally acquainted—a few years after, I found myself floundering in such a sea of general benevolence that if I am not full of the same commodity I certainly ought to be. I very soon found that every newspaper or magazine published in the world had been set on foot not for money—certainly not—but, as the prospectus said, to "meet a want long felt in that department." In fact it was this very principle that led to the publishing of this magazine; and this, of course, constitutes the great difference, between our paper and all the papers previously published in this place.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TELLEDGE.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE TEMPTER AND THE FOSTER-BROTHER.

Beppo, the foster-brother of Terese, though a peasant and bearing a name common enough for any ragged bandit, had become, since we introduced him, a higher type of character than when he first struck our attention. His essential character, now he had become a man, was the same as when a boy, but it had become elaborated and of a finer texture. He was Beppo still, but Beppo in a higher form, with considerable polish and education. The Italian nature is very susceptible of being drawn out and elaborated into artistic character. Italy creates a new nobility—sends to every civilized nation an aristocracy of artistes, especially of the empire of music. What wonder, then, that Beppo should, like his foster-sister, have become one of them? What wonder that he should now be the principal tenore at the opera house, where his foster-sister was prima donna!

What has made this transformation in this wild boy's nature? What has made him an artiste, when not unlikely he would have become one of the banditti, whom he used to visit in the mountains when Terese was offended with him? What had transformed Beppo—the would-have-been bandit—to the principal tenor singer of that opera house? The same magician who had half created the Terese, whom Rome worshipped, and who gave to her the sceptre of song. 'T was the magician Love! Here let the transformed foster-brother appear on the afternoon of the evening of the performance of Terese's opera, related in a former chapter.

By that beautiful villa on the suburbs of Rome, where lived Spontini and his pupil the prima donna, loitered the foster-brother of Terese. His mood was not in keeping with the soft sunny serenity around, which seemed like the halo of paradise fringing that abode of art. Beppo, who had become known to the public as Signor Farinelli, was a shade in that bright-looking land-cape. Imagine him as a Cain, or an Esau or Ishmael, brooding in moody jealousy over his birth-right. Walter was the Jacob who had wrestled and prevailed. Not that Sir Walter had sought the maiden's love, though as we have seen from their first meeting, he became the master of her soul and fate.

As a boy, Beppo was Terese's slave. As a man to be her slave still, as then, took in every desire and hope of his life. To be her slave but blessed with more of her love than others held, he would have sold his soul to the Arch Tempter of mankind. Until Sir Walter Templar came, this was how he stood with his foster-sister, for she loved the passionate jealous Beppo more than any other. But Walter Templar came, and how could stand her slave beside her master?

Within that beautiful abode of art on the suburbs of Rome, and sitting in the music room, were Sir Walter Templar and the prima donna. Terese had requested him to sing to her from Spontini's opera, La Vestale. Without, near the window, in a dark, passionate jealousy, listening, was the foster-brother, Signor Farinelli. Perhaps there was the mingled passion of a two-fold jealousy in his soul, for Walter's voice was superior to his own, both in quality and power, and especially in its majestic declamatory capacity.

"Holy Virgin, I shall go mad!" burst from the tortured soul of the foster-brother. "Oh! that he had never darkened our path. I hate his very shadow, for it blackens the whole prospect of my life. From the hour he came to our quiet, beautiful village that gave birth to Terese and me—oh! from that accursed hour he has been my fate as well as hers. Often have I been tempted to plunge my dagger into his heart, yet somehow, I dare not; Terese would have suspected me. She, I know, has read my deep love for her. Holy Mother, how deep is the poor foster-brother's love for Terese! I have educated myself for her, and like her, have won the sphere of a principal singer. Mother of God, what a voice my rival has! It makes me tremble as I listen. I was but a fool to think of matching him, and by keeping pace with her, win her back from him. He is betrothed to his cousin, that I know. That would leave Terese to me still. 'T is not the custom for noblemen to marry peasant girls, nor artistes of the stage. They make right gallant lovers, but not husbands. By the God who made me, if Sir Walter Templar wrongs my foster-sister, I will plunge my dagger into his heart, if I follow him through the world. I could forgive his marrying her, for she loves him and would be happy; and oh, Holy Mother! Beppo would not have his foster-sister sacrificed to secure his own happiness; but I would not forgive him if he trifled with her. Oh, I would deeply avenge Terese, if Sir Walter Templar played her false."

The poor foster-brother of the Hebrew maiden was "not all dross." He was, as a boy, ungovernable in his passions and was still gloomy and jealous in his character, but his deep and genuine love for his foster-sister redeemed him and created the "soul of goodness in things evil. Terese's happiness was more to him than his own, and though he would have bartered his soul to make her his bride, yet if it could not be otherwise, to see her happy he would have her Sir Walter Templar's honored wife. In view of this, the hopeless foster brother would often in his solitary ramblings murmur:

"I shall never know wife nor children of mine. I have loved Terese since I rocked her in her cradle. All my thoughts, feelings and actions have been hers. I was her slave, am her slave, must ever remain her slave. Oh, I can never wed another! I hate all the world in my love for her. Would to the Holy Virgin they had never met, and then Terese had been the wife of her foster brother. But she never can love me now as she does him. I know it. I must be her slave still, for I love her as she does Sir Walter Templar. Well, she will be a titled lady. I ought not to complain. I shall be wifeless and childless, but I will nurse her children, and give to them my love for their mother."

Such were often the musings of the foster-brother's solitary ramblings. Like all persons of a moody, hopeless or misanthropic character, solitude to him was nature's ruling institution. "Men who hold but little communion with others often talk to themselves," and he did that afternoon, as he listened outside that paradise of art, on the suburbs of Rome, to the magnificent voice of Sir Walter.

Ha! and there were others who, on that sun-bright afternoon, loitered near that Eden, in which dwelt Walter and Terese, with their friend Lord Frederick and guardian master Spontini.

Softly one approached the foster-brother. Sir Herbert was near, and the expression of his countenance was full of wickedness and beclouded with plots. Softer and more insinuating than the master was the approach of the mentor. His face was no index of present plots or designs of evil against any one. There was the stamp of wickedness on his countenance it is true, but it was an insinuating wickedness, which suggested that he would consummate his villainy without any personal ill-will to his victims. He was a very Mephistopheles in type.

"Signor Farinelli!

So softly was his name spoken that the foster-brother was but half aroused from his self-abstraction.

"Signor Farinelli,' again was insinuatingly uttered by the mentor.

"Well, Signor. Your business with me."

"My good Signor Farinelli, excuse me if I break upon your study.'

"I am but a listener, Signor."

"Like myself, Signor Farinelli, or I would not have addressed you. Had you been rehearsing—oh, in that case, Signor, I would not cheat the musical world of Rome to-night of one of your brilliant effects."

"Your business, Signor, I say. Flattery is distasteful," said the singer, somewhat rudely.

"I hope I have not offended, Farinelli."

"Nor pleased nor offended. Good day, Signor. I see you have no real business with me. I am not disposed for idle gossip."

"Courteous Farinelli, one simple question, I pray you," put in Sir Herbert.

"Well, Signor stranger, I listen."

"Will you have the politeness to name the fellow pupil of the enchanting Terese?"

"What is Terese to you, Signor? I know you gallants. She is my foster-sister, signor. I warn you she likes not your dulcet tongue, gallants. You had better not begin the chase."

"Ha! Farinelli suspicious, watchful. Your foster-sister! Ha, ha! Signor! Are you not jealous, then, of that dark young English nobleman, with his splendid voice? By the Pope! Signor Farinelli, his voice rivals your own."

"Doubtless our prima tenore was in a trance of admiration of his rival's voice, Sir Herbert. Let us retire, we break the spell," insinuated Snap.

The foster-brother became dark as a thunder-cloud with passion, and threateningly clutched his dagger. But this was what the master and his valet had aimed for. They had taken the cue at once to the singer's love for his foster-sister.

"Frown not so fiercely, Signor; I love not your rival, man."

"Beware, sir stranger! How know you he is my rival? Terese is only my foster-sister."

"I say he is your rival. Clutch not your dagger so threateningly. See you not that my servant is prepared to send a bullet through your head before you could strike? I will tell you a secret, Farinelli. I hate Sir Walter Templar as much as you can hate him. He is in the way of both of us, my good Farinelli. Do you understand me? Ha! I see you do. A fortuneless singer, even of your abilities, is no equal, single-handed, for a wealthy English nobleman—aye, and with such a voice, too. But I will help you, my good friend. By the Pope! Sir Walter Templar managed, as we will manage him together, Farinelli, and you would wed your foster-sister—the enchanting Terese."

The tempter's insidious speech evidently had its effect upon the singer, but without reply he turned and abruptly left Sir Walter and his valet.

"Snap, you observant rascal, we have caught the right cue. Eh, you admirable prince of villainy, what think you? Is not the fellow-pupil of the prima donna Sir Walter Templar?"

"Sir Walter Templar is the fellow-pupil of the prima donna, Sir Herbert."

"And the foster-brother?"

"Loves Terese, Sir Herbert."

"We shall mould him to our purpose. Eh, Snap?"

"We shall mould him to our purpose, Sir Herbert."

Evidently the master was elated with a wicked satisfaction at finding what, he had no doubt, would be a trump card in the singer, to play against Sir Walter Templar; but Snap—you could not move that genuine villain. He went into wickedness and dark plots with as much unconcern as he would take his breakfast. He answered his master with his peculiar, soft, insinuating manner and voice.

"You think, you match for Satan, that we shall be able to mould this jealous foster-brother?"

"I think we shall be able to mould this foster-brother, Sir Herbert."

"By the fiend! he is a lucky trump in our hands."

"Very lucky trump, Sir Herbert."

Snap was not a man of many words, except when needed, and then he had a tongue which could "wheedle the devil." When he agreed with his master, he was in the habit of repeating his words in the affirmative.

Once again that day the tempter found the foster-brother in a fitting mood for his dark purposes. It was after the successful performance of Terese's opera.

Half hid behind the carriage of Terese at the opera house door was the foster-brother, whose keen, jealous ear caught the few expressive words which passed between Sir Walter Templar and Terese. As the carriage drove away with Spontini and his successful pupil, Signor Farinelli retreated into the darkness, muttering:

"Ha! There is another who knows the secret of that opera. Another who knows it is her own history."

"So, so," whispered the tempter in the ear of his valet Snap, "'t is the prima donna's own history."

"And Sir Walter the hero, Sir Herbert."

"The foster-brother is in a proper mood, Snap."

"Very proper mood, Sir Herbert."

The tempter and his master were concealed in the darkness and had allowed the singer to advance a few steps during their soft whispering. They quickened their pace and in a moment were beside Farinelli. Laying his hand upon the young Italian's shoulder with tempting softness, which scarcely startled him, he whispered:

"Sir Walter Templar will take his fair prize from your native Italy to his own land unless we prevent him."

The foster-brother writhed with agony.

"He will wed her who would have been your wife, had he never met her."

"Tempter, leave me! I will not obey you."

"I think he will not wed her. I believe I erred when I said Sir Walter Templar would marry the prima donna. He will make her his mistress, good Farinelli."

The singer stopped as if struck by a thunderbolt, quivering in every nerve.

"She loves him, Farinelli," added Sir Herbert, who saw that Snap had struck deep, perhaps into an old wound. "She loves him. That opera which I heard you mutter concealed her history; shows Sir Walter Templar's influence over her. He cannot wed her, if he would, for he is betrothed to his cousin, Eleanor Courtney. That I know, for I have made myself acquainted with his family items. I say, Farinelli, he cannot wed her, even if he would; but not unlikely he loves the prima donna. Now, my dear Farinelli, unless we separate them, Terese, loving Walter Templar, and he loving her, yet wedding his cousin, what follows? She will become his mistress."

The foster-brother, with a cry of rage, sprang upon the tempter, and seized him by the throat and hissed into his ear:

"Devil! slandering, plausible villain, I would deal with him thus as I deal with you until I had his life, or I would plunge my dagger into his heart, as I am tempted to do into thine, before this should happen. Think you I do not watch and guard her, fool?"

In spite of Sir Herbert's struggles, the foster-brother held him in a grip of iron, and had not Snap been but a few steps behind, he might in his rage have done more than he designed and strangled him outright.

"Loose your hold, good Signor," and Snap brought the cold muzzle of his pistol to the singer's temples.

"Quick, loose your hold, or your brains will be scattered upon the ground."

The voice of Snap, which had not lost its soft insinuation, even in such an exciting moment, brought Farinelli to himself and he released his grip upon Sir Herbert's throat. The baronet, half strangled, was caught by his valet and the singer walked on.

"Good night, Signor Farinelli. I shall have the pleasure of your acquaintance when you are in a more amiable mood."

"Damnation! Your pistol, Snap. I will put a bullet through him."

"Not so, Sir Herbert, I like it. Not comfortable to you, of course. Imagine Sir Walter in his grip and Farinelli's dagger in his heart."

"But, curse him, I never forgave a blow."

"He did not give one, Sir Herbert."

"The furies take him, he nearly strangled me."

"He was showing you how he intended to do with Sir Walter."

"I will punish him for this."

"So would I; but use him first, Sir Herbert."

"But shall we be able to mould him to our purpose, Snap?"

"Yes. What you insinuated to him was so probable. Why, he was nearly the death of yourself at the bare suggestion. He will look at the picture you gave him until he believes it reality, and then for the sticking point, Sir Herbert."

CHAPTER XIV.

LOVE IN A LABYRINTH.

Morning is awaking. It is three o'clock of that to-morrow promised to Terese, and the soul of Sir Walter Templar is revolving in chaos.

Well has the immortal Shakspeare given as the mission of the drama to hold the mirror up to nature. In that mirror upon the operatic stage, Walter and his friend had reviewed the history of the last four years, saw it with a new light and was startled by the revelations which it made. Even the light-hearted Fred viewed that romance which had been so innocent and delightful to them, with a sad and serious spirit; and as he laid for several hours upon his bed, thoughtfully watching his troubled friend who sat by his writing table motionless, manifesting scarcely an external sign of life, young De Lacy wondered concerning the doubtful future. So strongly internal was the manifestion of Sir Walter's thoughts and feelings, that it seemed almost as if life was suspended; but there was nothing rigid and marble-like in his appearance. There he sat for hours, a soft, drooping, motionless figure, whose suspended life had retired within itself—as a mourner whose soul had entered into the holy of holies of its own nature, to weep unseen for itself and other-.

Close upon three in the morning and Fred is in peaceful unconsciousness of sweet repose, but Walter is showing signs of restlessness. Excepting the silent grasp of Fred's hand on their way home, it is the first physical expression of his thoughts and feelings since he parted with Terese at the carriage door at the opera house, with the implied promise that to-morrow the issue to himself and her should be known.

Three in the morning of that promised to-morrow, and it is evident from the acute expression of pain, care of thought and profound trouble seen strongly marked upon Sir Walter's dark intellectual countenance, that there has come not only the crisis in the life of Terese, but also that in the life of Walter Templar. He has been straining his mental gaze since the revelation of last night with such an intensity of thoughtful power that had almost suspended physical animation, but it [illegible] three in the morning and no morning star of the happiness of himself and the Hebrew maiden had appeared. Frothead often of late felt a presentiment of some unknown crisis, which might change the character and life of Sir Walter from its resemblance to glorious moon-illuminated, star-bespangled Night, to Night shorn of her glory and awful in her uncertainty.

Terese is on the altar and if she is consumed, it will be by a holy love growing out of a beautiful, gifted nature, orphan surroundings, and daily association with a master spirit. Walter is now also upon the altar; and if he is consumed, it will be by the divinest fires and noblest passions of his soul. Will stern fate demand the sacrifice of both, or will she save them both? Shall they be consumed upon the altar built up by the purest of generous youth's intentions and the dear associations of four years, which genius had hallowed and angels would have shared? It is three in the morning and Walter Templar cannot answer—cannot prognosticate his fate and hers.

Three in the morning of that to-morrow is passed and a change has come over the life of Sir Walter Templar. He no longer presents the appearance of soft, drooping, motionless, thoughtful, melancholy—a mourning soul who had entered into the holy of holies to weep. He better resembles chaos now. His profound and subtle mind had been following the intricacies and difficulties of the case of Terese and himself, and the crossings which has met him in every path of their future, has brought him out of a deep calm into a tempestuous ocean.

"O Fred, my friend—my brother, how peaceful thou sleepest, dreaming perchance of happiness with thy betrothed, while the companions of that romance so pleasing to thee are upon the rack. The brightness of thy picture makes mine blacker by contrast. O Terese, Terese!"

He stole softly from his chamber, which had become oppressive. Sleep with the elements of his soul tempestuous and his mind upon the rack? Nay, that was impossible. As well bid the ship in the mightiest storm to rest in motionless quiet, or the raging elements of that storm itself to tranquil peace, as to bid Sir Walter Templar now to sleep. Into the garden—into the garden, Walter Templar. Vent—vent for thy feelings and thoughts—vent—vent to the chaos and storm within thy soul!"

"O Walter, Walter! how is it with thee? Beloved of the soul of Terese! how is it with thee?" wailed the Hebrew maiden upon her sleepless couch.

Where is thy Walter, maiden? How is it with him? It is dark without, no moon, no star in the sky. 'Tis four in the morning of that promised to-morrow, maiden, and thy Walter is in the garden. All without is clothed with the thick drapery of darkness, for it is the black season of the year. Thy Walter is in the garden, Terese, waiting for morning of the promised to-morrow, in a fever of mind and impatience to speak with thee of the issue to himself and thee. It is four in the morning, but morning seems not to have come. Ominous to thy beloved and thee! Dark is the season of the year; dark is nature without; in the sky no moon or star! Such is thy Walter in the garden, maiden. How shalt thou be illuminated then.

"He will not spurn the offering because Terese is a peasant child, and he a wealthy noble, of proud, wealthy England, nor that I am a daughter of a despised or, cast people!

Terese had repeated this assurance to herself many times, for in it she found the consolation of certainty. Walter, with his somewhat heterodox and defiant character, which made him disposed to do what others would not do on the side of nature's claims and the ingenuousness of unartificial man, would, she well knew, choose her sooner for what she was, and what they had been together in the past than he would had she been an empress.

One of his outbursts of soliloquy as he paced the garden-walk illustrates the correctness of the maiden's view of the character of Sir Walter Templar.

"Pshaw! Tell me not of propriety! The propriety of our part is here—here in my own heart. I had power to win a young girl's heart—I had one myself to lose! There lies the wrong, the only impropriety to me; and to this I was blind—blind so long, perhaps, because blindness was bliss, and the revelation of light our darkness made visible. All other impropriety I would have spoken away with a word. I would have said, Terese, be my wife! I would have said to the world, Terese, the gifted maiden, is my wife! Had they told me she is a peasant girl,' I would have answered, 'she is a child of genius.' I would say to those who deemed that character plebeian, 'Terese is the wife of Sir Walter Templar!' aye, and I would have maintained her in that quality, at least, against all gainsayers of my class. Oh! but while I was blind to the future, which this revelation of love would have made [illegible], there was hid behind the curtain of this [illegible] companionship with Terese, the betrothal of my cousin to the expectations of my family. This has changed a bright opening day to one which I saw not, yet felt its blessedness into a dark to me which I dreamed not of."

That alone was the view that made all dark to Walter Templar: that was the threatening cloud which Terese beheld and trembled as she gazed. In its darkness and the crossings in their path, love was lost in the labyrinth.

CHAPTER XV.

ELEANOR COURTNEY BETROTHED TO TERESE THE BELOVED.

Eleanor Courtney, his cousin, was the betrothed of young Sir Walter Templar. His parents and uncle, Sir Richard Courtney, who, struck by the remarkable resemblance which existed between Walter and Eleanor in person and character, very naturally, though very unwisely, had looked upon them as proper mates when maturity should come. In the circle of the select exclusive aristocracy of England, the proper mating of families is an all-important matter, and as Walter was the only son and heir of his house, and Sir Richard Courtney without a son, who could be chosen better than Walter as the husband of Sir Richard's eldest daughter? He would represent in him at the head of his father and mother's family—the hereditary representative of the Templars and a fitting representative of the Courtneys. Indeed, it was evident from the extraordinary resemblance in character and person between him and his cousin Eleanor, that he was more a Courtney than a Templar. What wonder then that his parents and uncle should entertain the very plausible design of mating Walter and Eleanor, and as his father Sir Walter, died when he was a boy and left him to the guardianship of his uncle, Sir Richard, everything in the future seemed to favor that design as one which would fulfill itself most naturally, and without a cross. Doubtless, also, it would, had he not have met Terese and been associated with her in so delightful a romance in which love had sprung up in the hearts of both. This was the matter which so troubled Sir Walter in the revelation of the heart of Terese, which also dashed out the revelation of his own.

By the subtle mysterie power which the ruling spirit of Walter Templar possessed over her, Terese, as remarked before, had grown to think his thoughts, feel his feelings, was affected by his sympathies, and all hers ran upon him. She was, in fact, like the plastic wax upon which was stamped his image and character. But Eleanor was Walter in her own nature. The Creative Mind and Hand had fashioned her in the image and likeness of Walter Templar. She was not like Terese, yet she was a fitting type of one Hebrew daughter—the heroic Judith who struck off the head of the Assyrian captain to free her people and save the holy city. Such a deed was the sublime Eleanor worthy to perform.

What a rival for Terese. More than a rival was Eleanor. Had she been no more, Terese had won the prize for which her opera closed, and Walter could have come joyfully on the promised to-morrow to declare the happy issue, to tell her that their path was without a cross in love's bright prospect—that the future before them was day, not night.

But Eleanor was the betrothed of Walter. She was a member of his family for whom he would give his life. She was also a twin soul made in the same mould, for whom he would sacrifice his life a thousand times. And he to her! how stood the case? There was no one to be created who looked upon from so high a point of view as her own in Walter. There might be many more in the world his equal, his superior in many points, but in some respects it would have been difficult to overmatch him, and thus Eleanor looked upon him with all that pride of family which also so strongly trained Walter's character. But the pride of Terese in her beloved, was the pride of an affectionate yearning of woman's heart.

Now, the love of family which tinged so deeply and entirely the character of Sir Walter Templar and his cousin Eleanor, was not pride of aristocracy and class, but that same instinct of race and tribe which existed in patriarchal days, before aristocracy had birth, and when founders of families and fathers of nations were no more than lords of sheep and pasturage. Here again did Eleanor Courtney resemble Judith the Hebrew heroine; and perhaps in this trait both she and Walter were Jewish in type of character. What then in two such natures such dominant souls had stood between this family love, between two betrothed cousins who had often nestled in one cradle and who grew up together in early life. Poor Terese, even thy strong woman's love, returned by Walter with all the intensity of his passionate nature, cannot prevail unless Eleanor herself should give her betrothed to thee.

Eleanor would have made her cousin Walter emperor of the world, had she possessed the power, and would have sooner seen him dead in glory than dishonored in life. Terese, in her woman's love, would follow him through every phase of his life, even should dishonor mark his footsteps and crime stain his soul. She would be as the angel of Mercy weeping over him, and his grave of glory would be to her a horrid tomb.

Walter, in turn, would have made Eleanor empress of the world and he would have battled for her against a host. Terese, he would nestle in his heart. A fearful vengeance would he take upon the heads of any who had harmed Eleanor. Terese he would shelter from harm as he would a tender child. Eleanor had been his equal, his counselor, often his guide. She had helped to mould him and he had helped to fashion her. Thoughts, and purposes, and programmes, of his life were partly from the mind of Eleanor, and part of her mind and views had originated with him. They were two positive spirits of the same order. Terese was his medium. She was the one most fitted to be his wife, for he was as the strong majestic oak, and she as the loving ivy clinging around that royal tree—that type of strength and power.

But then should Eleanor, looking upon him as her future husband, love him with the passion of the sexes for their mate! What if, to the love of family, there has also grown up in her heart a woman's love? How awful would it be in her strong nature, should disappointment, broken vows of her cousin high-pinnacled in her mind, and a successful rival come in her life? What a wreck there would be of Eleanor, Terese, Walter and his family.

"Oh, Terese, Terese, I cannot give up thy love so newly revealed, so unspeakably dear to my heart. Oh, Terese, I would not bid thee love thy Walter less to save his soul from perdition. Oh, Eleanor! sister of my nature, would thou wert here to advise me and be my guide in this most dark, uncertain hour. Oh, would thou wert here, that I might throw myself at thy feet and pour out my soul into thy large sympathising heart!"

Had Eleanor been there, the crosses might, perchance, have been swept away and love taken out of the labyrinth by her hand: but, without his cousin, Walter could not, dared not decide for himself and Terese.

HANDEL IN DUBLIN.

THE MILTON OF MUSIC.

BY PROFESSOR JOHN TULLIDGE.

On Handel's arrival in Dublin, he announced his intention, to the musical patrons in that city, of bringing out his oratorio for the benefit of a public charity.

Handel and Jenny Lind were great tacticians; they both gloried in tendering their services gratuitously for public charities. But doubtless it was humanity, as well as a knowledge that such an announcement would make a favorable impression in the public mind, that prompted them both to give their assistance on all occasions for the benefit of the poor; at all events, such promptings always proved successful. In this instance, the idea benefitted Handel, for it enlisted the services of Matthew Dubergg, the celebrated violinist and favorite pupil of Geminiani, as the leader of his orchestra, who was at that time in Dublin as composer and master of the king's band of music.

He was also fortunate in obtaining the assistance of Mrs. Cibber as his principal soprano vocalist. Mrs. Cibber was the sister to Dr. Arne, the celebrated English composer, who is the author of many classical anthems, and some fine compositions in the operatic line. The Doctor was a great admirer of Handel's works, which in all probability induced his sister to assist Handel in sustaining the principal soprano solos of "The Messiah." The above idea appears to be correct as by historical accounts, she did not profess to be a competent vocalist. However, the following quotation proves that she had one of the most essential requisites for the interpretation of the poet and musician: "Though her knowledge of music was slight," says the reviewer of this Festival, "and her voice thin, yet she threw such natural pathos into—'He was despised and rejected of men,'—which was adapted by Handel, to suit her voice;—that she touched the heart, where others, with more science and a superior organ, could only reach the ear."

Principal singers would do well to follow this lady's example and render the compositions appointed to them with that expression that would not only interpret the poet and musician faithfully, but would secure the attention and touch the heart of their hearers by such truthful rendition.

Handel's success in Dublin was triumphant; and, on his return to London in 1742, the opposition had subsided. He immediately reproduced his "Messiah," and its high merits were fully acknowledged. During Handel's life, and for many subsequent years, it was annually performed in London, for the benefit of the Foundling Hospital; and, to this day, no musical festival is considered complete, unless this oratorio be a principal part of the performance.

"Handel, who may be called the Milton of music, was the discoverer of the great truth that there is a sublime in music as well as in poetry and painting. No composer has more strength and majesty, his very elegance has a sublime simplicity. Eminently imbued with the truth of revelation, and well read in the Holy Scriptures, to him it was a labor of love to compose sacred music. He could convey by harmony whatever feeling he pleased."

Instance the strong and prophetic declamation and beautiful elegance displayed in that Recitativo, "Comfort ye, my people saith your God." Listen also to the initiatory obligato passages written for the hautboy and fagotti in the same piece. The progressive beauty displayed in these imitations cannot fail to enchant all lovers of classical melodies. Again, how exulting is the choral swell of "For unto us a child is born;" how full of trusting faith is the graceful and expressive air "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" how melancholy the feeling of "He was despised;" how triumphant that glorious duet, "O Death, where is thy sting." Listen also to the grand and joyous effect brought out by the voluminous unity of ten thousand well trained voices sounding in pure harmony the praises of the Most High in the "Hallelujah, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." Who, with a soul for music, whether learned or unlearned in the beautiful art, that can fail to be entranced by the perfect rendition of such a composition? It is customary in England, when this sublime chorus is performed for the audience to rise en masse and remain standing until the conclusion of this composition.

In fact, grandeur, simplicity and solemnity are the characteristics of "The Messiah."

The scientific ingenuity in the last great chorus of this work has induced me to postpone my review of this learned composition until my fifth and last article of my first series of Handel's works.

A SONG TO DOROTHY.

Dorothy, I have loved you long—
Longer than I can say,
And I want to indite you a short little song,
Dorothy, if I may.

Dorothy, when I loved you first,
Everything seemed so queer:
I thought that my heart would be sure to burst
For love of you, Dorothy dear.

Dorothy, if I loved you not,
Easily you might guess
That earth would to me be a weariful spot
Might n't you, Dorothy? Yes.

Dorothy, if I loved you more—
Not being quite so shy—
If you looked upon me and my love as a bore,
Dorothy, I should die.

Dorothy, if I loved you less,
And did n't much care to see
Your eyes and your hands and your gloves and your dress,
Dorothy, 't would n't be me.

Dorothy, if you love me too,
Worry me, sure, you won't:
But, mind, I do n't want you to say you do,
Dorothy, if you do n't.

Dorothy, if you 're not for me,
If you must answer "No,"
When I come begging upon my knee—
Dorothy, let me go.

Dorothy, if I find you out
Mocking me, by-and-by,
Laughing me down for a loving lout,
Dorothy, mind your eye.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of.

WAIT, MY DARLING, WAIT.

There's a pale bright star in the heavens to-night,
A star that no eye can see;
To the world at large it sends no light;
It shineth alone for me.

There's an angel singing in heaven to-night,
Singing a gladsome glee;
But the hurrying world can hear her not—
She singeth alone for me.

I know who it is, for a while ago
We laid her away to rest
On the green hillside, where the wild flowers grow.
And the birds sing with joyous zest.

She is waiting for me by the golden gate
Of her bright and happy home,
And her crown, a star, casts a blessed light
On the paths where my footsteps roam.

* * * * * * *

A little while by the golden gate.
Wait, my dear one, wait;
I only tarry for night to come—
Wait, my darling, wait.

TO BE SOLD BY AUCTION.

Deddington was a great place, as it appeared to me when I lived there twenty years ago; and its people were a high, superior race, suited to their place of abode.

Two houses in the town were conspicuous above the rest. One of them was called "Myrtle House" (not that there were any myrtles near it, which, indeed, were as rare as turtles in that part of the country,) and was the residence of Miss Bellamy, a maiden lady then about fifty.

Myrtle House was the largest house in the town—a massive square stone building, with a front nearly all windows and a porch with pillars of fine polished marble.

Miss Bellamy was known to be a lady of great wealth. Her father had been, many years previously, a successful barrister, and she, his only child, had succeeded to her fortune while yet young. An early disappointment, some said—inability in the male sex in general to find courage to propose to so rich a lady, others said—had kept her single, and single there was every prospect of her remaining.

For, indeed, when she walked out on fine days with her footman behind her and her lapdog beside her, or when, on wet days, she brought out her big carriage (for she kept a carriage), he would have been a bold man who, seeing her, could have conceived the notion of making an offer of marriage to Miss Bellamy.

The other house of the two was the house of my uncle. It was not nearly so grand as Myrtle House, and it had no special name of its own, being merely known as "Lawyer Enoch's, in Broad Street;" but it was a good, substantial house, much bigger than most of the other houses in town.

Externally the most remarkable thing about it was that the front door was approached by a series of steps—quite a long flight it seemed to me—with a hand-rail beside them for safety. And as my uncle himself happened to be—or seemed to be, which was the same thing—the tallest man whom I had ever, up to that time, seen going about loose, I imagined the steps had been put there to assist the advantages which nature had given him in getting a good view of the surrounding country. He was my father's younger brother—Christian name Thomas—my father's being William. And while I am naming names I might as well, on the chance of the reader's caring to hear it, name my own. It also is, as my father's was, William Enoch. At that time I added "Jun." to it; but that, alas! is no longer necessary, my dear old senior having been gone these many years to the dear wife who had gone before him, and whom I hardly ever knew, and to the dear lads and girls (all gone too, except me) who were, I hope, better children to him than ever I have been.

Thomas Enoch, my uncle, or, as he was more commonly called, "Lawyer Enoch," was a prosperous man; and if honesty and goodness of heart, and strict integrity deserved prosperity, he had only his just wages. His practice had been a large and lucrative one (chiefly conveyancing) for many years, and about the time I left Deddington he had admitted my cousin Tom, his son, to a share of the business, which he hoped soon to hand over to him entirely.

But what is our life? Is it not even a vapor? Young Tom (so healthy and strong he always looked) died years ago. Cousin Jem died within a year of him, and Charlie with almost as short an interval.

The occasion of this visit of mine to Deddington, though not a funeral, was a sad one. You shall judge.

My uncle, in the long practice of his profession, made a good deal of money; and in the early part of his career, when he had a family about him, he was very careful to increase his savings. Of later years, when successive bereavements had left him only one daughter, Ada, to care for, he thought less and less of money. He gave very generously to the poor, not only through public institutions, but by many a secret charity, where his right hand knew not his left hand's bounty. Many a Christmas board smoked appetizingly, which, but for his open hand, would have been bare. Many a grate, in many a cottage, on many a winter's night burnt with a ruddy glare, which, but for him, would have been black and cold. And beyond this he spent liberally upon his house and daughter. His house was noted far away for the perfect taste and elegance of its equipments. From attic to cellar it was his pride to have everything as complete and as good as money could make it.

"You will have quite enough, my girl, when I have spent all I can in this way," he would say; "to make the men run after you."

As for Ada herself, his trouble was that money was not able to buy anything quite good enough for her. Her little phaeton and pair of grays was the prettiest turn-out in that Riding; but it was not nearly good enough. So of her jewelry, her dresses, her piano, her harp, her love-birds in their gilded cage, her wonderful Pomeranian, "Nelly" (which took the first prize at the dog show year by year, as a matter of course); all these were good, were, indeed, of the very best, but were not good enough, he said,—not half good enough.

For Ada was the light of his life, in whom and for whom alone he any longer cared to live.

She herself declared she had given up all hope of the men ever running after her, and already considered herself as the legitimate successor of Miss Bellamy in the honors of old Maidenhood at Deddington. "Five-and twenty already, papa, and not yet engaged," she used to say; "I'm afraid that I'm a bad lot. I shall go and ask Miss Bellamy what is the best thing for rheumatism at my time of life, and see if she can exchange my Nelly for a respectable, well-conducted cat." Or if Miss Bellamy happened to drive past at such a time, she would make a great pretence of beckoning to her from the windows, with a view to stopping her and asking these questions, but always took good care not to let that lady see her motions.

In these demonstrations against Miss Bellamy her papa, she noticed, never joined, but, indeed, always deprecated them, and seemed to have a singular respect and deference for that lady, which was unaccountable, seeing that they never, under any circumstances, visited each other, and, to Ada's knowledge, had not spoken to each other for many years.

"Old maid, indeed," he would answer her, "I never feel, sure until you come into breakfast, that you have not eloped in the night."

And of course Ada, though not engaged, had not reached the age of five-and-twenty without having the chance to be so. The simple fact was that she would not leave her father, and was cold to all advances, and, that, as he seemed to find all his happiness in her, she was content to devote herself wholly to him.

It must be now about five years since my uncle gave up to his two chief clerks the business which, if I had had the good luck to be a lawyer instead of a civil engineer, he would have given up to me. And from that time he and Ada became more and more to each other. He took to traveling with her a great deal from place to place. He turned all his investments into the simplest channels, so that his income might come to him, whether from rents, or stocks, or mortgages, with as little trouble or anxiety to himself as possible. In fact he set his house in order, that he might wait in peace for the day of his departure.

The only exception that he made in his determination to be rid of business was, that for two years or upwards he yielded to solicitations and continued to be a director of the County Bank. It is now about two years and a half since he carried out, however, his long-announced intention, and resigned his seat. He was persuaded at the same time, nevertheless, to keep his shares, lest the sale of them should damage the concern, in which he still had every confidence.

Up to that time I had myself had a few shares in the bank. But, on resigning, he wrote me that so long as he had been on the board he had considered himself in some sort the responsible guardian of my interests, but now he could no longer advise me what to do with my money. He would merely say that up to that time he knew the concern to be thoroughly sound, and to be earning year by year the good dividends it paid. Now that he was leaving, there was to be new blood infused into the board, and a new manager was to take the helm who was ambitious to extend their business and undertake transactions of a much greater magnitude than they had formerly taken in hand. I must use my own judgment, he said, and continue a shareholder or not, as I thought best.

Well, it happened just at that time a favorable chance presented itself for me to enter into partnership with my present partners, so I sold out my shares in the bank and found employment for my money in business; doing so, I confess, not without many regrets at withdrawing from so flourishing a concern, and many misgivings as to whether I should ever again have from my savings so comfortable an addition to my small income as I had had till then.

These regrets ceased, and were exchanged for a profound thankfulness when, a year ago, the new manager absconded, and it was found that he had committed the bank to liabilities which rendered it perfectly insolvent, and involved the ruin of nearly every shareholder in it.

But my delight at my own escape was sadly tempered by regret that my good old uncle was fatally involved in the great catastrophe.

For a while it was hoped—as it always is hoped on such occasions—that the concern would be wound up without calling on the shareholders to contribute more than the capital they had already paid up.

But a few months proved the groundlessness of such a hope, and such of the shareholders as were more abundantly endowed with prudence than honesty, anticipated the calls of the official liquidators by levanting, and leaving those to bear the burden of the debt whose sense of honor refused to allow them to follow such examples.

My uncle stood it out to the last, surrendered everything he possessed to the creditors, and saw himself utterly bankrupt in all but his integrity.

This visit of mine to Deddington was, in fact, to enable me to be present at the sale of all his household effects, and to buy in again at the auction, for his use and Ada's, such things as I could not see taken from them so long as it was in my poor power to prevent it. But, unhappily, it was but little that I could do, my means being much more limited than my good-will.

It was Ada who opened the door for me. She was cheerful and resigned to her altered lot, thinking indeed only of her father, as he seemed to think only of her.

She had plans of her own, chief of which was that plan of all well-educated, needy ladies—to take the situation of a governess. As for her father, she knew not, and he knew not, what was to be done; but they did not doubt that some friendly door would open to him.

Nor need I say that a friendly door was set open to him that night, and that he very frankly accepted the shelter of my town lodgings until happier days should come.

Ada meanwhile accepted the invitation of a friend a few miles away to stay a few weeks with her; and thus the two were to be parted for almost the first time in her life.

I think that the prospect of this separation pained them more that night than the loss of all their possessions. They sat all the evening clasped in each other's arms.

She took me through the rooms, and a very dreary round it was. The stair carpets were up, and so were the bed-room carpets. They were marked by dirty feet, for the elegant and superior household furniture had been on view all day. Townsfolk who had never crossed the threshold before had been through every room in the house, save one. Brokers from Shiretown had sounded all the chairs and tables and bedsteads. Everything was ticketed and numbered for the sale on the morrow. Lot 342 was the gilded cage with Ada's love-birds, and Lot 370 was "Nelly." Lot 420 was her harp, and Lot 421 her piano. These things I marked for my own. Lots 500 to 574 inclusive were my uncle's books, done up in bundles of about half a dozen irrespective of subject. I looked through these, and noted a few parcels which contained his favorite authors. I noted the numbers of some few choice pieces of furniture, and then we returned to the little room where my uncle sat looking into the fire.

We did not sit long, however, before my uncle went off in low spirits enough to his bed. But Ada and I sat later, side by side (on a favorite little couch), and there we had a conversation we are not likely soon to forget. Indeed, we sat and talked so long that it was morning before I went to my resting-place, which she told me I should find in Lot 127.

And I wish I may never have a worse lot than I found it. It was a good bed, in which I had slept many a time before, and I jotted it down as one of the things I must try to buy, along with the little couch. But a man does not find sleep in the downiest pillow, unless he takes it with him, and I did not sleep that night.

Indeed, at breakfast time, we none of us looked much refreshed. And when the townsfolk began to come in again for their final view, it cost us some little effort to rouse ourselves into decent spirits. Ada went off to a neighbor's, to be out of sound of the auctioneer's hammer. My uncle, however, put on a cheerful, brave face, stayed at home, and went, stick in hand, from room to room, and told the real value of this piece of furniture and that to friends who wished to purchase, and won good will and sympathy in his misfortune, as he had won respect and esteem in his prosperity.

Amongst others came in old Miss Bellamy. My uncle saw her coming up the stairs, and drew me back into a bedroom till she passed, and so kept out of her sight till she had gone from room to room, slowly, through all the house, and left it again.

After her came, in a little while, two respectable-looking men, strangers to the town—brokers, it was whispered, from London—and these having also gone the round of the house, note-book in hand, chose for themselves seats in front, near the auctioneer's desk, and, the hour of sale being close at hand, made it very clear that they had come with decided intentions of doing business.

Strange, how elastic is the spirit under trouble. As this sale went on, and my uncle saw first one favorite piece of furniture and then another fall under the hammer, his spirits rose and he became very cheerful and lively. He chuckled and rubbed his hands when things went for more than he had given for them, although it put no penny in his pocket. He took it as a high personal compliment that the two London brokers should have come down to Deddington. "There is not another house in the town they would have come to," he said. And when he found that nearly everything was being knocked down either to them or to other strangers whom no one knew, he began to think the fame of his good taste must have spread very widely.

In fact the townfolks got hardly anything. It soon became apparent that the strangers meant to have it all their own way; and when once or twice a townsman, having set his mind on some particular article, was allowed to get it only after it had been run up to about double its value, townspeople became very shy of bidding, and had it not been that there were two or three sets of these foreign brokers, the front-seat couple would have had all at their own price. Indeed, as it was, the prices of the early part of the sale were not maintained. For the strangers played into each other's hands after a while, and spared each other's purses.

It was some little surprise to me that none of them bid against me for the few lots I had marked, and that they all fell to me at less than half their value.

Hopkins, the butler, who had lived with my uncle forty years (having come as stable boy), made two or three bids at one lot and got it, that lot being the brass door-plate with my uncle's name on it. He did not bid at anything else, but wrapped this up carefully, with its screws, and went off with it.

It was a two days' sale; and when all was over, it was actually found that nine-tenths of the goods which had been sold had become the property of some half dozen strangers, and that these half dozen had all been acting in concert, the real purchasers being James and Patchett.

They said they would send orders from London in a day or two for the disposal of their purchases, which, in the meantime, they would be glad if they could leave. "Perhaps my uncle would be willing to still consider them at his service until they sent for them."

My uncle thanked them, but could not accept such a loan from strangers. He was going, he said, that night to the hotel, and next day with me to London.

"Take the key, Hopkins," he said, "and leave it at the Bank." And Hopkins took it and locked the door.

"Why, what extravagance is this, Hopkins?" he exclaimed again, as he saw the cab from the Sun waiting for him at the door. "Do you think all this has taken the use of my limbs, and that I can't walk a couple of hundred yards?"

"I am not going to have a lot of people staring at you as you walk," said Hopkins.

So we got in—Hopkins outside with the driver.

"Why, he's taking us round by Jackson's Lane," said my uncle, as he pulled down the window, and called to the driver to know where he was going.

"It's all right," said Hopkins; "I've a call to make, if you'll excuse me taking the liberty."

"Confound his impudence," said my uncle, "driving me about to make his calls!"

Now, Jackson's Lane is just outside the town, and has a few pretty little semi-detached houses in it, each with a neat bit of a garden in front.

We stopped in a moment at one of the prettiest of these, and Hopkins jumped down and opened the door of the cab and the gate of the garden.

"Please step in, sir, for only one minute," said Hopkins, with an air of great embarrassment.

And, at that moment, the house door opened, and out stepped Burnett, my uncle's cook, and stood at the end of the little gravel walk, courtesying and blushing violently.

"Why, Burnett, what in the name of goodness do you and Hopkins mean?" asked my uncle.

"Not Burnett any longer," Hopkins broke in. "I was tired of seeing her crying in the kitchen this morning, so as I happened to have a marriage license in my pocket, we walked as far as the church while the sale was on, and she came out Mrs. Hopkins."

"It's the most sensible thing you ever did in your life," said my uncle; "but I had some thought of asking her myself."

Mrs. Hopkins blushed redder then before, and dropped short courtesies without intermission.

"So you've brought me here to wish you joy. Well, God bless you both!"

"It was not exactly that," said Hopkins; "indeed, I could not have taken such a liberty. But I thought, sir, perhaps —I thought that, perhaps, you and Miss Ada—and Burnett thought too—"

"Why, my good Hopkins," said my uncle, "what does this mean?" for he had quite broken down, and could say no more.

"We thought, sir," broke in Mrs. Hopkins, late Burnett, "as he says that, as we have lived under the same roof with you and Miss Ada so many years, you would, perhaps, let us live under the same roof with you a little longer, we being too old to make new friends. So Hopkins, he had a chance to get this house, and he has made it as comfortable as he can, and we thought you would, perhaps, let us live with you here till you find a more fitting place;" and Burnett, as she concluded her speech (which she had not got through without many interruptions), polished the door plate with her apron, and my uncle read his own name upon it.

Then he went into the parlor, and he buried his face for a minute in his hands. When he lifted it again, Hopkins was standing with his bank deposit-book in his hand.

"O master," he said, "yours has been such an easy service, that to have no one to serve will be harder work. Let us stay with you still. Don't call it staying with us. See here; all we have is yours. We have no other use for it; take it for yourself and Miss Ada; only don't let us part." And he put the deposit-book on the table, at my uncle's hand.

The old lawyer looked at him steadily for a while before he found words to answer him.

"Hopkins," he said, "I have read of such servants as you and Burnett in books, but I never believed in them."

"And I," said Hopkins, "have read of such masters as ours, and found it very easy to believe in them."

"But I could not take it, Hopkins. I am going to London with Will."

"Why not take it, sir? it is only a little of what you have overpaid me."

"I have never paid you at all, Hopkins; such service as yours is not paid with money. But we will stay with you to-night instead of going to the hotel. There, now."

"Yes, yes," chuckled the old butler, "and longer than to-night, or my name's not Hopkins."

After this, we sat a long time without speaking, until a knock came to the door, and in an instant, Ada was in her father's arms. Hopkins had sent word to her where she would find him, and Mrs. Hopkins had met her at the door, and told her that her bed was prepared for her.

"What does it all mean, papa? Hopkins and Burnett here, and you?"

"Hopkins and Burnett count only as one, my dear, now. They got married this morning. This is their house, and they persist in calling it mine, and they don't want to part with me, but wish just to keep their old situation, they say. That's all."

Then Ada ran out to wish the old couple joy. And they laughed with her a little, and cried with her a good deal before she came back to us.

And indeed I hardly know what emotions were strongest with any of us all the rest of the evening. But I am sure that none of us was "all unhappy."

Even when my uncle took up the book and we heard him read—(low, and unconscious that his lips were forming the words)—

"O, that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light, I walked through darkness; as I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle; when the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me;"— even, I say, as we caught his low words, the tender pity in his voice seemed rather pity for another than himself.

But when Ada took the book out of his hand, and said,— "I will read to you, papa;" and when she turned to another page and read out, firmly and boldly, "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever," we felt then that she had struck the truer and the nobler key, and before she came to the end of the psalm, we did not doubt that He who had turned our water-springs into dry ground, could turn again our dry ground into water-springs; that He who had minished us and brought us low, was indeed mighty enough and gracious enough, to set the poor on high again from affliction.

Hopkins came in with candles when it was growing late, and asked, with as profound a deference as ever he had asked, if anything more was wanted. And so we went to to bed in the new house, with the old door-plate on the new door.

Ada's love-birds hung in their old cage in the window, and Nelly, coiled up in her basket, kept watch outside her chamber.

It might have been perhaps half an hour after we had finished breakfast next morning, while we sat talking over our little half-formed plans, when we heard the garden-gate creak on its hinges, and Ada, looking out, exclaimed, "Why, papa, it's Miss Bellamy coming in;" and in another instant Hopkins reported that that lady asked leave to see my uncle.

"Show Miss Bellamy in," he said: and we noticed a strange flush on his worn old face.

She had walked down unattended; and it was now so rare a thing to see her walking, that I dare say she was hardly known as she passed along the street. She carried a light silver-headed cane, and leant on it a little as she came to the chair I placed for her.

"I have been a long time coming to see you, Thomas," she said, "and I doubt you will think I have chosen my time badly at last."

"Never, Fanny," he answered, "late or soon could make no difference in your welcome."

How strange it sounded to us to hear them calling each other by their Christian names. Ada and I tried which of us could open our eyes the widest.

"I am so sorry," she said.

"Yes, for this little one," laying his hand on Ada's head; "we must all be sorry for her."

"And for you, too."

"O! as for me, what matter whether my money be taken from me now, or I from it in a year or two?"

"Thomas," she said, "you must stay with us the year or two."

"Stay where?" he asked.

"In your own old house, where else? See here, it was for me the Admiral bought your house and grounds a fortnight since. These are the papers making them mine. Take them."

He rose from his chair and held out his hand as if begging her to forbear; he shook his head but did not speak.

She went on. "It was for me that those London brokers bought all in your house at the sale. See, here is my receipt from the auctioneer. Take it."

Then he took both her hands and bowed his stiff old back and kissed them tenderly, as a young lover kisses those of his love. But he shook his head and said tremulously, "It cannot be, Fanny; it cannot be."

"But hear me out," she said, "I have not done yet. You say it cannot be because you think I want to make a useless gift. And I know as well as you do that a big house would be worse than useless to you, left as they say you are. But, Thomas, I came to say something more." Then we noticed that the old lady hesitated, and looked at us, and seemed for an instant embarrassed. Ada beckoned to me and said, "We will walk in the garden a minute, papa."

But Miss Bellamy with an effort recovered herself, and said, "No, no; why should I care to speak before you children, for you are but children. Stay with us, and hear all I have to say to your papa."

"Thomas, I have reconsidered my answer to you. I have taken a long time to reconsider it; but you will have the less doubt of my knowing my own mind now. Do you remember what it was you came and said to me fifty years ago?"

"As if it were yesterday."

"Let me see, then, if I remember it too; for it has seemed to me for years as only a dream. I will tell you what it is that I dream did really happen; and you shall stop me where my dream seems false.

"I dream of myself as a young girl of twenty, whom every one knew to be an heiress, whom some few thought to be beautiful"—(my uncle nodded gently)—"and whom Thomas Enoch mistakenly thought to have a heart, and be good, and worthy to be loved."

"Not mistakenly," my uncle whispered.

"I dream of Thomas Enoch as a young man who had his way to make in the world, and who, though only two-and-twenty, already gave signs of making it.

"I dream that he—that is you—came to me once and told me a story of first love; that I put him off with an uncertain answer, not knowing my own mind and being foolish and heartless"—(my uncle shook his head)—"that at last I sent him to my father, knowing well what answer he would get; that my father, a successful barrister, rejected peremptorily the suit of the young solicitor, and made it impossible for him to revisit at our house.

"I dream that in a little while he forgot me."

"Never!" exclaimed my uncle.

"At any rate that when my father soon died, when I was left my own mistress, and mistress of all my father's wealth, Thomas Enoch never gave me a second chance of becoming his; that though I had come to know my own mind only too well, and loved him, oh! so truly," (my uncle lifted his head with a strange expression of surprise upon his face) he never came again.

"I dream that while I waited and watched him day by day, hoping always that he would stop at my door and not go past it, a horrid suspicion rose in my mind that it was money that kept us apart.

"I dream that just as I thought the way was opening for us to come together again, he formed the acquaintance of one whom no man could help loving; that in a little while he married her, and found in her a better wife than ever he could have found in me."

"A good wife, indeed, thank God!" my uncle said, mournfully.

"And then the dream grows less like a dream and more like reality, for it has living evidence in the present and stern memorials of the past to fall back upon. Yet I will call it a dream still.

"I dream that this wife blessed him with a happy family, who grew up to be his pride and the envy of less happy men and women; that one by one they were all taken from him, wife and children too—all save one"—and she laid her hand on Ada's head; "and I saw him go often with that one to the church-yard, carrying flowers, and come home empty-handed. And I asked myself—I dream that I asked myself—'Why was I left to see myself change from young to middle-aged, from middle-aged to old, useless and with my heart all dried to dust, while the young and happy were taken away? Would it not have been wiser and better, more economical and less wasteful, in the great Dispenser of happiness, that I should have been sent to my sleep there instead of one of these? For the flowers, too, would have been saved.

"And so I seem to see the years roll on, weary year after weary year, and I live my useless life, unloved and uncared for, and I see you day by day; but there is a gulf between us as deep as the grave to which we are both going. Yet, even across the gulf it is pleasant to me to see you—it is, indeed the one pleasure I have in life; and therefore (what other reason should I seek) one morning I wake to find it is to be taken from me.

"I wake to find that as your want of money parted us once, your loss of it is to part us again; that you are a ruined man, and that all you have is to be sold, and I am to see you houseless and homeless."

"No, no," said my uncle.

"Then, being broad awake to what I should suffer, and having grown so old and selfish, I try to save myself that pang; I buy your house, and everything of yours that I can get, and I come to beg you to take them all back again, and to take me with them."

"There," she said, "it's out at last; but don't interrupt me yet; this is the longest speech I ever made in my life, and I shall never again have occasion to make another half so long.

"These children never heard an offer of marriage before, and I suppose few people ever have heard one made by a lady.

"Thomas, you made me an offer of marriage fifty years ago, and were rejected. Now I come and make you one; will you have revenge, or will you let a woman plead to you successfully?

"Pity me. I am old, and rich, and lonely—O so lonely! You are old, too, and poor, and will you not be lonely if you are parted from this girl?"

One of my uncle's hands was covering his eyes. He stretched out the other, and Ada's dropped into it and pressed it.

"We are tottering down to the grave. Let us totter down together. It may be but a few days' journey. It may be more distant. That is in God's hand.

"Let me give up to you the heavy burden of riches I have borne so long. I don't know what to do with my money. I want some one to teach me how to use it. I want some one to leave it to. I want to think I have done some good with it.

"Thomas, I have wondered often why I was rich, and why I was spared so long. I think now that I have found it out, and that it is for this I have been trusted with riches, and spared for this.

"'So much as money can buy,' I have often said, 'if it could but buy me love!' But now, as it cannot, let me try to win it other ways.

"Let me try to get some little share in Ada's love. Will you try and persuade her that you thought me loveable once? And will you, neither for what I am, nor what I have, but for the memory of that girl whom fifty years ago you wished to be the mother of your children, let your child, O Thomas, for that memory, call me mother!"

She ended, and putting her trembling hand on his, said, "Now, Thomas, answer me, before these, openly as I have spoken before them."

And he gave her his answer almost instantly—pausing only till he had so far mastered his emotion that he could command his voice.

"Fanny, I take you at your word. I will not go away, but will take you home to my house at last."

Ada put one arm round his neck, and the other round hers, and kissed them both.

"May God bless you, papa! I am sure you are doing right. And, mamma, I do love you already—I will love you truly, and be a good child to you. And I'll help you to spend your money, mamma, I will indeed, for that is all I am good for."

And, laughing and sobbing, Ada brought the two dear old faces together, and they kissed each other for the first time in their lives—she at seventy and he at seventy two.

That is the only proposal of marriage I ever heard made in my life, except my own, which I ought to have said I made two nights earlier, after my uncle had gone to bed, and while Ada and I were seated on Lot 430.

It is, as I said, three months since the sale took place. And on the Sunday following the banns of marriage were published in the parish church "between Thomas Enoch, widower, and Francis Bellamy, spinster, both of this parish." And within ten minutes of the close of the morning service, they had been pronounced a couple of silly old fools by half the congregation; a sentence which I, for one, don't at all confirm, and which indeed most of those who pronounced it retracted again before the day was out.

I believe Hopkins and his bride had some serious thought of alleging just cause and impediment why these two should not be joined together in holy matrimony. At any rate, they being in church (quite incredulous of the rumor they had heard) were observed to rise in their seats when the names were read out; but whether it were that astonishment took from them the power of speech, or be it as it might, they sat down again, and, so far as audible protest went, remained forever silent.

And in consideration of their not forbidding the union (at least I do believe they thought themselves at first retained through fear.) and in order to mollify them still further, these two good old souls were given to understand that they could by no means be allowed to occupy the house in Jackson's Lane, but that the door-plate must be brought back to Broad Street, and they themselves must follow it with all convenient speed.

There is no more to be told. The wedding took place about a month afterwards. Ada was bridesmaid and I was best man, and all was done very quietly. But I have not often seen weddings that gave greater promise of happiness.

Miss Bellamy's great old house, Myrtle House, is empty, and an army of painters and paper-hangers are getting it ready for its new tenants. It is not yet quite settled when we shall go into it, as Ada seems to have an immense number of preparations to make of which I can in no way see the necessity.

But when we get into it, if we succeed in making it as happy a house as the one in Broad Street, and in making ourselves as happy a couple as the old turtle-doves who coo there, we shall be well content. My uncle is at least ten years younger than he was three months ago, and Mrs. Enoch walks without her cane even when she has not her husband to lean upon.—London Society.

SCIENCE AND NOAH'S DELUGE.

NUMBER ONE.

After many years of dispute among scientific men as to whether Noah's flood ever occurred, a French scientist, named Adhémar, has produced one of the most successful theories to prove that such a flood did take place about the time stated, that has ever been propounded. As one object of this magazine is to give the latest thoughts of the age on every intellectual subject, we present a brief digest of this theory, leaving our readers to place their own value upon it.

Of course, M. Adhémar does not profess to prove, scientifically, that such a flood was predicted by Noah, or that it came as a consequence of man's transgression; neither does he attempt to show that only Noah and his family were saved, or that they were saved in an ark. All these things he leaves to be as they may. What he believes he has discovered a scientific corroboration of, is, that such a flood did occur and at about the date ascribed to it by the Bible.

According to this gentleman's theory, Noah's flood was a natural event—one of a vast series of similar floods, which, at regular intervals of ten thousand five hundred years apart, have visited the earth; and which must continue to occur at the same intervals as long as the revolutions of our earth around the sun remain the same as at present. Of the coming of this flood M. Adhémar assumes Noah was warned by divine revelation, and thus enabled to preserve himself and a few other members of the race from destruction.

The cause of this vast inundation Adhémar traces to a displacement of the great oceans which, he believes, at that time, were covering the northern end of our globe. As most of our readers are aware, the southern portion of the earth is now nearly an entire hemisphere of water, while the northern portion has only about as much water as land. According to our author, this disproportionate mass of water, then at the north, by a very simple but powerful natural cause was forced to leave its bed and flood the southern end of the globe.

According to Adhémar's theory, for a period of ten thousand five hundred years previous to Noah's day, our arctic, or northern regions had been covered by water; during which long period all our northern continents and islands had been submerged in about the same proportion as the south end of the globe now is. In Noah's time, from causes which we shall presently explain, it is supposed that the force of gravitation was shifted from the northern to the southern end of the globe, letting loose the great northern waters, which went rushing in ungovernable fury to the south, leaving the northern end comparatively bare, and burying up the southern continents; until nothing but Australia, New Zealand, and the tops of a few mountains, now existing as islands, were left uncovered. A similar flood, excepting that in that case the waters rushed the reverse way, M. Adhémar believes took place ten thousand five hundred years before that period. Another one, letting loose our southern oceans and sending them back to re-bury up much of Europe and Asia,—while it will in turn uncover and leave bare the southern end of the globe—he confidently predicts must occur in ten thousand five hundred years from the date of the last flood, unless the present position and movements of our earth in the solar system be altered before that time. Strange as this theory may seem, M. Adhémar is prepared to prove, to his own satisfaction at least, that it is based on indisputably established astronomical laws.

It has long been known that the cause of the earth's seasons, and of their occurrence at their present precise periods, is due to the inclination (or leaning) of the earth's axis at a certain angle to the plane, or level, upon which it travels round the sun; because this inclining of the earth results in bringing certain regions at certain periods, to a greater or less extent, under the influence of sunshine or shade. It is therefore understood that any change in this inclination must cause a corresponding change in the periods at which spring, summer, autumn and winter occur; and, consequently, that a complete change in the inclination, sufficient to cause the northern and southern ends of the globe to point at an equal angle in an opposite direction to what they now do, must not only result in entirely changing the seasons so as to give us winter at that period of the year when we have been accustomed to have summer, but in totally reversing the temperature of each of the poles—making the north pole what the south had been, and vice versa.

That a change like this in the inclination of the globe is always going on, with a consequent change of the seasons, is now an established fact. Although this change is very slight so that it can only be materially felt in the course of ages, yet it is perceptible enough to be accurately measured and determined from time to time. It is called "The Progression of the Equinoxes," or the going back of the seasons. In consequence of this astronomical law, our spring time is imperceptibly but surely changing to our winter period, while our time of winter is receding towards the autumnal period. This process must continue until our springs occur when our autumns now do, and our winters take the place of our summers.

There is another fact well known to the scientific world, and that is that the leaning of the axes of the globe, as at present, by tilting all our northern continents away from the sun, so that its action can not be felt by them for as long a period as by the continents at our southern end, results in the constant and perpetual accumulation of cold in that region; while the same inclination turning the lower or southern end of the earth up towards the sun, causes a steady and constant increase of heat from year to year in that part of the globe. The result of all this is, that while the regions of ice have been and are continually encroaching from age to age at the north pole, the continental glacier at the south is just as surely dissolving and passing away. This increase of ice at the north and its dispersion at the south must, of course, go on for ten thousand five hundred years, or until the inclination of the earth's axis changes, when, having reached its highest point or culmination, the reverse process will set in, and the ice at the north will begin to melt and the waters of the south to congeal for the same period.

Now, upon this data, Adhémar builds the bold and startling theory, that, in consequence of the vast masses of ice which thus alternately accumulate at each end of our globe during these enormous periods, the center of gravity for the earth's oceans is removed first to one end of the earth and then to the other, causing these great waters to rush alternately to each end of the globe, in turn drowning or submerging nearly one half of our earth.

One of these great periodical deluges, M. Adhémar finds by calculation, would have occurred about the period assigned to Noah's flood. In other words, he holds that at that particular date, by the melting of the great glacier which had previously held back the waters to the north, and by the accumulation of an overwhelmingly gravitating influence at the south, the oceans which for ages previous had been silently and gradually rising in the rivers of the south, at last broke all bounds and went rushing to their new home, carrying destruction before them, revealing a new earth or home, for such of mankind as escaped its fury, in the northern hemisphere, and burying up nearly the entire south as we find it to-day.

In our next, we will endeavor to present some of the geological and geographical evidence which M. Adhémar believes corroborates his remarkable theory.

ERRATUM.

Mr. Editor:—By a typographical mistake, I am made to declare a geographical error in the first four lines in paragraph sixth of my article, published in No. 5 of the Magazine. It should read: "The country lying between the plains of Shinar, or more properly speaking, the vast valleys through which the rivers Tigris and Euphrates flow, and the land of Egypt is, with few exceptions, one continued scene of barrenness and desolation."

On thy cold gray stones, oh Sea.
And I would that my tongue could utter
The thoughts that arise in me.

Oh well for the fisherman's boy,
That he shouts with his sister in play!
Oh well for the sailor lad,
That he sings in his boat on the bay!

And the stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill,
But oh for the touch of a vanished hand.
And the sound of a voice that is still.

At the foot, of thy crags, oh sea!
But the tender grace of a day that is dead,
Will never come back to me.

A WIFE'S HEART.

Come rest in this bosom, my own stricken deer,
Tho' the herd have fled from thee, thy home is still here.
Here still is the smile that no cloud can o'ercast,
And a heart and a hand all thy own to the last.

Oh! what was love made for, if 'tis not the same
Thro' joy and thro' torment, thro' glory and shame?
I know not, I ask not if guilt's in that heart,
I but know that I love thee, whatever thou art

Thou hast called me thy angel in moments of bliss,
And thy angel I'll be, 'mid the horrors of this!—
Thro' the furnace, unshrinking, thy steps to pursue,
And shield thee, or save thee, or perish there too!

MOHAMMED.

No. 1—THE STATE OF THE WORLD AT HIS ADVENT.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY, ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

"Chaos is come again."

The empire of the Cæsars was in a state of dissolution, the world in the passage of death, human society a chaos, the Christian churches an anarchy. At such a time the great Mohammed arose.

At a death, there is ever a new birth; out of anarchy and dissolution, new empires spring.

The East and the West were two pronounced halves;—Constantinople and Rome two irreconcilable facts; but both were a chaos, and Christendom itself a problem of the future.

Christian churches, such as they were, survived; the faith of the Cross extended its influence over the barbaric nations that poured into Europe from the North; but the very face and nationalities of the west were undergoing a remodeling.

Before the death of Constantine the Great, the Gothic nations began to make inroads upon the empire; but after his day, while his son Constantius was wasting his reign in disputes on doctrinal theology with the bishops of the Christian churches, a fierce tide of emigration of the rude conquerors from the North devastated the empire and laid it waste. It lashed its surges first upon the West, but the East next felt its restless fury. Gaul, Spain, and lastly Italy itself was overrun. The Franks, Saxons, Goths and Alemanni devastated the countries of the Rhine and wholly separated them from the empire, while the Sarmatians, Persians, Scythians, and others made resistless incursions on the East. In vain the successors of Constantine attempted to stem the tide of barbaric conquest. Says Dr. Robertson:—

> If a man were called to fix upon the period in the history of the world, during which the condition of the human race was most calamitous and afflicted, he would, without hesitation, name that which elapsed from the death of Theodosius the Great (A. D. 395) to the establishment of the Lombards in Italy (A. D. 571.) The contemporary authors, who beheld that scene of desolution, labor and are at a loss for expression to describe the horror of it. The scourge of God, the destroyer of nations are the dreadful epithets by which they distinguish the most noted barbarous leaders: and they compare the ruin which they had brought on the world, to the havoc occasioned by earthquakes, conflagrations, or deluges, the most formidable and fatal calamities which the imagination of man can conceive.
> But no expression can convey so perfect an idea of the destructive progress of the barbarians as that which must strike an attentive observer, when he contemplates the total change which he will discover in the state of Europe, after it began to recover some degree of tranquility, towards the close of the sixth century. The Saxons were by that time masters of the southern and more fertile provinces of Britain: the Franks of Gaul; the Huns of Pannonia; the Goths of Spain; the Goths and Lombards of Italy and the adjacent provinces. Very faint vestiges of the Roman policy, jurisprudence, arts, or literature remained. New forms of government, new laws, new manners, new dresses, new languages, and new names of men and countries were everywhere introduced. To make a great or sudden alteration with respect to any of these, unless where the ancient inhabitants of a country have been almost totally exterminated, has proved an undertaking beyond the greatest conquerors. The Great change which the settlement of the barbarous nations occasioned in the state of Europe, may therefore, be considered as a more decisive proof, than ever the testimony of contemporary historians, of the destructive violence with which these invaders carried their conquests, and of the havoc which they made from one extremity of this quarter of the globe to the other.

It was just in this universal anarchy of nations—this chaos of a world, that Mohammed came!

Europe in that age was as much the "new world" as America has been to the nineteenth century; and for centuries it was in travail with young empires. A virgin soil was needed for the remodelings of humanity and modern states of society. Worn out with antique institutions, its life of civilizations which the Pharaohs had infused well nigh exhausted, and the economy of Moses a dispensation of the past, the old earth required modern phases and fresh infusions of national life. We speak of the things of the present as modern, but what is a few hundred years in a series of thousands? Those barbaric nations, from which we have sprung, were modern and rude enough eight hundred years ago. How many thousand years must elapse before America will be as ancient as the world was when our ancestors poured their resistless tides of emigration into Europe, to rejuvenile the earth and give to nationalities new life!

During the first phases of this grand re-making up of human society, Mohammed came!

But the East required a regeneration of the old economies, not a new birth—the Abrahamic genius, not the modern or Christ genius. The former was most suited to its necessities and conditions. The East was behind the West; and, therefore, it had to be brought up to the modern state, which it has not even yet reached, though it will pass into that state when the West goes round to help its new birth via the Pacific Railroad. But that is the problem of this age it was an impossible one when Mohammed came. The East was the cradle of empires but it was also their sepulchre! Yet a solution was needed for the great bulk of the race, who have not even yet come into the new dispensation of civilizations. Christ was traveling westward! Still the East demanded the solution of its problem, and that solution was coming not then from Him. The East was crowded with dead nations, and crowded with the living nations of the past formations, who were as much sepulchred in the ancient institutions and states as were their mummied forefathers in the Egyptian catacombs. Still again, the philosophy of Providence declares the East also demanded its solution.

Mohammed came! God raised up the Prophet of Ishmael for this solution of the Eastean problem. He regenerated nations with the grand conception of the UNITY OF GOD! Herein was the philosophy of his mission—the providence of his advent. Heathen nations were to be brought up to the first phases of a universal truth,—brought up to the potent conception of Abraham's God, in whom is the world's unity.

So wonderful was this regeneration, which took place among the great bulk of the race, through the mission of Islamism and the inspiration of the Abrahamic genius, which ruled the Prophet of Ishmael, that for centuries, the East struggled with the West for the mastery of the earth. And even Napoleon, in the present age, indulged in the idea of another regeneration in the "cradle of empires." The Mohammedan problem was before him in history as an example; and, in his grand ambitions, he would have repeated the solution, and having restored the Mohammedan empire to its ancient glory have battled with the West again for the world's dominion. The great dream of Napoleon's youth all pointed to the founding of empires in the East. After the erasure of his name from the list of general officers in which he ranked after the siege of Toulon, Napoleon, seeing a field worthy of his genius, petitioned the French government to sanction the offer of his services to Turkey in the name of France and to take a few select companions, among whom would have been young Junot and Marmont. He had, at that early date of his career, the same grand programme in his mind which in the sixth century occupied Mohammed. It was that of the resuscitation of the East, and the rebuilding of empires in the land where empires first began. After he became the conqueror of Italy he still pursued his glorious phantom, and when he drew toward the close of his voyage to Egypt he dictated to his secretary, Bourrienne, his famous proclamation to his soldiers in which he said to them:

The people with whom we are about to be connected are Mahometans. The first article of their faith is this: "There is no God but God, and Mahomet is his prophet!" Do not gainsay them; live with them as you have lived with the Jews—with the Italians, paying the same deference to their muftis and their imaums as you have paid to the rabbins and bishops; show to the ceremonies prescribed by the Koran and to the mosques the same tolerance as you have shown to the convents and the synagogues—to the religions of Moses and Jesus Christ.

We see here this wonderful man of modern times laying himself out for the same work which Mohammed undertook in the sixth century. Then, as now, the East was dying and these two empire-founders attempted its regeneration. Mohammed succeeded, Napoleon failed. The latter after his great battle of the Pyramids turned his attention to the civil and military organization of the country, appointed provisional governments in the cities and provinces, played the part of a deliverer as well as that of a conqueror, and sought to prepare the East for his new empire, and, by a gradual transformation to a state more in harmony with European civilization—that is to say, to modernize it. Even at St. Helena, Napoleon held to his dream. "If Acre had fallen," the prisoner said, "I would have changed the face of the world!"

But in the sixth century, though Mohammed and his successors had precisely the same programme as that of Napoleon, touching the resuscitation of the East, the rebuilding of empires, and the "changing the face of the world," they traveled towards that object through very different methods. They succeeded in the East, but failed in the West, while Napoleon succeeded in the West, but failed in the East, and from reversed relative causes. The Prophet and his successors aimed nothing at innovations. They dreamt not of new creations in modern forms: it was all resuscitation and restoration. They conceived not the idea of an endless progress of society and humanity traveling far away from ancient economies and barbaric patriarchal civilizations into a grand civilization which has culminated from all ages. To the Prophet, the dispensation of his father Abraham constituted the perfect condition of the race. All departure from the patriarchal faith and social institutions belonging to the dispensation of his great forefather, was considered a fall from the proper state of man. Mohammed came to restore all things to the place where they were in ages past—to take the world back to his father Abraham. Hence, in the due method of this regeneration, the Koran opens with an inspired manifesto from the prophet:

"We follow," says the Koran, "the religion of Abraham, the orthodox, who was no idolater. We believe in God, and that which was sent down to Abraham and Ishmael and Isaac and Jacob and the tribes, and that which was delivered unto Moses and Jesus, and that which was delivered unto the prophets from the Lord. We make no distinction between any of them, and to God we are resigned."

Mohammed then regenerated the East with the Abrahamic genius, and the potent unity of Abraham's God, and in that regeneration is the philosophy of his mission. The God of his father Abraham sent him to sweep idolatry from the earth. "There is but one God—or God is God, and Mohammed is his prophet," is the manifesto of his divine mission, and the might of the Gospel of the sword confirmed the testimony. His mission was that of an iconoclast or an image-smasher and his message to the fierce warrior tribes of Arabia. Martial divinity only could have converted the East. In Mohammed's hands the sword was the sword of the Lord.

ORIGIN OF THE ARTS AND SCIENCES.

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

CHAPTER VI.

As we have said, the necessities of mankind led to every invention of our times. For instance: The need of a protection to the feet from jagged rocks, burning sands and sharp flints, first led to the formation of the rude disk of untanned bull's hide being strapped to the foot as a safeguard from injury. The elegant boot and shoe of to-day is the result of man's creative instinct being excited in that direction. The want of a cleaner harvest than by pulling up of the roots, led to the formation of sharp instruments of bone or flint; from thence to the sickle, the scythe, the grain cradle, and reapers and mowers of the present day.

The necessity of protection from scorching heat, or rain, or cold, led to the erection of the tent of skins or huts of turf; and from thence to the cottage, the roomy mansion, the elegant villa and the marble palace.

The contentions arising between man and man, led to the formation of instruments of offence and defence, that would lengthen and increase the power of the arm; to the sword, the sling, the spear, javelin, bow, crossbow, battle-ax; finally, to all the improvements in the warlike armor of the present day.

The necessary transportation of the fruits of the field to the homestead or garner first transferred the load from man's back to the back of the beast of burden, then to the construction of the rude cart of the ancients; and from thence to the wagon, the carriage, and to the mighty locomotive, that, with unfailing strength, transports at one load the whole population of a town or the products of a province.

The obstruction offered by rivers to the migrations of the ancients, first led to the formation of the basket of bullrushes bedaubed with bitumen as a means of transportation; as their wealth increased and household goods multiplied, the boats increased in size. Stronger material was searched out and utilized. The enlarging demands of increasing wealth and growing experience, has culminated in the mighty ships and steamers that now traverse all the water communications of the world.

The colonization of adjacent islands and contiguous seacoasts, with the increasing demands of commerce consequent thereon, necessitated a surer guide than the moon and stars by night or sun by day; here the creative instinct in man achieved one of its mightiest results in the discovery of the mariner's compass.

The want of a mode by which man might leave some token behind him in his frequent changes of place, for the information and instruction of those who followed after, or that a better record of passing events than oral tradition, handed down from father to son, introduced "picture writing," first hieroglyphical, and, finally, alphabetical. The increasing demands of a growing population necessitated a rapid multiplication of copies of sacred books—books of science and historical records that chirography could not supply—the printer's art followed as another mighty result of man's creative genius.

Who will say that God's hand is not in all these great developments? That the invention of labor-saving machinery has not been ordained? That man's power over the elements might keep pace with his intellectual growth? Who will say that rapidity of travel is not that man might "run to and fro in the earth?" That all that is cosmopolitan in his nature might be developed? That rapidity of communication and the rapid multiplication of books is it not that "knowledge might increase in the earth?" The Divine Ruler thus guiding man in every age, in the exercise of his creative powers, for a predestined purpose, to bring about predestined, grand and sublime results.

The Drama.

JULIA DEAN HAYNE.

In publishing a sketch of our lamented friend, Julia Dean Hayne, we cannot do better than to give the biographical article upon her in the American Phrenological Journal, of November 1867. It makes reference to Julia Dean's last programme, the announcement of which was authorized by the lady herself, and her photograph given by her for the engraving which accompanied the article:

In our well-known volume, "New Physiognomy," in the group illustrating the greatest of the histrionic types, we selected Sarah Siddons, Charlotte Cushman, Julia Dean, and Mrs. Mowatt Ritchie as the most famous representatives of the English and American stage. Mrs. Lander had not yet made her imposing mark, as she has done within the last few months, whereas Julia Dean, like Charlotte Cushman, was a national name. Notwithstanding that Mrs. Lander is now filling the public mind, through the imperial potency of Queen Elizabeth, Julia Dean, in London, will, ere long, assert her rank with all her might as "Queen of the American Stage," in her own play, "Elizabeth of England," It was written expressly for her, designed for London, and several of its acts were in this lady's hands long before Ristori came to this continent. The writer is Edward W. Tullidge, author of "Famous Historical Personages" and "Characters of Shakspeare," published in the Phrenological Journal.

In speaking of the Italian play, "Queen Elizabeth," and of the relative quality of the Italian and English artistes, a New York critic says:

"Undoubtedly it possesses some of the features belonging to the good Queen Bess of English history. Indeed, it may be said to be as near in approximation to the English Queen as Shakspeare's Richard the Third is to that maligned monarch. * * * He (the writer of the Italian play, Giacometti) has doubled her vanity, her coquetishness, and her tyranny, while he has by no means risen to the range of her talent, nor hinted at her occasionally splendid liberality. Such as his Elizabeth is, however, it afforded Madame Ristori the grandest field for the display of her histrionic power, while it has given Mrs. Lander an equally admirable occasion for evidencing her capacity, possibly to even more than rival the great Italian artiste. * * * Each have positive excellences, but undoubtedly Mrs. Lander's Elizabeth is nearer the 'good Queen Bess' of English history than that of Madame Ristori, if it is possible for a character so maltreated by the Italian writer to be rendered with any positive degree of approximation to its original."

Mrs. Lander has, therefore, in the judgment of her critics, surpassed Ristori, simply because she made Elizabeth more like herself in rendering the translation. "She seized it by its humanity," says her critic, "and has done all she could to make it more human."

The less we have of her great work, wrought in the body of her times,—the less of Elizabeth moving in her grand imperial methods, winning the issues for a world, the less we shall have of "Good Queen Bess," the idol and heroine of England for three hundred years. If she must slap Essex's face, let her do it; and if the death-warrant of Mary Queen of Scots has to be signed, still let us have historic veracity, and the interpretation and motive-workings. True, Shakspeare created a Richard the Third from his own conceptive mind, and not from history: but Giacometti is not Shakspeare. The immortal Saxon dramatist, with Bacon and a host of royal names of their quality, are suggesting, "You dare not maltreat Elizabeth and our age. We have left a literature to live forever,—a history that can not be blotted out, and we are as proud of our 'Good Queen Bess,' and her great reign, as when in life we wrote of her."

And this brings us pertinently to consider Julia Dean.

It is said that there is no woman upon the stage, either in England or America, so like Elizabeth in person and the essential elements of her nature and character as Julia Dean; and in this natural fitness she has the advantage both of Ristori and Mrs. Lander. She is imperial in her person, exceedingly fair, and at twenty she was beautiful beyond most women. Elizabeth in her youth played her beauty off to win the hearts of her people, and Julia Dean has done the same. Her splendor consists not in her largeness, though she is very queenly, reaching Elizabeth's stature. Her entire person shows nature's poetic chiseling. There is a delicacy and exquisite workmanship in all her form: her features are strongly marked, yet feminine. There is evidently a Sir Francis Drake in her: but the old lion has come through her mother, who was one of the most beautiful women of her times, and, therefore, though strength constitutes her type, it is exquisitely feminine.

Our likeness is of Julia Dean at the age of eighteen. We must add seventeen years of development of character, and the intensities of life, to the luscious beauty of this picture, and then we shall have the imperial-looking woman of to-day. The head is prominent and powerful: but it has not the massive, reflective brain of the masculine type, as seen in Charlotte Cushman. There is abundant force, intensity, and weight in that organization, but all is of the woman quality of feeling—sentiment, passion, instinct. All this she can interpret rarely, and to the last degree of power. The face shows a brain of exquisite mold and delicacy, an eye intense with feeling, a nose and chin of character, a mouth the type of Art. There is in the head a high development of ideality and sublimity. She has the poet's soul, and she esteems her profession a poetic art. This quality of mind alone would prompt her to redeem the stage, if she was omnipotent, and allow nothing but the chaste and classic to be brought before the public; for it is in everything that is exquisite in conception and elaborate in execution that she excels, and not in things bald and showy. Nature has wrought her finely throughout her entire organization. She writes poems on the stage, and the critic and the poet delight in tracing the detail. Her "Julia," in which she first made her appearance, is a work of art. She is unrivaled in this character, in which, in her early days, she won her great celebrity. But she is deemed equal to an Elizabeth, a play of which seems to have become one of the great ideas of the age. She should never fear to attempt nor to reach high, for she dare not fail or be second. She is conscious of this every moment. In her person she towers a head above nearly all other women on the stage. Let her make that her type for London, and she will not fail.

Julia Dean is the granddaughter of Samuel Drake, a lineal descendant of Sir Francis Drake. She is the daughter of Edwin Dean and Julia Drake, an actress of great merit and a celebrated beauty. Her grandfather Drake, an Englishman, was the pioneer manager of the drama in the West; her father is also a manager. She made her debut as a star at the Bowery Theatre, New York, at the age of fifteen, as Julia, in the Hunchback. Vessels have been named after her, both ships and steamers. She has played nothing but the legitimate drama, and she created a very great sensation from her first appearance to her departure for California in 1856.

She has been very careful, it is said, in sustaining a religious character; in New Orleans and California she persistently refused engagements rather than play on Sunday evenings. She started for the Eastern States in 1865: but on her way she was induced to take an engagement at the Salt Lake Theatre. The novelty of playing in the "City of the Saints," before Brigham and his people, was the first attraction; but she found herself playing in the theatre so highly extolled in Hepworth Dixon's "New America," whose green-room, he told London, rivals the green-rooms of Italy. She prolonged her stay, for her receipts were large and her houses crowded. She reigned a beautiful Gentile priestess in an Israelitish temple of Art. The daughters of Brigham played with her, and the Mormon king took delight in honoring her.

But our esteemed and talented friend lived not to carry out the programme which she had authorized to be announced. Three months after the publication of the article she was in her grave. Whether or not her play of Elizabeth of England, which she designed to run in rivalry to that of Ristori upon the London stage, would have been a success, we must leave to conjecture. In her last interview with the author, she held to her design and authorized the publication of her programme. The play was under revision and the first and second acts of the revise accepted; and at the last interview, the lady was confident in the design of running her rival play of Elizabeth of England, in London for the sovereignty of the modern stage. We believe that Julia Dean would not have failed. In London, she would have asserted herself as "Queen of the American Stage," which was properly her rank; and in this national character, she would have been on an equality with Ristori. The contest would then have stood between the two Elizabeths of England,—the one from an English Mormon's pen, the other from an Italian Catholic's The reason that Julia Dean did not make a strong, national mark on her return to the Eastern States, after an absence of twelve years, is very explainable. When she arrived in New York, she not only found the public mind filled with Ristori's great career the year before, and her prospective second visit close at hand, but Mrs. Lander was just bursting into a fresh notoriety in her English rendition of Ristori's Elizabeth. She held the managers, she held the press and she held the public before Julia Dean made her appearance, and all this was upon the play of Elizabeth. It is very singular that several years before Ristori's visit to America, that the Mormon author predicted to Julia Dean Hayne that a play of England's heroine would rule the modern stage, and he proposed to write Elizabeth for the American artiste to make her debut in London. As a preparatory play, "Eleanor De Vere" was written and successfully produced by the lady in Salt Lake City. Two years later, when our lamented friend arrived in New York, Queen Elizabeth met her and took from her the empire of the American stage, but in London all this would have been reversed. She would have gone there with her national name and would have run her Protestant play against the one filled with the malice of Catholic inspiration. The sympathy of the English public would have been on the side of their nation's glorious heroine. We think, therefore, that Julia Dean's last programme was very sound. We have too much faith in her to believe that she would have failed. The aim in London would have given her a fresh ambition; the success a new life as Queen of the Saxon stage.

Music.

THE LAST GRAND CHORUS OF THE MESSIAH.

COUNTERPOINT, FUGUE AND CANON.

As there are many excellent practical musicians who do not comprehend the workings of high class music, I will endeavor to explain—in as simple manner as possible—what seems dark to their understandings. I do not wonder at this, knowing they have to study the works of classical authors who have explained the science in such a manner that none but a practical composer can fathom the depths of the teacher's meaning. Still these works are printed for the instruction of musical students; but my own experience has proved that authors have shot very wide from the mark.

I have heard many musicians ask, what is counterpoint? I will answer. It is a knowledge of harmonizing according to the rules laid down in the strict style of composition. There are two styles used in music; one is called the strict—which style is used by learned composers; and one is termed the free. The free style affords the modern composer a larger field for his genius, and produces the variety of compositions now in use. However the strict style is adhered to in the present day by classical authors.

COUNTERPOINT.—The creation of a musical subject is to point, and the adding of parts to that subject is to counterpoint from it; these parts must be constructed according to strict rules. The fundamental rules for harmonizing are found in what is termed simple counterpoint. In this style of composition there are five species, and in none of them are discords admitted, except passing notes of dissonance and suspensions, or notes of retardation, all of which must be prepared and resolved. In the first species the notes are all of uniform length, note against note, and the only harmonies employed are the major and minor triads.

In the second species, two notes of the counterpoint move against one of the subject. The first—on the accent—must be one of consonance, and the next dissonant, or a note belonging to the triad. In the third species there are four notes in the counterpoint to one in the subject; the first and third are notes of simple harmony, and the second and fourth are notes of passing. In the fourth species notes of suspension are employed, and which discords produce more beauty, systematic order and variety than combinations used in the free style. In the fifth species notes of various durations are used; in fact it is a mixing of the other four.

As musical science cannot be explained in a lucid manner without examples the student is recommended to study good works on the subject.

I will now, before reviewing the last great chorus in "The Messiah," explain, the difference of fugal and canonical writings, as the composition I am going to review is a canon, which is often mistaken by musicians for a fugue.

In fugal compositions the subjects chosen for imitation consist, in general, of incomplete periods. In fact, sometimes only a few notes are selected for imitation. Now, canonical subjects must not only be complete—or nearly so—but they must be so constructed as to answer immediately in all the parts; i.e., no counterpoint is made for imitation; the subject by its ingenuity is substituted for contrapuntic combinations.

The parts in the canon fly the same as in the fugue, but in fugue the subjects are not strictly imitated, while every note in the canon is answered in the imitation with a subject likeness in all the parts, whether in the unison, octave, fifth or any other interval from the position of the leading part. Notwithstanding that the subject flies through all the parts, it is not a fugue, but a canon. The canon is known by the strictness with which the model melody is adhered to; hence the name of canon, i.e. rule, guide, norma model—a composition on a given model. Of course the model must be so formed as to admit of the harmony being grammatically correct.

The old masters of the art of counterpoint were continually exercising their genius in writing canons, and some of the most extraordinary ones were produced by them. But this kind of writing is, for a long time, out of fashion on account of the art having been pretty nearly exhausted by the ancients, as well as the ingenuity and labor required to produce a good canon.

I have written this much on canonical compositions, as the last great chorus in "The Messiah" is a most adroit canon. In fact it is considered by those learned in Contrapuntic beauties, to be unrivaled in its development and elaborative skill.

I will now endeavor to lay before the scientific reader—for this article is written for scientific students—a portion of Handel's skill in writing canon.

In the opening of the "Amen" chorus, the subject starts in the fugal form and the canon does not take its legitimate imitations until the end of a capital movement in the single fugue style. That is, the subject does not answer immediately as in canon, but waits for the imitation until the end of the subject. At the close of a six bar subject, the tenor answers in imitation in the fifth above, and the bass counterpoints with the imitation.

At the 11th bar the subject is led by the alto an eighth above the tonic, while the tenor and bass accompany the subject with contrapuntic parts. At the 16th bar the soprano starts the imitation a fifth above the alto, while the other parts are employed in the strict style and concludes the first movement of the fugal form on the dominant. In order to vary the effect, an instrumental interlude is introduced before commencing the second short movement. At bar 31, the vocal bass leads with subject on the tonic, and although there is no strict imitation in any of the parts in the following period of five bars—which terminates on the tonic—the partial imitations are handled with great skill and adroitness. At the 36th and 37th bar, an interlude of instruments is again introduced, and at the beginning of bar 38th, the bass transposes the subject to the dominant, while the tenor is in partial imitation, and soprano and alto have parts in counterpoint. This ends the fugal construction.

At the 42d bar, the soprano starts the subject in canon, which is imitated after one beat by the tenor an eighth below. On the first accent in the following measure, the alto takes the imitation in the 4th below, and in one beat after the alto, the bass imitates in the 11th below. In the remaining portions of the canon, the imitations are flying through all the parts in rapid succession in a direct and inverted form until near the end, when the bass takes a pedal on the dominant. Short but ingenious imitations on the subject are added for the accompaniment of the pedal bass, a method employed by classical authors in playing with the subject before closing. Five measures before the end, the harmony of the tritone is used on the dominant movement, which concludes the canon. A silent bar is then introduced, and the tritone takes its legal resolution on the inversion of the harmonic triad. In the last bar but one, the chord of the five-four is used; the fourth resolving on the third of the dominant, which is according to rules laid down in the strict style. The tonic triad follows and ends the composition.

In concluding this article I will observe, by the way of explanation, that although the fugal form is very learned and is the most useful in strict compositions—having in the different movements or divisions, subjects, answers, strettos, episodal varieties, short canonical imitations and the pedal—yet it does not require that amount of genius and labor as the learnedly constructed canon.

A canon subject will imitate strictly in all the parts at the same time; but the fugue subject must conclude—or nearly so—before the commencement of the imitation or answer.

In quadruple fugue—which composition obtains for the composer the diploma of musical doctor—having four subjects, and which subjects are constructed separately according to the rules of high class composition—will go together, but each of these subjects must wait for the answer or imitation until the conclusion of the subject.

It will be seen by the above explanation that a complete canonical subject imitating in every part at the same time must require more ingenuity to construct than a fugal subject, that has to terminate before the imitation can commence. Sometimes canonical subjects are constructed for a fugue, as the one Handel has invented for the last grand chorus in "The Messiah." When such subjects are chosen, they will imitate and form good strettos, without inventing others for the necessities of a good fugue.

The above splendid canon not only exhibits the wonderful resources of science, but exhibits the grandeur of Handel's genius; and it may be truly said that no composer has ever yet approached this great Master in the sublime style of composition. In fact, the whole of "The Messiah" has kept its ground, amid no mean rivalry, for more than a century.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE PROMISED TO-MORROW.

The promised to-morrow had come. Terese in the music room waited to hear the voice of her fate.

From the dawn of their companionship, the music room had been the sanctum sanctorum of our hero and heroine. Here they had spent their most delicious moments in feasts of art; there they had reveled together in ecstatic bliss.

Unconsciously they had played the lovers; and, for four years, they had roamed hand in hand in their paradise, much as our first parents did in their primeval innocence, before they had partaken of the tree of knowledge and became as gods in their fall, knowing good and evil. Our hero and heroine clothed their passion in the embodiment of art. Daily they told to each other's delighted ears, through the mediumship of music, the rapturous tale of a harmony of souls. Together they had dwelt in Eden; but, until now, they had not eaten of the tree of knowledge. Through blissful hours, from day to day, they had repeated their story of mutual love, but they had told it in music. In their character of artists, they had played the lovers. Like our first parents, it was bliss for them to love without knowledge, for that brought the fall. The knowledge of good and evil! The tree of the knowledge of good and evil! It was in the mutual love of the sex, and in the awakened passions of the human heart that brought sin into the world. Out upon the apple! We have had enough of that childish folly. Let us know the truth. 'Twas in the love of man for the woman—of woman for the man—that our first parents fell. The passions of the earthly overleaping the innocence of heavenly babyhood, the idolatry of the heart for its mate versus the adoration of the creature for the Creator. They partook of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil: they fell together!

The Hebrew maiden was at the piano, awaiting the presence of Walter Templar. The vent in music eased her burdened heart, and that which her instrument now discoursed was tender, sadly blissful,—it told of hope and fear. There was no doubt in the maiden's heart touching Walter: it was a fear of crosses in their lives.

Terese, thy fate is approaching! But what need to tell the maiden this. Before the echo of Walter's footsteps proclaimed his approach, she felt his presence near. Still she played her tender plaintive strain.

Walter and Terese are together. Softly he closed the door, and gently approached his beloved. The yearning tenderness of their hearts filled the silence with a sentient soul. They felt the harmony of a mutual passion before it found a vocal speech.

Walter stands beside the maiden. Her instrument is hushed: and she listens for the voice of her fate. Not yet has she turned to look into those profound eyes beaming upon her, glorious with their light of love, but shaded with soft sadness. A moment thus they remained, enjoying their supreme but chastened bliss.

"Terese, my beloved," Walter breathed at length. It was like the soft cooing of the dove.

"Walter, Oh my Walter!" answered Terese, as she turned upon him her uplifted face, eloquent with fondness; and her eyes, through crystal tears, looked into his.

"Terese, my beloved!" again was breathed like the cooing of the dove; and, again, the yearning of the soft voice of passion wooed the maiden's ear. Walter opened his strong arms and Terese sprang to his embrace, with a cry of exquisite joy, and nestled to his breast, upon which she wept.

She knew that she was beloved; but she also felt the darkness around their love. Walter was the betrothed of his cousin Eleanor. This fact, since she discovered the secret of her own heart, was as significant to her as it had been to our hero since the performance of Terese's opera of the "Peasant Girl." She knew that Walter Templar would not dishonor his betrothal and outrage his family. Eleanor alone could give their love a happy issue. The future was not without hope, but hope came hand-in-hand with fear. She saw two futures: one dark, the other gloriously bright. Yet the present to her was that of supreme bliss, nor was it less supreme because of the mixture of pain with joy. There is an agony of love. It is more intense than that of a cloudless hope and a satisfied possession. "He is mine!" It was the burden of her heart. The feeling was painful by the very might of the assumption, for all her nature cried aloud—"He is mine!"

Sir Walter Templar wiped the tears from her eyes, and gently placing her upon the sofa, seated himself by her side.

"Dear Terese," he said, "what a revelation has burst upon us! How bright and glorious—how full of happiness—is love on that side, dearest?"

"My own Walter!" murmured Terese.

"But how the clouds on the other side overhang our sky! How dark they make the horizon of our future!"

"Alas! alas! how dark to me," said the Jewess.

"To me also, Terese I stand beside you in that prospect. Darkness or sunshine, the same sky of fate will be above us both."

"There is joy to me in that; yet 'tis very selfish. But there is such bliss in knowing that you do love me, Walter, that I cannot but rejoice in it, though it should make the future dark for both."

"You do not doubt me, then, Terese? You will not doubt me, should the uncertain future leave us without a star in our sky? There is a sun in my nature which would make your life as bright as an angel's wing. You will not doubt me, should it be beyond my power to make it thus sunny? You will not doubt me, Terese?"

"No, Walter, no; I shall never doubt you."

"Should our future be dark, you will not reproach me?"

"Never, dearest, will Terese reproach you."

"Nor think me cruel, if you are sacrificed?"

"Talk not so, Walter."

"I should be consumed on the same altar," added her lover.

"God of my fathers forbid!" exclaimed the maiden, as she threw her arms loving about his neck, as though, come what may, she would save him from the sacrifice. Such is woman!"

"You would not counsel me to dishonor? You would not have me under the curse of a broken covenant?"

"No, Walter; a thousand times, no!"

"I must be true to Eleanor, my betrothed?"

"Yes, Oh! yes, even though it should bring to me despair."

"I am but showing you the worse side of the picture, Terese. I think Eleanor will be our sister, not your rival," said our hero, soothingly.

"Now I am assured that you love me, Walter, I am juster to your betrothed. My own heart tells me that she may have as much at stake as I."

"I hope not," said her lover; and if not, Eleanor will smooth our path. I know the noble and proud nature of my cousin. She would sacrifice herself. Aye, there is the cross again! I would have no one sacrificed."

"May the God of Abraham accept the offering unconsumed!" responded the Hebrew maiden.

CHAPTER XVII.

CHANGE OF PROGRAMME.

Three weeks after his encounter with the singer Farinelli near the opera house, Sir Herbert Blakely at breakfast sipped his mocha in moody silence. Not usually was this the case, for though not so intellectually an epicure as his secretary, he enjoyed everything which contributed to the gratification of his animal appetites. He had not the "lean and hungry look" of Cassius, which characterized Snap, but the full propensities of the sensualist in his physique; and though the acts of his life were wicked enough, and his chapter in the Recording Angel's book scarcely relieved with a passage of good intentions, yet thought furrowed not his countenance, nor conscience disturbed his "sleep o' nights." Now, however, his mood was dark and troubled; the strong workings of a laboring mind lined his face, and held back his wonted emphasis of conduct in statuary silence.

The last mail from England had brought news, from Lawyer Wortley, that Sir Richard Courtney had written to his nephew and young De Lacy, calling them home to fulfill their betrothal. Courtney had grown impatient, and somewhat anxious to have his family project and the covenant between himself and dead friend consummated: he and his sister, Lady Templar, had resolved to bring matters to their designed shaping, and to unite Walter and his cousin, Eleanor, and young De Lacy and Alice Courtney. To this end great preparations were in progress at Courtney House; the private consultations of the family pointed to the clearing of the mortgage from the De Lacey estates, as the next step decided upon after the realization of their long cherished design.

These, to Blakely, vastly important items, Lawyer Wortley had gathered from an acute female agent, whom he had recently placed in the service of the Courtney family. Wortley also sent his client information that Sir Walter Templar and his friend were in Rome; for the lawyer knew not, as yet, that Sir Herbert had himself found the cue. Wortley's letter ended with the emphatic advice to his client—"That which you resolve, do quickly!" No wonder, then, that Sir Herbert was dark in his mood and troubled in his thoughts; no wonder that the breakfast of this morning passed in pregnant silence.

Opposite Sir Herbert was his mentor, luxuriating in the delicacies before him, for he was in everything an epicure. Having, by the habit of years, become en rapport with the spirit of his master, he divined the dark thoughts now elaborating themselves in Sir Herbert's mind, and saw the cups of luscious beverage which he drained transformed into goblets of blood—heard in the ominous silence the chant of murder as from incorporeal voices. Yet he partook of his breakfast with more than usual zest. The fine prepared discord of evil thoughts and wicked deeds, which he heard in the expressive silence, was like incantation music. It was to him mesmeric of mental tranquility, and the disposition of his feelings was like the fragrance of poisoned flowers.

The reason of the difference seen in Sir Herbert and his mentor this morning at breakfast, was that the one had solved his problem, while the other was in the labyrinth of its perplexities. To use his favorite expression, Snap had demonstrated; and his programme was already arranged. For three weeks he had been submitting the affairs of his master to the severe test of his mental chemistry, and had metaphysically anatomized Sir Walter Templar, the foster-brother and all those concerned. Not even was there left out the hangman with visions of an execution; for Snap was so largely endowed with intuitions of cause and effect, that nothing in the chain of relations could be left out by him. Thus even the hangman and the execution forced themselves into his view, by the law of association. It was this quick intense perception of correspondent things that made him so long in demonstrating the necessity of the assassination of Sir Walter Templar, for therein he also saw consequences which were inevitable.

In the interval of three weeks, since the discovery of the identity of Sir Walter and young Lord Frederick De Lacy, Snap had left his master mostly alone, while he buried himself in self-abstraction. This was his habit in his times of problem-solving, for in spite of the Mephistophelean character of his intellect, there were times when he was in purity of quality the profound thinker, the scientific experimenter and the classical student. At such times he was never the mentor, but surly and uncommunicative, if any one chanced to break in upon his mood. At such times he answered well to the descriptive soubriquet of Snap. In the last three weeks, all that had passed between him and his master was a snarling admonition against Orsini and his evil counselings and fool's instruments; for it was his habit to speak of an unsafe counsellor as an evil counsellor. "Wait," he several times said to his master, "until I have demonstrated—and if Sir Walter Templar must die, I will doom him and find the instruments;" and then he would go away muttering that it was the fool's plan to murder.

But the letter from Lawyer Wortley, which had plunged his master into greater perplexity, had determined Snap; for when the necessity of a thing struck him, he bowed to it as fate, however much he might dislike it as a policy; and from the moment he read Wortley's letter yesterday, the death of Sir Walter Templar became a necesssity to his master's ends. He knew that if our hero returned to his native land, the De Lacy estates would soon pass from the hands of the Blakelys; but if Sir Walter Templar never returned, or died intestate, his cousin Edmund Templar, would not only succeed to his title and estates, but also to the vast accumulations of Walter's minority; thus Courtney would be left altogether disabled to clear off the debt.

Accordingly the mentor fully endorsed Wortley's advice, and decreed that Sir Walter Templar should never return to his native land. But there is a providence that shapes the ends of all human events and overrules the affairs of mortals in spite of the too general practical atheism of society.

But Sir Herbert knew not that Snap had resolved; and in his own self-absorbed perplexity, caused by Wortley's letter, he had not noticed that he had passed into the mood which always followed his problem-solving.

"We must change our tactics!" suddenly exclaimed Blakely, as he threw himself back into the inviting arms of his richly-finished chair, with a sigh of relief expressive of a settled purpose, in exchange for a burden of thought. But his exclamation was rather a venting than a direct observation to his mentor: for he was used to the other's periodical non-talkative fits.

The mentor finished his breakfast with a glass of ruby wine, and then followed his master's example by ensconcing himself in the elastic softness of his easy chair.

"Snap, I say, we must change our tactics! Do you hear me, sir? We must change our tactics!" observed Blakely, now directly addressing his secretary. "I have resolved!" he added with yet stronger emphasis.

But the subtle-thought-dreamer was awake, and had solved his problem.

"We must change our tactics!" the other echoed in his light, melodious voice, and then, by way of endorsement, he also added with emphasis, "I have resolved!"

"Aha!" ejaculated Sir Herbert, now observant of the transformation of Snap's mood, which was at once as a valve to the too long confined outburstiveness of his temper.

"Satan catch thee! Thou hast more of sunshine in thy face that black Vesuvius is near thee, and may belch out its lava. When thy father Lucifer lights thee up, thou art bewitching. But I say, Snap, we must have no more of this tardy business. My sire would have ended this affair years ago, had he lived, while we are no nearer to the end than when he died."

"You are wrong, my master. We are fifteen years nearer the the end."

"You provoking philosophical devil, I know we are; but what end?"

"Sir Walter Templar's end, my master. He is fifteen—yes, just fifteen years nearer the end, than when the General died."

"Come, come, Snap; no sophistry to cozen me to your way of thinking. I have resolved, I say; aye, with or without you, I have resolved."

The shadow of a frown flitted across the mentor's face at his master's words, which, at another time, he would very likely have resented in his own peculiar way; for when Sir Herbert at any time grew restive under his mentorship, he would dive into scientific or classical studies, and though he would continue near him, he left Sir Herbert to himself. In this peculiar way, he had left the baronet's service for months at a time, but Blakeley had received some severe lessons of trouble and humiliation, from his imperious temper, in the absence of his watchful guard and wily servant, and he was always glad when his mentor returned. But this time, Snap merely felt a moment's resentment; for he had himself been, like the baronet, forced by a desperate necessity.

After a moment, Snap said with such a strong, quiet, deliberateness that sounded frightful—

"Sir Walter Templar must die! I have doomed him!"

"Ah! say you so, my prudent counselor?" broke out Sir Herbert.

"Then, by Solomon, we have found wisdom at last. We have been fools till now, believe me."

"Nay, my master."

"But I say, yes. I tell you, Snap, we've been fools and babies in this matter."

"And the General—was he a fool and a baby, too?"

"By the Fiend, he would have trampled down this presumptuous boy, who dared to brave us,—aye, challenge me as the avenger. He would, long ere now, have swept him away as a spider crawling over him; but we have let him grow to be a monster. You, Snap, have matched his wisdom; but we have lacked his iron will, and indomitable ambition, that crushed everything before him to his ends."

"Your father would have done as we have done,—no more! But he would now do as we have resolved to do—sweep this monster spider, as you call him, and his web away."

"Ah! Think you so?"

"I am certain of both, or I would not have followed the direction of either, for I have been faithful to my oath to him, to advise you as he would advise, and to act as he would act in your behalf: in this De Lacy case, I have interpreted your father, rather than myself.

"You are right loyal in that, Snap; or you would not now have doomed Sir Walter Templar. You like not to kill; that is, not as we design. The hyena in you would rather fight this lion than murder him; but we dare not fight him any longer."

"You are right. Were the case my own, I would doom Sir Walter Templar to live till I reach my span's end;—die when I die,—and to come up foot to foot with me, if there be a hereafter to bring us up. I love Sir Walter Templar, as I love my problems, and would solve him; for we master what we solve. Sir Walter Templar is an antagonist worthy of me. I would not kill him; but it is for my dead benefactor that I act."

"My worthy sire, your benefactor?—a benevolent philanthropist? You canonize my father as your patron saint. By Jove, I may expect to be saved then, and even cut Templar's throat with my own hand. Your benefactor! Ha! ha! St. Herbert and his

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

N. P. WILLIS.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of.

TWO LITTLE FEET.

Two little feet, so small that both may nestle
In one caressing hand;
Two tender feet upon the untried border
Of Life's mysterious land;

Dimpled and soft and pink as peach
In April's fragrant days;
How can they walk among the briery tangles
Edging the world's rough ways?

These white-rose feet along the doubtful future
Must bear a woman's load;
Alas! since woman has the heaviest burden
And walks the hardest road.

Love, for awhile, will make the path before them
All dainty, smooth and fair—
Will cull away the brambles, letting only
The roses blossom there.

But when the mother's watchful eyes are shrouded
Away from sight of men,
And these dear feet are left without the guiding,
Who shall direct them then?

How will they be allured, betrayed, deluded,
Poor little untaught feet!
Into what dreamy mazes will they wander,
What dangers will they meet?

Will they go stumbling blindly in the darkness
Of Sorrow's tearful shades?
Or find the upland slopes of Peace and Beauty
Whose sunlight never fades?

Will they go toiling up Ambition's summit
The common world above?
Or in some nameless vale securely sheltered,
Walk side by side with Love?

Some feet there be which walk life's track unwounded,
Which find but pleasant ways;
Some hearts there be to which this life is only
A round of happy days.

But they are few. Far more there are who wander
Without a hope or friend—
Who find their journey full of pains and losses,
And long to reach the end.

How shall it be with her, the tender stranger,
Fair-faced and gentle-eyed;
Before whose unstained feet the world's rude highway
Stretches so strange and wide?

Ah! who may read the future. For our darling
We crave all blessings sweet—
And pray that He who feeds the crying ravens
Will guide the baby's feet.

—Lady's Friend. Florence Percy.

LADY HESTER'S EXPIATION.

CHAPTER I.

The secret dread under which Lady Hester had labored since certain incidents had been disclosed to her, did not leave her, even during the ten years of her unmolested residence in Syria.

She was a woman of five-and-thirty, now; a woman of regal bearing, immense wealth, and endued with that robust health and beauty which retain to their possessor the appearance of youth long after youth has departed.

One summer morning, as she was sitting alone in the low latticed room, where she could hear the tinkle of the fountain splashing in the adjoining court, a sealed letter, bound with a silk and silver thread of peculiar workmanship, was thrown in at the open window.

For an hour past she had been lying in a dreamy doze, thinking of the triumphs, the intrigues, the loves, despairs, and jealousies that had ever been her pride and shame during the glittering seasons of her life in Paris and London, those far-off capitals of the West.

The sound of the letter falling at her feet aroused her in one instant. And when her eye caught sight of the silk and silver band, her cheeks grew pale. She passed her fingers along the slender tissue, and murmured:

"They have sought me even here. After ten long years! My God! does this bring me news of Alexis?"

The note was a long one. It was written in modern Grecian dialect. It read as follows:

"Know, lady, that your place is found, and you soon will be in our hands. Last evening, at a place called Sirpoute, near your residence, we took captive your servant Alexis. We demand for his ransom one hundred thousand drachmas. Make you no stir about the matter, but keep it secret. Elsewise, we send you the head of your beautiful Alexis, fresh and bleeding. Tell you not the affair to the authorities, nor send your servants after us, for, in that case, you will never see your beautiful Alexis alive. But, if you would save Alexis, lady, and save us the trouble and danger of coming in a band to seek you, this is what you shall do—"

At this point, Lady Hester became pale as death once more. But she read the letter through to the end. The last words she read over and over again. Her face did not lose its deadly pallor. Presently she clapped her hands thrice, and one of her dark-featured servants appeared.

"Send Naoum here," she said; and in another moment a little fair-faced Circassian boy, about twelve years old, was making an obeisance before her.

His dark, limpid, gazelle-like eyes and abundant black tresses, dark brown and heavy lashes, were in such contrast to his snowy face and throat as is never seen in any western clime.

Lady Hester took from a little black cabinet close at hand a concave oval crystal, about the size of the palm of one's hand.

"Naoum," she said, motioning the boy to stand close before her, and placing the crystal in his hands, "I want you to travel some distance from here and tell me what you see."

So saying, she seized his wrists and held them tightly, with her thumb tips pressed closely against his, and her dark eyes bent imperiously upon him. In a few moments, his attitude grew rigid, his eyes closed, his breast heaved, his throat swelled as though there were a fluttering at the heart, and a faint sigh broke from his parted lips.

She let go his hands, but left the crystal in them.

"Look into the crystal," she said, "and tell me what you see."

He held up the crystal in the palm of one hand, and looked at it long and curiously, as though something were growing slowly into his vision there. A shudder, more violent than before, passed over him.

"What do you see?" she repeated.

"I see a company of savage-looking men, preparing a meal around a fire. The place is near the sea, and the wind is cold."

"Do you see anything peculiar in their dress?"

"Every man wears a scarf of a texture I never saw before. All the threads are silk and silver."

"Do you see a face there you recognize at all?"

In an instant, the boy's face matched Lady Hester's in pallor. It had been white before, but now the blue hue of speechless fear began to tint it.

"I see—Alexis!" he gasped out, almost with a shriek. He is scourged and bleeding; he totters under heavy fagots he is carrying. Ah! he falls! He faints! Blindness comes before my eyes. I can see no more!"

And, with a deep sigh, Naoum let the crystal fall upon the floor, and opened wide his black eyes, in complete ignorance of what had occurred.

Lady Hester sat him down, and rising, walked the room with an agitated step.

"It is the Pallekaria; it is the Pallekaria!" she exclaimed, her hands upon her heart, and her eyes dilated with fear.

Again she clapped her hands; and again the dark-hued servant appeared, to whom she whispered a few directions in a hurried voice. The man appeared surprised, but immediately withdrew. Then she sat before the little black cabinet and wrote and sealed a note, sitting, after doing so a long while, with her chin resting on the palms of her hand, and a great sacrificial look, like that of a martyr, growing, into her face. The noise of wheels at the door aroused her, and she beckoned toward her the little Circassian, who had sat silently watching her.

He made the same low obeisance as before, and stood fronting her.

She passed her hands caressingly through his hair, and rested them upon his shoulders, her fingers touching his white throat.

"You don't remember the time, Naoum, when your mother, who was my servant, died, and left you and your brother to grow up and be my servants too? No; that was ten years ago, and you were a little baby then. Have I been good to you since?"

The little Circassian's eyes filled. He put up his hands, as if to speak; but she went on:

"You are a good, intelligent boy. You have sense. Keep this letter about you until this or to-morrow evening," and she handed him the sealed letter she had just been writing. "Let no one see it; and hand it to Alexis this evening or to-morrow, when he returns, together with this," and she handed to him the other letter which had been thrown in at the window.

The boy took the letters, looking at her intently.

She arose, and gave one glance, as if a long leave-taking, around that happy, summer, fairy-like room, that had been the peacefulest home she had known for ten long years.

"Some power has been dragging me all my life toward them," she murmured, "and the time has come for me to make the sacrifice at last. I was tired of life, and thought to find rest and quiet here at length."

Her hands rested lighty upon Naoum's shoulders once more. Nay; she bent and kissed his lips and eyes as she had never done before.

"For he is so like him!" she whispered; and, without a word more, glided from the room.

In another moment, Naoum had hidden the letters in the bosom of his shirt, and looking from between the lattices, caught a last glimpse of his mistress occupying a low carriage that slowly rolled away.

CHAPTER II.

Late in the afternoon of that summer's day the carriage in which Lady Hester had left her house stopped on a low sea-beach, near a range of rocks and a spit of sand, that ran out like a shining needle into the sea. The needle was dull now, however, for the sky had grown black, and there were loud mutterings from all points of the horizon, and a smothering oppression in the air.

"And now, Petro," said Lady Hester, as the driver dismounted, and stood at her carriage door, in obedience to her signal, "go to the nearest inn, and remain during the night. Call here to-morrow at this time, and not a moment before. I have those within call who will protect me, and lead me to where I want to go."

An English servant would have demurred at such a command from a mistress whom he loved; but Petro was a native of that country, accustomed to a slavelike obedience from his birth; and accustomed, moreover, to his mistress's strange freaks for the last ten years. So he merely bowed, and turned to go, saying, in his native tongue:

"The Pallekaria are about here, lady."

"I know. I am safe. I know what I am doing. Stay!—one word. Have I been a good mistress?"

The man kneels, takes her hand in his, kisses it with emotion, and hurries off.

Directly he is out of sight, Lady Hester gets out of the carriage, wraps her shawl around her, and advances to the utmost verge of the beach, where the surf ripples up to her sandals, and she can almost feel the return-tide around her feet. A sudden darkness seems to have fallen upon the scene. Over the illimitable realms of angry waves before her, her sad eyes roam as if in quest of those far-off lands she never shall see more.

A few faints drops of rain commence to fall, and she feels a heavy hand on her shoulder. Turning round, she beholds a tall, dark, stalwart man. He wears a white tunic reaching to his knees, and around his waist is twined the fatal scarf of the Pallekaria, with its silk and silver threads.

The slight form quails for a moment beneath his grasp, and the shiver of death came over her. The man is many years her elder; but she seems to recognize and shrink at something in his look and touch remembered after all those years which reckon back to her childhood.

Suddenly, she falls at his feet, and, embracing them, exclaims:

"Let me live!—let me live!—let me live, if only for a little while—a year, a month, a week—and then I will come and render up my life to you. I was a child when my father deserted the clan of the Pallekaria. I was but an infant when my parents fled with me. Until I ceased to be a child, I knew nothing of the dreadful sentence of death that had been pronounced upon him and his descendants, as an expiation for that offence. Since that truth was revealed to me by my father upon his dying bed, all the years that ought to have been the golden ones of my life have been cold and dark with the dreadful shadow of death that has been pursuing them. Let that shadow depart from me if but for one brief space. Let me live!—let me live!"

She buried her face at his feet in the surf-swept sand, and the waves drenched the edges of her garments. While she had been speaking, dark forms had issued from behind the projecting ridge of rocks. Some of these formed a semi-circle around their chief, others went to the carriage, and counted therein the pile of gold. Having done so, they made a sign to him that all was right.

He bent and touched the woman lightly on the shoulder. She arose and looked round in the gathering darkness. Seeing the sudden apparition of the dreaded Pallekaria around her, she gave a sudden start and shiver, a convulsive gasp, and with these, the invulnerable pride of earlier days came to her relief, and she gave no sign of weakness more. In the faces of that silent, encircling band, she read her doom, and saw that further pleading was worse than thrown away.

"Alexis!" was all she said.

"A Pallekaria never breaks his word," was the dark-browed chief's reply. "When your servant left you here alone, and you advanced toward the sea, I gave the signal, and the woman-faced youth you call Alexis has even now left Sirponte, and is on his way back to look for you at your Syrian palace."

At the same instant, two of the band advanced with cords, and seizing her arms, secured them behind.

"Kneel," said the chief; and she knelt without a gesture or a word.

As she did so, a flash of lightning, followed by instant thunder, struck the ground, and the rain poured down in torrents. The little light that was left, showed the waves of the sea lifted up in vast and froth-capped undulations. The whizz of a scimitar was heard flashing through the air, and so, amid storm and darkness, upon a desolate barbarian beach, without one near to wish her a last good-by, the Lady Hester yielded up the ghost in expiation of her parent's sin.

As the bleeding trunk fell to the ground, the chief caught up the head and held it aloft by its long dark locks. At the same instant, two powerfully built men, followed by others bearing torches, brought forward a young man, scarcely more than a youth, who bore every evidence of a captive lately loosed from his bonds. His jailers brought him hurriedly forward, until he faced the chief, and one of the bystanders thrust a lighted torch right against the convulsed face of the severed head the chief held up on high.

As he did so, the eyes of the face quivered open, darted upon the youth one glance of agonized recognition, in which ineffable and pleading love was blended, then closed forever.

"So perish all the descendants of those that betray the Pallekaria," said the chief, letting the head drop to the ground. "Release that woman faced youth she called Alexis, and let him go. A Pallekaria never breaks his word."

The men released their hold; but Alexis, overcome with horror, fell to the ground in a deep swoon, left alone with the headless corpse of the woman who had yielded up her life for him.

CHAPTER III.

Late in the evening of the next day—and a lovely summer's evening it was—a man and a boy were standing on the threshold of the house that had belonged to Lady Hester.

They were Naoum and Alexis.

The latter held two letters in his hand, which he read alternately.

The one was written in a woman's hand, and was addressed to Alexis. It read thus:

I go to deliver up my life for you, as part of the ransom that the Pallekaria require. I go gladly, for a dead woman can tell you what a living woman cannot. I go gladly, for I love you, and render up my life to you. All my possessions in this world which you care about are yours; all my love for you, which you do not care about, I take with me into the next.

Letter number two, addressed to Lady Hester, was written in the modern Greek, and Alexis made it out with some difficulty. With the former part of it, the reader is already acquainted. The concluding passage ran thus:

But, if you would save Alexis, lady, and save us the trouble and danger of coming in a band to seek you, this is what you should do: Meet me this evening at the rocks on the sea-beach near Sirponte; bring with you the one hundred thousand drachmas of gold, dismiss your servant, and render up your life. Thus shall you save the life of your Alexis (whose head we shall else send you, fresh and bleeding), and expiate your parent's crime in deserting the Pallekaria.

The stars came out, and the solemn beams that fell found the two brothers locked arm in arm, their eyes misty and their cheeks wet.

The years that have since elapsed have separated them in body as wide asunder as the poles. But, through all their lives, over leagues of land and water, their memories never failed to journey to one sacred spot—a costly tomb erected over the remains of Lady Hester, lying where once her Syrian palace stood.

[Pleasant Hours.

THE ESCAPE ON THE ICE.

One morning, early in February, 1839, two American brothers, by the name of Walter and James Farnsworth, set out for a day's hunt in the forrest. The stock of meat in their several families was running low, and hunting was the only resource they had in those days for replenishing it. They were accounted the best hunters, as well as Indian fighters, that there were in all the Miami country, into which they had penetrated and built their cabins some three years before the incident, which we are about to relate, transpired.

Many were the important services the brothers had rendered the settlers about them, until at last they came to be regarded as leaders in that district, and no enterprise was set on foot that they were not consulted about, and their views were in most cases accepted by their neighbors. Over and over again had the Indians been thwarted, in their well-planned attacks upon some lone settler's cabin, through the interposition of the brothers; and many times, when the supply of food ran low in the winter time, it was their hands which had provided it, and brought joy where despair had taken up its abode.

But to come at once to the incidents of our story:

On this particular morning, as it had been arranged the night before, Walter came to the cabin of his brother, whom he found standing at the door ready for a start.

"You're a little late, Walt," he said, after he had bid his brother good morning. "I had begun to think that you had been frightened by those clouds lying away there in the south, and had given up going for to-day."

"I hardly knew what to do about it, I confess; James. It looked much to me like rain at day-break, and to my mind the air feels like it now, although the sky does not. What do you say? Better risk it and go, don't you think?"

"Yes. The snow is frozen now, and, at any rate, it will be good snow-shoeing through the fore-part of the day. We have little meat in the house, and Burn's folks, over yonder, have hardly a mouthful of anything. I sent Willie over there this morning with half the meat we had by us, and he said he never saw people more thankful. Burn's lameness is no better, and it ain't at all probable that he will be able to step out of doors again this winter."

"Well, if such is the case, we mustn't let 'em suffer, if we have to work the harder. But let us be off. The sky is brightening off there in the south, and, after all, it may not rain or thaw much until we get back."

"I am ready. Susan," he said, addressing his wife, who, at that moment, came to the door, "don't be alarmed for us, if we are not back until to-morrow. We shan't come in until we have got something to repay us for our trouble."

A few more words of trifling importance passed between them; and then the brothers, turning their backs upon the cabin, in a short time had plunged into the depths of the forests, crossing the river which lay about a mile distant on the solid ice, which the recent cold weather had rendered so firm that it would have borne up any weight to which it might have been subjected.

The morning hours wore away, and noon came; still they kept on their course, and as yet had seen nothing which would repay a shot. The weather had very much moderated since morning, and the crust which covered the snow was now beginning to give way and allow their snow-shoes to sink through in many places. The sky, which through the morning had been very bright, now grew to a dead leaden color, giving unmistakable signs that rain was coming; and if anything more was wanting to substantiate this, there was the hollow echo made by the sound of their voices, while the wind, which all through the forenoon had been in the south-west, changed to the east and blew strongly. All signs about them, in both earth and sky, gave assurance that a thaw was imminent.

Walter, as the signs of a storm began to multiply so thickly, was for turning back; but his brother objected to this move. They had come a long distance, and it would not be much longer before they would be rewarded by a sight of game, in the common run of luck, and food was so much needed at home; when, as if to give them encouragement, at this moment they espied a deer just out of rifle shot. This gave them new courage, and raised their hopes of soon being able to set their faces homeward, laden with as much venison as they could carry; and they started off in pursuit at the top of their speed, which was not very swift, for the snow had thawed so much that they broke through the crust at almost every step.

The forest through which they were passing was very open; and, as a consequence, in spite of all their caution in approaching within rifle shot, the deer got wind of their approach, and, throwing back its head, dashed off at full speed.

Though the hunters were disappointed in securing their game as easily as they had hoped, they had no idea of giving up the chase; and so they set off at full speed in pursuit, hoping soon to come within range. This they at last succeeded in doing, but not until two good hours more had been spent, and at least three miles more put between themselves and home.

James, at last, succeeded in bringing his rifle to bear upon the panting animal, which had paused for a moment to recover its breath. Though usually a sure shot, he did not this time kill, and the deer merely wounded, turned again to fly. Its strength lasted long enough to lead them onward for half a mile further, when it sank down, and the hunters soon put an end to its misery.

To flay the animal, and cut it up into quarters, was but a slight task for them; and by the time it was was concluded, the rain began to fall. By this time, they began to feel the want of food; and so the snow was scraped away, a fire hastily kindled, and in a little time, a nice steak was broiled.

By the time their repast was concluded, the rain was pouring down in torrents. There was no time to be lost; and so they at once set their faces homeward. Besides the rain which was falling, they had another cause for uneasiness. By the signs, which they had seen for an hour past, they knew that there were enemies near at hand. Once or twice, in their pursuit of the deer, they had crossed the recently made trail of the savages; and they knew well that if they once got upon their track that to escape would be next to impossible. The redskins, thirsting for their blood, would follow them like blood-hounds.

Owing to the warmth of the weather and the fast-falling rain, coupled with the additional weight of venison they bore, the crust of snow would no longer sustain them, and they sank through it at every step. This made their progress slow and painful; and, almost before they were aware of it, the night came down, and a darkness so dense that they could hardly see a yard before their faces, encompassed them about.

For a while they toiled on; but at last they saw, what had been evident from the first, that they would not be able to reach home that night. So they came to a halt beneath the wide-spreading branches of a large hemlock, where they decided to encamp for the night.

At first, they thought they would try and do without a fire, fearing that the savages might be attracted to them thereby; but it looked so dismal and became so uncomfortable that they at last decided to run the risk. After considerable trouble, one was kindled, and they seated themselves about it, enjoying the cheerful warmth which it imparted to them.

An hour or so was passed in this way; and then they made preparations to get a little sleep. Some boughs were cut from the hemlock, and the water shaken from them and then dried by the fire; and of these a couch was made, upon which Walter threw himself, while his brother kept the watch until midnight, when he was to arouse himself and take his turn at standing guard.

Slowly the hours passed away, and at length midnight came. James had not closed his eyes; but no signs or sounds of danger had reached him.

It was now his turn to rest, and arousing his brother, he threw himself in his place, and was soon sleeping heavily. He could have remained in this state but a short time—to him it seemed but a few minutes—when he was awakened by his brother, bending over him and shaking him by the shoulder.

"What is it?" he asked, starting up and springing to his feet.

"Hark! There are savages near us. They have seen our light, and are about to give us a call. There! Did you not hear them breaking through the snow?"

"I heard something, but it may be a wild beast instead of a redskin. But what makes it so light? It can't be morning yet."

"No. The moon is up. There! Are those beasts, or savages? I can swear that the redskins are upon us, and more than a score in number."

"You are right, Walt, and we must remain here no longer if we wish to keep our scalps upon our heads. Good heavens! look yonder. They are nearer upon us than I thought."

His brother glanced in the direction from whence the sound came, and beheld, but a short distance away, a number of shadowy forms gliding amid the trees towards them. There was not a moment to lose, for to attempt to oppose them would be worse than useless; so, hastily binding on their snow-shoes, they fled away, leaving their hard-earned venison behind them.

The rain was still pouring down in torrents, and the walking was much worse than it had been when they had laid down; but they were somewhat refreshed by the rest they had had; and urged on by the danger which threatened them, they had put a considerable distance between them and their camp when the Indians reached it. They knew when they reached the camp, by the howl of disappointment which came to their ears when the redskins found that their prey had scented their approach and fled. A backward glance, and a second shout, told them that the savages were not lingering about the fire, but were coming on in fierce pursuit.

The brothers knew that the race before them was one for life or death. So they strained every nerve in the fearful ordeal before them, and with such success that they were enabled to maintain the distance between them and their pursuers, and at one time to increase it. And so the race went on, until, at length, the night was past and the gray light of dawn began to light up the east, and lessen the shadows about them.

"We must be near the river, James, and I don't think the savages will care to follow us beyond," exclaimed Walter, who was slightly in advance, as he paused a moment for his brother to come up.

"Heaven knows, I hope not; I cannot keep up this pace for a great while longer."

"Courage, Walter, courage! We have done too much to fail now, and fall beneath the red hands of those howling savages. Just beyond the hill yonder is the river; and once on the other side, I think we shall be safe."

"But what is that, James? I mean that roaring sound which fills the air?"

Only the wind and rain, I think. Quick! quick! The red-skins are gaining upon us."

With every nerve strained to the utmost tension, the two men sprang up the hill. The roaring sound increased in violence until it was almost deafening. The summit of the hill was gained at last, and the fugitives paused spellbound with terror and dismay.

James was the first to speak.

"Great heaven, Walter, the river is breaking up!"

He was right. With a mighty and resistless force, the great mass of water and ice came plunging along, with a sound that was almost as deafening as that of thunder. The warm rain had caused the river suddenly to rise and break the armor of ice with which it was bound.

"Water is more merciful than the savages. We had better trust ourselves to it than them," said Walter.

They sprang down the hill to the bank of the river. Just as they reached it a shout of triumph came from the throats of the savages. They had reached the summit of the hill, and beheld the wild rushing of the river, and felt assured that their prey must now fall into their hands.

"There is but one chance for us, Walter," said James, gazing into his brother's face; "and that is to trust ourselves to one of these floating cakes of ice, hoping that it may carry us to the other shore. There is a good one for our purpose passing now. Follow me. It's our only chance."

It was a fearful leap, but his feet struck the spot he intended them to, and in a moment his brother was by his side. The motion they gave the cake sent it far out into the stream, where it joined others; and they were whirled along with resistless force by the current, which, to their great joy, they found set towards the opposite shore. Several times they were in great danger of slipping into the boiling flood; but at last they reached in safety the point desired, despite their insecure footing, and the numerous shots which were fired at them by the disappointed and enraged savages.

Thankful for their almost miraculous escape, the brothers sent back an answering shout of defiance, and then hastened on to their settlement, which they reached without further adventure.

THE OCEAN.

Roll on, thou deep and dark blue ocean—roll!
Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain;
Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
Stops with the shore;—upon the watery plain
The wrecks are all thy deed, nor doth remain
A shadow of man's ravage, save his own,
When, for a moment, like a drop of rain,
He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan,
Without a grave, unknell'd, uncoffin'd and unknown.

Thou glorious mirror, where the Almighty's form
Glasses itself in tempests; in all time,
Calm or convuls'd—in breeze, or gale, or storm,
Icing the pole, or in the torrid clime
Dark heaving; boundless, endless and sublime—
The image of Eternity—the throne
Of the Invisible; even from out thy slime
The monsters of the deep are made; each zone
Obeys thee; thou goest forth, dread, fathomless alone.

ASPIRATIONS OF THE SOUL.

Past the high clouds floating round
Where the eagle is not found,
Past the million, starry choir,
Through the midst of foul opinions,
Flaming passions, sensual mire,
To the Mind's serene dominions,
I aspire.

THE SUNNY SIDE.

Oft the glen of deepest gloom
Hath, withal, a sunny side;
Where the bowers of beauty bloom,
Where the streams of pleasure glide
And the shadows of the tomb
Never on its paths abide.

Night full often comes to all,
Yet we may not seek the shade!
Soon the flowers of bliss will fall
Not for us to bid them fade;
Lest our God His gifts recall—
Lest His arm of love be stay'd.—[Fritz.

THE BLIND ONE.

Not to me returns
Day or the sweet approach of even or morn,
Of sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But clouds instead, and ever-during dark
Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair
Presented with a universal blank.—[Milton.

SCIENCE AND NOAH'S DELUGE.

NUMBER TWO.

We shall now attempt to trace out some of the interesting phenomena, which M. Adhémar considers, go to establish the theory that our northern and southern hemispheres have alternately been deluged by waters let loose from the opposite extremity of the globe.

It must be borne in mind that according to Adhémar's theory, two vast glaciers or continents of ice always exist, one at each of our poles; and that as one is growing and increasing in its gravitating or attracting influence from age to age, the other, owing to the increase of heat at that end, is decreasing in the same proportion. One of the consequences of such a state of things as this, would be that cold and ice would naturally increase continuously at one of the poles and decrease at the other. Another fact would also be noticeable; for vast periods before the great bulk of the waters broke loose from their abodes to flood the opposite end, there would be an almost imperceptible but certain rise in the rivers at that end of the globe where the new glacier was forming. In corroboration of this part of the theory, we are pointed to the fact that philosophers have stated it as their conviction that the northern hemisphere (where according to Adhémar the great glacier is now forming) "is gradually cooling; and that the artic ice is steadily encroaching on the yet unfrozen portions of Europe, Asia, and America; that the summers of England and France are not so hot as they were in olden times;" that English vineyards once existing are impossible now. And while the northern hemisphere is thus evidently cooling it is equally clear that the southern is increasing in heat. Navigators have, since Captain Cook's day, been able to discover land which in his time was under the ice. And as to the increase of the waters in the rivers and seas, it has been proved by Robert Stephenson and others that the level of the North sea and of the English channel absolutely is rising. The ocean also regularly increases in depth as you travel from the north to the south pole; which is precisely what it ought to do if this theory be true.

Let us now compare the author's theory with some geological facts. Throughout the Old and the New Worlds, we find scattered over its table lands innumerable blocks of vast dimensions, which by their position and appearance evidently show that they have been torn from the mountains and flooded there from some point in the north. In all cases these blocks have been arrested by rising grounds. They are invariably found stranded on the northern slopes of mountains; whilst the positions of other masses clearly indicate that they have been dragged through lowlands, and other open grounds which have permitted their passage. The nearer these great boulders are to the pole, the greater is their number, and the larger are they in bulk. Masses similar to these, evidently broken from the mountains of Sweden and Finland, are scattered in innumerable numbers over Germany, Poland and Russia.

Then again, hills and horizontal plains, some nearly three hundred feet deep, composed of sand, gravel, mud, shingle, clay and boulders, cover vast regions, stretching in lines from north to south. Of this class are the steppes of Russia, and that vast stratum which covers Holland.

Especially in Finland, Sweden, Norway and the British Islands, peculiar marks, furrows and flutings, sometimes two feet deep are found in the granite sides of mountains. The direction of these water-worn channels is invariably from north to south, or in the direction of the last great deluge.

Besides all this, philosophers have long been convinced that the destructive forces which have produced the last geological convulsions, were owing to a diluvium or flood from the north. For it was evident that an immense mass of waters, accompanied by ice and rushing from north to south, inundated the northern countries of the globe; stripping the highlands and cleaning off and polishing the rocks by means of the detritus which it bore along.

But this and much more that could be adduced, is only proof of a flood from the northern end of our world. How about a flood from the south, or what about the deluge before Noah's?

On this point our attention is called to the fact that these great boulders which so clearly indicate the fact of some great overwhelming agency which has carried them where they are, are found to increase in numbers as you near the south as well as the north pole; while both decrease in quantity towards the equator. Showing that a similar flood once hurled similar rocky masses from their resting place in the south as from the north—both floods decreasing in strength as they neared the centre of the earth.

The author of this theory believes that it furnishes an understanding of a hitherto non-explainable phenomenon. It is well known that the bodies of elephants, animals of a species especially and peculiarly belonging to hot climates, have been found buried in ice in the extreme northern parts of the globe. How came they so far from their native abodes?

M. Adhémar believes that the mystery is simply this: that when the great deluge from the south sweeping and driving all before it passed over the tropical regions, the elephants fled singly and in herds before it, until they reached the northern glacier itself; where, falling exhausted by fatigue, hunger and cold, they were soon covered up by masses of snow and ice, to be resurrected in our day by the warming of the northern regions and the consequent melting of the ice in which they were buried.

It is well known that an extreme state of cold once existed in our hemisphere. This, with several other things, Adhémar's theory assumes to explain for us, and which we quote in a summary from a reviewer as follows: "During ten thousand five hundred years the total of the hours of night being in excess of the hours of day, an immense cupola of ice was formed over and around the North Pole, which reached lower than the seventieth degree of latitude. The attraction of this gigantic glacier had drawn this side the equator the totality of the seas. Our northern continents were then for the most part under water, while those of the southern hemisphere were high and dry, and perhaps inhabited by the human race which was destroyed at the last deluge." Seven thousand years before that deluge this enormous glacier had attained its greatest possible development, because the position of the earth in the solar system had then become such that the sum of the hours of night had begun to decrease and the sum of the hours of day to increase, resulting in our hemisphere beginning to increase in warmth. The extent of the great northern glacier was therefore gradually decreased, while an opposite effect was going on at the South Pole. After the lapse of this seven thousand years, the continued action of the sun's heat having sufficiently softened the North Pole ice, the grand break up occurred; the northern seas and the fragments of the glacier, obeying the sudden displacement of the centre of gravity rushed in a body to the south. Torn from his bed Ocean carried with him his mud with which he formed the extensive lands which constitute the diluvium. Gigantic streams of water mingling with earth, sand and pebbles, formed the alluviums of the great valleys; finally, erratic boulders, sustained by the ice and by the boiling up of the artic waters to the altitudes which they now occupy, remained shelved on the sides of mountains whose tops they were unable to scale." Thus according to M. Adhémar was produced the last deluge four thousand two hundred years ago.

If Adhémar's next deluge occurs again it will, at least, not be before six thousand years after the present date; by which time it is supposable that most of the readers of the UTAH MAGAZINE will be securely out of the way, and in a position to look down upon the scene without danger. There is therefore no immediate cause for alarm as to whether his theory be true or not. It is like the exhaustion of the coal-beds of England, a question we can very comfortably shelve for our descendents to attend to. In the meantime it is a question for thought—a question for geological research—one calculated to develop the intellectuality of the enquirer into the operations of nature's laws; and as such we give it.

PURE LOVE.

BY EMILY G. TEASDALE.

Cold indeed would be our pilgrimage on earth were it not warmed with the genial rays of affection. Love is the noblest attribute of the Deity and the highest principle of heaven; not the love generally acknowledged at the present day; for, like most holy things, it has been perverted and the word misapplied. Pure love is holy and self-denying, ever ready to throw its mantle over trifling offences. It renders age or sex immaterial where individuals are in possession of noble attributes. The heart would as gladly leap forth to welcome them in our own sex as in the opposite. What higher conception can we form of happiness than the association of kindred spirits progressing in eternal truth?

Pure love is refined and heaven-born. Every spirit possesses more or less of this attribute, or it would not be pronounced pure; and the nobler the spirit, the more love will it possess, and the less power will a cold, calculating world have to destroy its heavenly origin.

Who could look emotionless upon the works of creation, from nature's beauteous carpet, resplendent with flowers of every hue, to the gorgeous setting of the sun, bathed as it were in a sea of gold, surrounded by the delicate and varied tints that blend and present to the eye a picture of glory and magnificence surpassing all description! We sit and watch the daylight give place to the queen of night rising in all her modest beauty, and the stars peep out one after the other from the clear blue sky, diffusing a calm and holy light over the earth, till the heart has become too full to speak, and life has seemed the sweetest of all gifts, whilst the earth and sky have appeared smiling with intense joy. These rapt moments have appeared like glimmerings of our "primeval childhood," and as foretastes of celestial glory.

Oh! who could contemplate the Author of so much delicate beauty and grand magnificence, without feeling inspired with deep and holy love, and associating him with everything that is noble and refined, far beyond our ideal of perfection? The spirit may be clouded and cast down at times: it perchance may seldom meet with those who can understand or appreciate its hidden depths of pure love; but the knowledge that we may eternally realize our fondest dream of the refined and beautiful, will nerve the soul to action. Who could associate aught else with celestial glory?

Nothing can smooth the rugged path of life like a loving spirit. It drives back to its native element the influence of the Evil One. It is life's morning and evening star. It curbs the petulance of childhood, and soothes the sorrows of old age. A domineering spirit may rule the serf, but it is never a welcome guest, or calculated to accomplish a great amount of good.

WOMAN AND HER SPHERE.

BY E. W. TULLIDGE.

Too much do men overlook or if they passingly notice too soon do they forget the important part that woman plays in the world. There are more truly noble women than there are truly noble men: they are more self-sacrificing and devoted to goodness; more emblematical of purity and love; aye, let it be honestly confessed, they are more divine in their natures. We are not far wrong when we affirm that a good woman is an angel. True, we are the gods! No sane man possessed of the egotism of his sex, will deny this cardinal distinction.

"Confine woman to her sphere!" "Let woman keep within her proper sphere!" Such is the arrogant cant of us lords of creation. Very well. Let woman have her proper sphere, and let us justly accord it at last. It cannot be said generously accord, niggardly as we have been and are still in giving to woman even a poor acknowledgement of her vast sum of merits in the working out of all the world's best issues. Let women step into the opposite scale in the adjustments of society without any petty envy or depreciation from our side, and the world will be the better balanced.

"Two heads in council, two beside the hearth,
Two in the tangled business of the world."

And if we are not yet prepared for such a consummation as a great social and national fact let us, at least, realizing her vast influence in the world's management, take her cause into candid consideration.

"A woman's sphere is her family." Another cant proverb. Shame on those who thus limit her, shame on their honesty, shame on their intellect. Let the truth be boldly spoken,—a woman's sphere is the unlimited world. Man's sphere is her sphere. Why should she be limited more than he, when God made both to move together side by side in one circle? That which his circle of mortal and immortal life encompasses so does hers. We cannot admit that woman was made for man any more than man was made for woman. They were created dear companions and helpmeet for each other.

If a woman's sphere is her family is not man's sphere also his family? Any distinction urged on this point will be mere egotism. It is true that the woman's sphere both in her family and in the affairs of life is the female part, man's the male part, it is also true that six and half-a-dozen are equivalent. Is not the woman-influence in forming the moral condition of our social life as great and as ramified as that of man? Aye, is it not part and parcel of our masculine faith that woman is the cause of all evil, and if there is any affair uncommonly wicked that a woman is sure to be at the bottom of it? Suppose we grant this fallacy; thus, in their very self-complacency and meanness in saddling the great sins of society upon her shoulders, men virtually admit the supreme influence of women in the world.

Passing from the moral sphere of society into the religious, we find her more than the equal of man in her influence. In all evangelical movements and reformatory churches it is found that mothers and daughters outnumber fathers and sons. Indeed, the mission of christianity seems very much to have been led on by the ardent devotion of mothers, sisters, wives. The page of history is crowded with examples. Instance, the heroic women who gathered around Jesus (with never a Peter among them to deny their Lord). Instance, St. Helena, mother of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor.

The nation which does not assign to women a very high part to play not only in the home circle but also in all the vital concerns of humanity, is barbaric in its notions and estate. True civilization has not yet reached that nation. Barbarians always undervalue our fair sisterhood and look down upon them as their slaves, their toys, their goods and chattles; while the nation that best represents civilization and is nearest a republican standard of humanity, will the most highly estimate woman.

MOHAMMED.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY, ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

NO 2.—HIS YOUTH, LOVE AND VISIONS.

Mohammed was born in Mecca, the sacred city of Arabia, in 569 of the Christian era; and he came of the illustrious tribe of Koreish, of which there were two branches descended from two brothers. We are told by Moslem writers that, at the moment of his coming into the world, he raised his eyes to heaven, exclaiming "God is great! There is no God but God, and I am his prophet."

When the prophet was scarcely two months old, his father died, leaving him no other inheritance than five camels, a few sheep and a female slave. The grief of the young mother, at the loss of her beloved, robbed her child of nature's nourishment, and he was given to a Saadite shepherdess to nurse, who, out of compassion, took the helpless infant to her home in one of the pastoral valleys of the mountains.

When, at the age of four years, while playing in the fields with a foster-brother, Moslem traditions inform us, two angels appeared to Mohammed, and the angel Gabriel laying him upon the ground, took out his heart and cleansed it, and having filled it with prophetic gifts, replaced it. Gabriel, we are told, also stamped between the child's shoulders the seal of prophecy. These traditions are akin to the fables concerning the child Jesus. When the vision was told to the nurse, she and her husband became alarmed, fearing these angels were evil spirits. So she carried the youthful prophet back to Mecca and delivered him to his mother.

The mother of Mohammed died when he was six years of age and left him to the guardianship of his illustrious grandfather, who, at his death, two years later, committed the boy to the special care of his eldest son Abu Taleb.

At the age of twelve, with his daring imagination wrought up to the highest pitch by the romances of the deserts, the youth clung to Abu Taleb, who was preparing to mount his camel to start with his caravan, and implored his indulgent kinsman to be permitted to go with him to Syria. "For who, O my uncle, will take care of me when thou art gone?" plead the boy. Abu Taleb granted the prayer of his nephew, and the caravan started on its route, to return in due time loaded with its merchandise, and the mind of the future prophet more abundantly laden with the superstitions of the desert, a knowledge of the sacred Hebrew writings and of the mission of Christ.

At a Nestorian convent where Abu Taleb and his nephew were entertained with great hospitality, one of the monks, surprised at the precocious intellect of young Mohammed, and his astonishing capacity for a religious mission, held frequent conversations with him upon the sacred scriptures. The subjects which engrossed the ardent mind of the future prophet were those relating to his forefather Abraham, Moses and the new dispensation opened in the ministry of Christ. One has only to read the Koran to trace the early inception of the germs of Islamism, and how much the daring and capacious mind of Mohammed became pregnant with the ideas of new dispensations in an Abrahamic succession. In that Nestorian convent, in an ancient city of the Levites, Ishmael's prophet was born for the mission, and from that hour the new dispensation was nascent in Mohammed's soul.

The youth returned with his uncle to Mecca, the seeds of a great religious mission deeply planted in his mind. The son of Ishmael had been to the land in which Abraham sojourned when he departed out of Chaldea and out of the house of his idolatrous father, leaving his denunciation against idolatry and carrying with him a knowledge of the true religion. It was a grand example for his descendant.

When Mohammed reached the age of twenty-five, an important event occurred in his life. It was that of love! The romance is somewhat similar to that between Josephine and her hero.

There lived in Mecca a noble lady of the tribe of Koreish. Twice had she been married; her last husband, a wealthy merchant, had recently died. The extensive business of the fair widow required an efficient manager, and her nephew recommended to her young Mohammed as a fit person to be her factor. Cadijah (the name of the lady) was so eager to secure his services that she offered him double wages to conduct her caravan to Syria. As he is extolled for his manly beauty and engaging manners, it is thought that the fair widow's heart was her counselor. Mohammed, by the advice of Abu Taleb, accepted her offer, and so well pleased was his patroness on his return that she gave him double the stipulated wages. Similar expeditions brought to him like results. On one occasion on his return from Syria with her caravan, as she watched him from the house-top, with her maid-servant, she saw two angels conducting the "favorite of God" into Mecca. This extraordinary circumstance which, no doubt, to her love-inspired mind was real, increased her affections for Mohammed; and forthwith, through her trusty maid-servant, who was with her when her woman's heart gave to her the miraculous vision of the angels, she proposed marriage to the handsome fellow whom Heaven, as well as herself, had condescended to love.

Mohammed now ranked among the most wealthy of the city, and his excellent conduct obtained for him the name of Al Amin, or the Faithful. For several years he continued in the sphere of commerce, but his heart was not in his vocation, and his enterprises were not as successful as before. It is supposed that in his subsequent journeys into Syria after the age of twenty-five, Mohammed renewed his intercourse with those versed in the sacred writings and the history and religion of the Jews and Christians. Waraka, a cousin of Mohammed's wife, was instrumental in developing his latent energy and starting him in his great career. This Waraka himself was a remarkable character. He was a learned man of a bold, speculative mind, who had cast off the idolatrous religion of the East, and held Arian opinions. He was also progressive and innovative in his tendencies First he was a Jew, and then he advanced to the Christian, and perhaps more fully than his pupil, he had already conceived the necessity of a new dispensation, for the Christian churches generally at that period had fallen much from their primitive apostolic state, as the old Eastern empires had into the grossest idolatry. In the Koran, which so emphatically indorses the divine missions of Moses and Jesus, the apostasy of both the Jews and Christians is repeatedly marked. It is more than probable that much of Waraka's mature views and speculations became absorbed by the inspirative and forceful Mohammed.

At length (in the fortieth year of his age) came the annunciation of his apostleship by the personal administration of the angel Gabriel. The following is the substance of Washington Irving's account of this circumstance: "He was passing, as was his wont, the holy month in the cavern of Mount Hara, fasting and praying. It was the night called Al Kader, or the Divine Decree, a night in which, according to the Koran, angels descend to the earth and Gabriel brings down the decrees of God. As Mohammed, in the silent watches of the night, lay wrapped in his mantle, he heard a voice calling him; uncovering his head, a flood of light broke upon him of such an intolerable splendor that he swooned away. On regaining his senses, he beheld an angel in human form, which, approaching from a distance, displayed a silken cloth covered with written characters. 'Read,' said the angel. 'I know not how to read,' replied Mohammed. 'Read!' repeated the angel, 'in the name of the Lord who has created man from a clot of blood. Read, in the name of the Most High, who taught man the use of the pen, who sheds on his soul the ray of knowledge and teaches him what before he knew not.' Upon this Mohammed instantly felt his understanding illumined with celestial light, and what was written upon the cloth, which contained the decrees of God as afterwards promulgated in the Koran. When he had finished the perusal, the heavenly messenger announced, 'Oh Mohammed, of a verity thou art the prophet of God, and I am his angel Gabriel.' Mohammed, in the morning, came trembling and agitated to Cadijah, not knowing whether what he had seen was indeed true, a mere vision or a delusion of his senses, or the mere apparition of an evil spirit. His wife said: 'Joyful tidings dost thou bring! By Him in whose hand is the soul of Cadijah, I will henceforth regard thee as the prophet of our nation. Rejoice,' added she, seeing him cast down, 'Allah will not suffer thee to fall to shame. Hast not thou been loving to thy kinsfolk, kind to thy neighbors, charitable to the poor, hospitable to the stranger, faithful to thy word, and ever a defender of the truth?'

The loving wife then hastened to communicate the intelligence to her cousin Waraka. 'By Him in whose hand is the soul of Waraka,' exclaimed that learned man, 'thou speakest true, oh Cadijah. The angel who has appeared to thy husband is the same who in the days of old was sent to Moses, the son of Amram. His annunciation is true. Thy husband is a prophet.' "

Thus it will be seen that his fond wife and her learned cousin were the first to rejoice and proclaim Mohammed the Prophet of their nation.

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

EGYPT---ITS FIRST SETTLEMENT.

CHAPTER VII.

In a former chapter, we traced the route of a portion of the descendents of Ham through Arabia Petræa and the isthmus of Suez, to the banks of the Nile. This must have been their course, if we credit the account of the flood and final resting of the Ark on the summit the greater Ararat, as given in the Bible. From scriptural testimony also we find that long before the days of Abraham, settlements had been formed as far south and west as "Ur of the Chaldees," Palestine and Egypt. Probably no people in the world are better prepared to understand and appreciate the primitive character of settlements, newly formed after a migration of hundreds of miles from the seats of civilization, than the Latter-day Saints. We must, nevertheless, bear in mind that there is a marked difference in the circumstances attending the migration of the first settlers of Egypt and the migration of the people who first settled Utah. The children of Ham may have been, and doubtless were, forced into the wilderness by the pressure of stronger and more warlike tribes. The ignorance of the people of that day, of the science of geography, left them without the advantages arising from having an objective point to reach and occupy, they literally felt their way in all their migrations and wanderings. From the well known barrenness of the country through which they passed it is to be inferred that they would extend their explorations as fast as their circumstances would permit. The banks of the Nile in consequence of the extreme fertility of the soil and the salubriousness of the climate would have offered irresistible temptation for the formation of permanent settlements to far more inveterate wanderers than were Misraim and his descendants.

The sluggish character of the river and the marshy nature of the soil of lower Egypt together with the presence of rapacious sea monsters that filled the river and the numerous lagoons, that ramified the whole country, intimidated the first discoverers and forced them to skirt along the banks until they reached what is called upper Egypt or Thebais, where we have evidence that the first settlements were formed.

Ages must have passed away ere a rude pastoral race could have gained the experience and accumulated the capital that would enable them to dig the canals and reservoirs, and rear the dykes necessary for the fertilization and occupation of the whole land.

THE ORIGIN OF THE KINGLY POWER.

The patriarchal was the first form of government, and no doubt continued to prevail for a long period after the first settlement of the land. The first royal dynasty of Egypt doubtless arose from some masterful and ambitious patriarch making war upon and subduing all the other heads of tribes or families, and combining the thirty six "Nomi" or patriarchal patrimonies into one consolidated empire, this is more likely to have been the origin of the division of the land into thirty-six "Nomi" or provinces than that given by the Greek historians who generally have ascribed that arrangement to the genius of "Sesostris the Great."

The power of the Kings of Egypt became more and more absolute as they extended their dominions by conquest, they claimed finally to have descended in a direct line from the gods, whom their people were taught were the first rulers of Egypt, their persons were sacred and it was discovered that the "King could do no wrong" in and of himself. Ministers of state were made responsible for the sins of royalty then as now. To rebel against the authority of a king who was related to the gods and ruled by divine right was a sin hat was unpardonable by the law.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE MYTHOLOGY

of the Egyptains, and the priesthood based thereon, was probably the lowest of that of any system of religion that prevailed in any of the nations of antiquity.

OSIRES (the sun) and ISIS (the moon) were supposed to be the chief rulers among the divinities of Egypt; although, in their view, ruling all the world by turns, yet the land of Egypt and its inhabitants were subjects of the especial care of those great ruling deities. Osires representing the male and Isis the female, it was supposed that the whole fraternity of Gods sprung from them.

The Egyptians were firm believers in the doctrine of the transmigrations of souls. The spirit of man had previously been schooled and prepared for the glorious estate of manhood, by the gradual development of his powers, based upon the experience gained in numerous probations. First, by animating the body of the lowest form of animal life, ascending higher and higher in the scale of mental and physical development with each probation, until, finally, it attained the glorious form of manhood, which was believed, then as now, to be the acme of the perfection of all that is excellent in physical and mental arrangement, they believed that the estate of man here was alone worthy of endless continuation.

The Egyptians were believers in the doctrine of the literal resurrection of the body. The preservation of the bodies of their dead was esteemed as the most holy of all the obligations of life. A son would expend all of his earthly possessions rather than omit having the bodies of his parents embalmed and laid away in sepulchres hewn out of the rocky heights that nearly everywhere border the valley of the Nile; each generation believing that, although their progenitors had lain a long time in the tombs, the resurrection day was but a little way off from their time. The loss of the body was a fearful loss. The possession of the human form as a dwelling place for the spirit, and the mastery it gave the possessor over every other organization, was, in their view, placed as a goal at the end of a long race. The preservation of the body intact was essential to a speedy resurrection; a partial or complete round through the lesser organizations was the penalty when the body was lost by transgression of the laws, civil or ecclesiastical. What they believed to have been the loss incurred by the unavoidable or accidental destruction of the body after death is left to conjecture; but it can reasonably be inferred that the origin of the worship of many of the beasts, birds and reptiles was based upon the supposition that the spirits of their honored dead, who by force of circumstances were deprived of sepulchres and the consequent destruction of their bodies, would immediately animate the body of a dog to guard their slumbers by night or to hunt and destroy noxious depredators by day. The "Ibis" was the enemy of the whole serpent race; the frog destroyed insects injurious to vegetation, and the crocodile was the scavenger of their great river and its lagoons. The lively remembrance of the constant care and labor of their parents for their protection and support when living, was a strong testimony to them; all their sympathies and affections would lead them to do them all the good they possibly could after death—for idleness and ease, here nor hereafter, formed no part of the expectations of the Egyptians; their heaven was utilitarian in character. The loss of their bodies precluded the possibility of their crossing the river Styx to the spiritual abode of all good Egyptians, for that happy land was held in special reservation for humanity; the human form and human attributes alone could enjoy the sweets of the great and endless future that lay beyond the banks of the fearful river that divided the natural from the spiritual life.

The best evidence that some of their low forms of worship arose from the supposition that unlucky spirits should animate the bodies of the animals named, is found in the fact that that custom was mostly confined to cities occupied by the military "caste." It was the unalterable law of Egypt a son could alone follow the occupation and position in life that his father held before him. A man belonging to the military "caste," his sons were destined for the army without exception. The uncertain vicissitudes of war rendered the military "caste" more liable to be deprived of sepulchres than any other "caste" in the land of Egypt. It was frequently the case that an army of Egyptian soldiers, when successful in a military raid, would return home loaded down with dogs, cats, monkeys and many other animals, either useful or entertaining, in preference to the richer spoils of war—each man who had lost a dear brother, father or grandfather in some previous expedition into the same country having been convinced by some preference shown to himself by some one of those animals that it was some dearly beloved relative in disguise.

The Drama.

THE MISSION OF THE DRAMA.

At the theatre, we are made to see and feel realities more than in real life we see and feel them. We meet them in life, but in the buzzing of the busy world around us, and in the crowd of our own concerns, we are not struck by them in their marked individualisms, nor affected with their experience. In the practical world we almost exclusively feel ourselves, are given over to commercial necessities, and domestic duties and perplexities crowd upon us. Enough most times are these to fill our daily page; but in books, and at the theatre, we are fain to slip from ourselves awhile to view the personalities that move around us daily. We live with them in fellowship there, feel their joys and sorrows and sympathize in their experience.

The stage is a great humanizer and a powerful preacher, when properly fulfilling its mission. We are in communion with humanity through it,—"one touch of nature makes the whole world kin,"—and callous must be the heart that feels not the brotherhood and sisterhood of mankind, and depraved, indeed, when it answers not to a noble sentiment, justifies not the good and condemns not the wrong. Very few are wicked or unjust in their sympathies with a play. The seducer likes not his own character there, the iron-hearted are sensible to more of nature's tenderness, society asks forgiveness of its victims and weeps for them. It may be somewhat heterodox in expression, but true it is in fact, that the world is more human,—sometimes more divine in the theatre than at the church.

What? Special pleadings for theatrical managers and their companies? Shall society make of them its divines and saints? Nay. Indeed, we are often struck with the hollowness of the stage, as far as the realities embodied in the performers are concerned, and never more than when they are impersonating any character where religion or much virtue is brought in. It is the mission of the drama in its integrity, and the stage as a secular pulpit, with the functions for great social good, that we would maintain and not the fitness of some of its exponents. It is true we often find among the profession much virtue; and there have trod the boards some of those wonderful transmigrative natures which we call genius. They are true dramatic poets; but from their training, and that erratic forcefulness of genius which bursts into a variety of directions, with about the same method that there is in Hamlet's madness, they write their impersonations not upon paper, but upon the stage. Such were Garrick, Kean and Booth of the past. They were of Shakspeare's brotherhood by nature, and what he created they have not acted but been. We associate with the poet a divine frenzy; but in none does it reach such intensity as in the dramatic poet. His work is the conception of characters; out of his own nature he creates numerous individualities, and, in the action and circumstances of his plays, makes them live, move and have a being. The author himself is no delineator of his persons, but his own transmigrating soul passes from one to the other, and fills them all in turn. So it is with such as Garrick, Kean and Booth; and sometimes, especially when under stimulants, their absolute loss of self in their impersonations reaches temporary madness. "Richard is himself again" when the spirits of the unreal pass out of him, and so are they themselves again, when their Richards have gone out of them.

We may claim for the drama an extraordinary mission, for it gives the highest manifestations of genius—the creation of many individualities, and not mere boquets of poetry. Even the epic poet deserves not to rank first, be he Homer himself, when a Shakspeare is in the field. Indeed the epic can not properly be said to have a mission at all, for though essentially dramatic in all its construction, and its very substance in the abundance of distinct and varying personalities, moving and acting in the progress of the plot, animating the whole poem with visible life, yet it has no broader sphere than the study, no larger audience than the scholar. But the drama proper is the epic adapted to a public mission, and brought out in series,—made to live, move and have a tangible being on the stage, as to the poetic fancy the heroes of Homer have in the grand action of the Iliad. The drama, too, has secular functions, rivaling those of the church, as far as its influences over the masses are concerned. Where the ministers of the gospel cannot reach them, the theatre does, and therefore are theatres pernicious, and a national curse, when exercising themselves not for good. On the other hand, how much may they be made teachers of the people for moral and intellectual results, besides exerting over them a vast humanizing influence? Theatres often have larger audiences than our most popular congregational churches; and, instead of having one preacher, they have many preachers, making sermons for them. The one has a pulpit resembling a box, shutting in the minister from his congregation, and lifting him above them; the other has a pulpit representing the stage of life, and humanity is represented there. The stage is not above us, neither literally nor symbolically. We see ourselves there, and look upon the same world in miniature as that in which we verily live and move. And when the characters differ from ourselves, we know they fit others of the numerous lookers on; if they rise to a Richard, Macbeth, Othello, Lear, Hamlet, still we are in them in some degree. Aye, they excite us fearfully, because we are so much in them, and they in us, in their good and evil passions. From the pulpit, the masses too generally have to listen to abstract theology without life or soul. At the theatre they might not hear such good sermons, but they feel more powerful ones; they might be witnessing vicious performances, but it will touch them more than words of piety from holy men. And it is this fact—that the stage has such an extensive and powerful influence over the millions, who so much need moral and religious agencies to be brought to bear upon them—that should lead our powerful popular preachers to take up the question. They should insist upon the stage fulfilling its mission, or thunder against it. If managers will not give to the drama its proper functions, and the profession will not have regard for itself and society, seeing that they may be such instruments for good or evil, then let the public teachers, with burning words, fire the indignation of the public and force reform. This however applies abroad rather than at home.

Music.

NAPOLEON AND MUSIC.

We are told by Bourrienne, the school-fellow and private secretary of the emperor, that when anything went wrong or some disagreeable thought occupied him Napoleon was in the habit of entering his cabinet uttering a humming sort of noise most unmusical. In this mood he would seat himself by the writing table, poise himself in his chair and lean backwards. A hundred times, says his secretary, have I called out to him to beware of falling heels over head. In this dangerous position he would vent his ill humor against the right arm of his elbow-chair, cutting it with his penknife, which was of no other use to him.

But if the ear of the remoulder of empires was not attuned to sweet sounds it was to grand and solemn ones. The deep sonorous music of the big bells harmonized with the clear metallic tones of the leading and tenor bells, which doubtless reminded him of the booming of cannon and the sound of the martial trumpet for the charge, produced in him a singular effect. His sense of grandeur was touched, his soul charmed with the ringing tones by which cities are woke up to the alarm, as well as solemnly called to the worship of the Creator. In his walks a peal of village bells has often broken off the most serious conversations. He would stop with his companions, least the moving of their feet might cause him the loss of one of the sounds which charmed him, and he was inclined to be angry with Bourrienne for not experiencing the same emotion. On one occasion the influence was so powerful upon him that his voice trembled with feeling as he said, "That recalls to me the first years I passed at Brienne. I was then happy." The music of the bells had called up tender reminiscences of his school, before his life was tarnished by ambition, yet where he first vaguely dreamt of his empire to come. "The bells ceased," says his schoolfellow, "and he, resuming the current of gigantic reverie, would launch into futurity, encircle his head with a diadem and hurl kings from their thrones!" This belongs to the anecdotes of the First Consel, but it would be just as characteristic of Napoleon as the Emperor, for he ever had dreams of diadems to encircle his head and kings to hurl from their thrones, and a peal of bells was a charm to deepen, not break, his "gigantic reveries." Cathedral music would have produced the same effect on Napoleon; not, perhaps, in a courtly congregation, with the eyes of all upon him, for then he would have been self-possessed and cynical. But alone, or with a single companion in the temple of worship, with the solemn immensity of architecture around and above him, a sudden burst from the majestic organ, with a volume of cathedral music would have overwhelmed his soul into a state of awe, charming into repose his own grand tumults.

PRAISE IS WORSHIP.

Prayer is devotional exercise, preaching educational religion, but Praise alone is truly Worship. Undoubtedly prayer belongs to the first duties of man, and theological instruction is very essential, but praise is worship's purest language. The former, reaches after human elevation and protection, the latter rises to the soul's sublimest adoration for Deity. True, there is scarcely any comparison between Apostles and High Priests in ministerial importance, and a choir of singers; but praise to the Creator is a service in which, not only all the congregations of Zion, in every age, in every nation and in every world are supposed to join, but in which the High Priesthood of eternity, equally with the people, take their part. It constitutes a platform of a universal adoration, upon which men and angels represent a grand endless brotherhood: "Ten thousand thousand are their tongues, but all their joys are one."

Congregational singing, therefore, has more than a local institution, and the service of praise has an authority older than our mortality. It may be considered a passage of inspired poetry, but there is also a grand truth in the theme of Job, that the Morning Stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy when the foundations of the earth were laid. Before we read of prayer, or doctrinal theology received a function to perform, the song of praise in heaven began. Creation also culminates with a similar service; for John heard in the consummation of redemption the heavens and the earth singing their new song of praise to the Lamb. The poet well strikes the endless theme when he says:

"My days of praise shall ne'er be past,
While life and thought and being last,
Or immortality endures."

God would fulfill his grand designs, whether we prayed or not; and humanity would be blessed, whether we invoked blessings upon it or held our peace. But what an everlasting theology, and what a divine theme of worship we have in that little hymn?—

"Earth, with her ten thousand flowers,
"Air with all its beams and showers,
"Heaven's infinite expanse,
"Ocean's resplendant countenance,
"All around, and all above,
Hath this record—God is love."

The voices of all the universe will swell that theme in choral music, illustrating how broadly congregational is the worship of praise to God, who is love, and whose ultimatum is peace on earth and good will among men.

LINES TO ALBINA.

This little card on which is traced,
The image of a rose,
Was given me by one who shared
My joys and deepest woes.
It is a cherished, priceless gift,
A token dearly prized,
An emblem of the life of one
My heart has idolized.

I'll place it with my choicest books,
There shall it linger long,
And mark the place where I may gaze
On a fav'rite Author's song.
And when bright words, and noble thoughts
Kindle my soul with glow
I'll think my wife, of a sweeter rose
Than is traced on the card below.

Yes, dear to me are the little gifts
That richer men oft spurn.
They speak to me of the honest love
A humble life may earn
I will gather them up as flowers that bloom
Beside the pathway of life,
Leaves of affection, wafted from home
And kissed by the breath of a wife.

MENTAL PHILOSOPHY.

BY JOHN NICHOLSON.

Continued.

ORGANIC QUALITY AS AFFECTING MENTALITY.

Man is a compound; he is not only mental, but also physical. Had he been purely a mental being, he would not have required a temporal body. Were we thoroughly conversant with the laws of our being, we would doubtless discover a perfect reciprocity in our mental and physical conditions. Physical organic quality affects mentality and is consequently indicative of character. In the vegetable as well as the Animal kingdom where power is manifested the organic quality is close, tough and strong, as instanced in the huge tree that rears aloft its outspreading load of heavy branches, the lion, the elephant, tiger etc., and so with any other quality as well as power. The shape of a person's head, other conditions not considered, is no criterion by which to correctly judge character. A man may have a very large head with the bumps in the intellectual region prominent and yet be a dunce; for as the brain is acknowledged to be the organ of the mind it may be flabby, porous or open in texture, and consequently sluggish and imbecile in action: hence a person with a much smaller head, but finer and heavier brain would far outshine him in mental activity and even power.

HOW TO KNOW THE QUALITY OF THE BRAIN.

The practised and keen discriminating eye can determine the quality of the brain from outward signs. Harmony reigns throughout in all the works of the Great Creator, and the most wonderful specimen of his infinite skill is man. What a glorious piece of mechanism he is! so perfect in all his parts. Happiness and glory are his ultimate destiny, and that will have been attained only when every power and faculty he possesses is, like a fine-toned instrument, attuned in perfect harmony; each performing its particular function or functions harmonizing with all the others.

If the texture of a person's hair be smooth, fine and silky and the skin is of a like quality the brain partakes of the same nature, and, with ordinary training, its manifestations will be of a correspondingly refined, tasteful and elegant kind. On the other hand, when the hair is tough, strong and wiry and the skin partakes more or less of the nature of cow-hide, the mental may be powerful but it will be lacking in that refined elegance so charming in all who possess it. The superior susceptibility, refinement, and taste in woman to those qualities displayed in man are manifested in her finer organic quality. There are all the different degrees of quality between the excellent and its opposite, which can only be determined by the studious keen and close observer; time and space will not admit of the writer elaborating the details of any department of the subject in hand.

THE TEMPERAMENTS.

To form a correct opinion of the mental qualities and capabilities of individuals it is necessary that the temperaments should be considered, of which there are three, namely: vital motive and mental. The motive is indicated by large and rather prominent bones and an abundance of fibrous, muscular substances in the system. Those in whom this temperament predominates are generally forcible characters; enterprising, active, daring and resolute. Those in whom the vital temperament predominates are inclined to corpulency, fat, generally good-humored, fond of good-living and can get along without much hard work. The mental temperament is indicated by too exclusive a tendency to purely intellectual pursuits in those in whom it predominates: such are generally slim, delicate and often consumptive. There are all the different degress of compound of the temperaments to be considered, and it takes the nicest discrimination to determine the amount of each. Blessed is he who possesses an equally balanced temperament, for he possesses the best facilities for becoming great, good, useful and consequently happy.

THE PUBLIC WANT.

ODDITIES AND HUMBUGS OF LIFE No. 2.

No one need be surprised that I found editors willing to shed their last drop (of ink) in special aid of the want so "long felt in this department," and which a special providence, with an eye to the general advancement of the universe, had undoubtedly raised them up to meet, when all our public institutions are based on an appreciation of some "great public wants." Railways are built, canals are dug, docks are laid out, to meet a great public want, at least that is all they are ever built for, according to prospectuses. The shareholders, of course, "want" nothing. The directors "want" nothing. The printer who gets up the prospectuses "wants nothing." "A public want" has swallowed up their souls and left them ready to die as directors on fifty dollars a day, or to languish out their existence in the painful reception of two hundred per cent. premiums. That the public may have its railways, its canals or its docks, they are willing to receive any dividend, however heavy, or fill any sinecure however useless. These facts are, or ought to be, a weighty rebuke to the argurers of the degeneracy of our species.

In further proof yet of the general tendency towards spontaneous benevolence, on the part of the prime movers in big things generally in the world, we cannot pass along without including in the list members of Parliament, or Congress, Prime Ministers, and Presidents. Was there ever one of these public martyrs to legislative honors that would have taken upon himself public distinction, "naturally so distasteful to him," but for "a deep sense of the requirements of his country." See how reluctantly they all go into office, and see how gladly they all leave it! The hope of some day retiring from public life is the only thing that supports them in their sufferings. The only reason why they do not all go into retirement at once is because they don't wish to destroy its chastity by taking their unworthy natures there too soon.

If there be not enough reckless benevolence in the various Parliaments, Congresses and Diets to save society, we have the military world to fall back upon. The number of immortal men, in every land, who, from time immemorial, have endured military rank, solely and entirely to save their country, and without the slightest reference to any honor or dignity to be obtained thereby, proves how alarmingly united mankind are on this question. Don't they die all the time for "glory?" and don't that always mean their country's, and not their own? Did any one ever die for a Colonelcy or a Major-Generalship? Never! The united histories of the world cannot prove such a case.

These multiplied evidences then, from the schoolmaster to the legislator, of the disposition of the world generally to throw itself away, and use itself up, in the meeting of "public wants," has gone far to convince Quiz that luckily he has found his way to one of the purest-minded of worlds ever destined to practise on benevolent principles; and to such an extent is he impressed with its self-sacrificing spirit, that he is convinced that nothing would ever have induced it to become a world at all, but the necessity it felt under of meeting some "great public want," long felt in this portion of the universe.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XIX.

RETIREMENT FROM THE STAGE.

There was a knock at the door of the music room, where the lovers still sat in conversation.

"Come in," responded Sir Walter Templar, and their master, the illustrious composer, entered.

"Ha! Spontini. Is it you?"

"Yes, child; and I suppose Spontini is no more welcome than any other rude intruder! Eh? But, Signor Walter, these love-gossipings are robbing us. They sprite away yourself and Terese from everyone but yourselves. Fie, fie, Signor! You rob me of my pupil and Rome of her star. It has been dark since she last flashed a blaze of triumph, and Rome clamors for her rising again."

"Now, now, Spontini, don't feign anger with us for what you yourself brought about. Did you not plan the whole? Did you not bring Terese to blaze the glory of her gifts on Rome to end in these love-gossipings? Did you not design and superintend her opera for the same purpose?" retorted Walter, banteringly.

"Oh, but I am angry, Signor Walter. I am very angry, child Yes, yes; it was Spontini who arranged it all, as you say; but do you think that I have no self-pride in my pupil's glory? You rob us all and steal from art to lavish on love. Fie, fie, Signor Walter! I say this is not fair."

"Do not scold us, Spontini," Walter said, conciliatory, "I suppose they have been teasing you for the re-engagement of Terese."

"Oh, 'tis well for you to hide and beat the hornet's nest about my head. Terese's great triumph at the close of her engagement provokes the fashionable mob for her re-appearing. I tell you, Signor Walter, Spontini has the hornet's nest about him. There is the opera house and a fashionable mob at this very moment besieging Spontini's quiet villa—Orsini, Baglioni, Cariati, this Sir Herbert Blakely and—and—I say 'tis not fair, Signor Walter, to rob me of my pupil—to rob me of my share of laurels from her triumphs, and then have me mobbed thus."

The gentle pupil stole up to the side of her illustrious master, and, taking his hand, winningly said:

"Dear maestro, I know you have cause to be angry with your pupil, though I think you are not. You are, perhaps, a little vexed that I have not signed the re-engagement. And then, after all your pains in my training—"

"Bah, child! Walter Templar has been your master as much as Spontini."

"But you have been Walter Templar's master, Spontini," interrupted the young nobleman, respectfully.

"You please me, that you acknowledge it, but, still, it is not fair, Signor Walter, to rob all from art to lavish on love."

"Do not envy us the poor time we have dreamed. It has been short enough, dear maestro. Oh! do not hurry me back to the stage. I have no heart for the public yet. I should fail—I am sure I should fail, just now. I have no heart to sing, Spontini," pleaded Terese.

"Tut, tut, child! I know. Signor Walter has shown me his uncle's letter. He will go to Sir Richard Courtney and explain to him. He shall say, 'I love Spontini's gifted pupil—the star of Rome. I love a child of genius,' he shall say, 'and I must wed her.' He shall show his uncle and mother how wrong these family matings are that link hands, not hearts. Sir Richard Courtney is a noble gentleman. I like his letter excellently well. Holy Mother! he is one of those whom nature has created with soul. They are very few, my children. Oh, yes, marble finely chiseled, I know. There is plenty of that, Signor. Bah, child! it has no soul. Sir Richard is a noble gentleman. He shall be convinced;—he shall say, 'I will not make those I love unhappy.'"

"God of my fathers grant it dear maestro!"

"And then, a child of genius, signor Walter! He shall be proud of my pupil, as a mate for his nephew. Genius is the mate for kings, Sir Walter, and your uncle shall say his nephew must marry Spontini's pupil. Spontini's honor is concerned. You are responsible to him, Signor. I took Terese as my ward as well as my pupil; for there was fire around the child. Spontini saw it. You have said, Signor Walter, you love my pupil. You must marry her whom you love."

"Press not so upon me, Spontini," Walter answered gravely. "You do not doubt me. Do not spur me when you know I need it not."

"Well, well, child, I do not doubt you. You will make my pupil your wife: that is, it—Holy Mother!—how these crosses in life perplex one!"

"If Walter Templar's will and influence can accomplish it without the betrayal of my family, be assured, Spontini, that Terese will be my wife, and proudly presented to my family and class as Lady Templar."

"Oh, Signor, Spontini is satisfied of that, or he would not have lent his countenance in the matter. And now, Signor Walter, be so good as to decide when my pupil shall shine in Rome again."

"You heard Terese's wish, Spontini."

"Bah! 'Tis your will and pleasure that decides for my pupil. Fie, fie! to think to cozen me, child. I must know, Signor Walter, when you have decided Terese shall shine again in Rome. I must take the answer to the Opera House which is beseiging Spontini's retirement; and these mobbing aristocrats must be driven from my door. Now, pray tell me, Signor Walter, when shall my pupil shine again in Rome?"

"Not until I have made her Lady Templar, my good Spontini."

"Holy Mother hear him! Not until Terese is Lady Templar; and then he would not let her sing upon the public stage, were all the crowned heads in the world to ask it. Heavens! how arrogant these aristocrats are! You glory in art, Signor Walter, and yet I know none haughtier in caste of aristocracy than you. Your wife never would sign the re-engagement that the manager has brought for the twentieth time for my pupil to sign. When shall she sign it, Signor, I say."

"Oh, dear, kind maestro," coaxed his gifted pupil, "let it be as Walter wishes. He goes to England directly. In a few weeks we shall know the result. As his wife, as you say, I should cease to be the prima donna; but, if I am never that then,—oh then, dear maestro, I will be all you wish me to be in devotion to art;—Terese will know no wedded life but that of art. One wish for this life to be her priestess;—one wish for the next," and she glanced her meaning with an expression of supreme love to meet the yearning soul that beamed in Walter Templar's dark, flashing eye.

"Nay, nay, child. Spontini does not wish it so. Holy Mother, must genius ever light her own funeral pile? Must her divine fires ever consume herself to give her glory to the world? Crucified! crucified! 'Tis the world's history. Crucified, ever crucified to wear the crown! Take her, Signor Walter. Make her your wife. Rob me of my pupil and Rome of her star. This crucifying would seal on her another ordination of gifts. 'Twould endow her with tragic powers. She should not only be a queen of song but a queen of tragedy But I will not have my pupil crucified. Let art loose her. Make her your wife, Signor Walter. I will not have my pupil crucified!"

The illustrious son of art left the presence of the lovers, bearing with him a tender and saddened spirit from his realization of the too general experience.

CHAPTER XX.

DONNA CLARA GARCIA.

The management of the Opera House was in a tempest of rage, the green-room in excitement and Donna Clara Garcia in ecstasy at the refusal of Terese to enter into a re-engagement.

"Ah!" said the re-throned prima donna to the gay dissolute Orsini, who had been the foremost cavalier in her train before the short reign of the new queen of song—

"Ah! Count, Signora Terese is wise to retire on a triumph and in the first plucking of her laurels. You pleasure-hunters are stupidly fickle. Count—ever must have something fresh—like children delighted only with new toys."

"Charming slanderer!" said the young noble, with his fascinating smile.

"The quality is not all the charm, though I own you are all monstrously fastidious from very satiety."

"It is not every lady, Signora, that can lend to slander such witchery as yourself."

"I tell you, Count, we must shine with never a cloud in our sky. O yes; and shine brighter and brighter, or our light soon wanes."

"Your shining, lady, was always unobscured."

"And yet, Sir Count, the coming of a sudden comet will bring the giddy world out of doors to point at as something wonderful. Then they forget their fixed stars. For a time, Count, only for a time, because they are fixed stars."

"You do us that justice, lady," observed Orsini, eagerly, for he was courting reconciliation.

"Flatter not your vanity, Signor Count. I was but doing justice to ourselves. We force the homage we receive. The society is poor in its acknowledgments of merit, but rich in egotism. When it flatters self-vanity you note us."

"How flatter our vanity, Donna Clara? In what point is our egotism touched?"

"Why, Count, simply this: we shine—we please; the fashionable world only demands pleasure; we supply that demand and thus gratify its egotism. We shine, and when the world acknowledges it—generally forced by surprise at first—then your vanity stands patron to us. You make us by your favor."

"You are bitter, signorina."

"Perhaps so, Count. But I take the unction to my vanity that you have salved on yours. We make ourselves, dear Count. Rome has been at my feet too, and because Rome was there even the fastidious Orsini knelt," and the lady laughed a little rich laugh that fell in mockery on the ear of the gay courtier of the operatic queen.

"I swear by your matchless talents and beauty I have ever been at your feet, fair lady."

"Saving, my dear Orsini, when you rushed to throw yourself at the feet of the new prima donna. She was fresh, Count, but this fresh object of your gallantries was absolutely indifferent to the irresistible Orsini. I pity you. I do indeed pity you, believe me. What a dreadful shock your vanity must have sustained."

"You exaggerate, Signorina, a commonplace offering to an artiste certainly of excellent voice and talents. She forced the prima donna-ship of the house—by this freshness, if you please, which you say charms us," returned the Count, referring to her own eclipse by Terese to pass off his own ill-fated love passage with our heroine, upon which he was very sore. But he was unwise to further provoke the prima donna, who retorted stingingly:

"Indeed, my dear Count, you throw a new light upon the matter. A commonplace offering to an artiste of excellent voice and talents! How beautiful! Romantic simplicity! My dear Orsini, it is a very fitting view to take of your unfortunate love-making to this peasant girl whom Spontini has brought us."

"But you must admit, Donna Clara, that Terese has voice and talents."

You insult me, Count. Have you not said she forced the prima donna-ship of the house from me—Donna Clara Garcia! I acknowledge she has voice and talents of no mean order, or she would never have held my sceptre for a night. Heigho! I will grant her charm was freshness. Have I not held the throne more years than she has months?"

"Surely, then, Orsini among the crowd might applaud or throw a flower."

"Ah, my dear Count, love epistles and diamond coronets are not commonplace offerings. 'Tis said that Orsini was so madly in love with this peasant girl of excellent voice and talents that he would have made her his countess. Was that simply throwing the flower?"

Donna Garcia was relentless in pursuing her retaliation for his desertion of her in favor of a rival sister of art. He had been foremost in turning the public homage in Terese's favor and his passion and vanity so tantalized by her total indifference to all her noble courtiers that he had offered to make her Countess. To win that which many pursue and cannot reach—to catch in the chase the charming creature that flees away from us, what will a man of ardent nature not do? Surely to make a beautiful, gifted woman like Terese a Countess was not inconsistent even in Orsini.

The Count replied not to the last sting of the jealous and resentful Spanish lady, but he bit his lip till the blood came and was thankful for the opportune approach of a crowd of gallants to pay court to the reinstated queen of the opera house. She treated them now with coyness, now with sharp thrusts for the preference given her rival, but with fierce secret exultation at the return of the homage of the fashionable world. There was, however, one in that opera house whom Donna Clara Garcia did not thus treat. It was Farinelli, the primo tenore. Several times she exchanged with him a few words, and then there was in her a marvelous transformation from her haughty coquetry to one of gentleness and anxious desire. Donna Clara Garcia loved the foster-brother of the Hebrew maiden.

Orsini took Sir Herbert Blakely by the arm and led him aside, leaving the lady to his gay companions. The Englishman deemed the act an invitation to privy conference and silently waited for the Count to open.

"Well, Blakely?" queried the Italian. But the Englishman was too prudent to take the initiatory, and returned:

"Well, Orsini?"

The Count saw he had to shape the matter.

"Your countryman, Sir Herbert, has put us all hors du combat—again self-appropriated all."

"'Tis not courteous of him, is it Count? But you do not hold me responsible for my countryman, I hope."

"Don't play so shyly with the game, Blakely," returned the Italian, impatiently. "It needed not much sagacity to see that from the moment you discovered the identity of your young countrymen you changed your design to shield them. 'Twould have pleased you better to have seen them pinked with our sharp swords. I know you hate them, and especially this young fellow-pupil of Terese. Indeed I suspect you also fear him. Your reason is a secret I have no wish to pry into."

"Supposing I grant that I would not shield them," conceded the Englishman; "that is not sufficient cause for me to challenge my countrymen. We gave the first provocation—treated them as artists, haughtily commanded them from the presence of our gay company, and they were English noblemen and returned with spirit. We cannot challenge them for our own mistake, Count."

"Ah! but by heaven!" exclaimed the fiery Italian, "we have cause enough for quarrel with this fellow, especially now we find him of our own class. Has he not been a barrier around Terese, so that none could approach her, and the cause of the repulse and mortification of those who have attempted it?"

"I will not dispute such an authority as yourself on that point," said Sir Herbert, spurring on the rejected suitor to his own purpose.

"Our prima donnas," continued Orsini, "are public property; but he has made her his exclusively. By heaven, Blakely, I think we are all insulted, slighted, treated as nothings, by your haughty countryman and a coy peasant girl."

"Oh, Sir Walter Templar is haughty enough to do all he has done—treat us as though we were not, make his beautiful, gifted peasant girl as indifferent as himself, and bear her off from an admiring crowd in her moment of triumph."

"To make her his wife, think you, Sir Herbert."

"I think not, Count. He is betrothed to his cousin and I think I know him and his family well enough to answer that he will not betray them to marry a peasant girl prima donna No reflection on you, Orsini."

"I take it as none, Blakely. But will the coy bird consent to be his mistress? Refuse the title I was fool enough to offer her for that honor!"

"Why, Count, I thought you not such a novice in the tender passion. I told you I heard Farinelli say Terese's opera concealed her own history. Her youth, coyness, indifference to others—charms enough, I own, are all in his favor!"

The Englishman judged as a libertine, and there is too much ground for such a judgment, for the very virtues and trust of woman give the wand of power to the seducer's hand; but our hero was not of that class.

"I can tell you a secret, Count," he added, "which I suspect is the immediate cause of Terese refusing to re-engage with the management. Sir Walter Templar returns to England."

"Ah! And Terese goes with him?"

"A wager on it, Count, that Rome loses the prima donna for London to have her reign."

"I feel tempted to cross swords with your countryman," observed Orsini with the manner of one who was more than tempted—eager for the encounter.

"Oh! I shall not strike up your swords, Orsini."

"A duel may be some hindrance in his way, Blakely."

"Not unlikey, Count. We all know your reputation and skill as a swordsman," and then he added,

"If you wish, I think I can arrange it, Count."

"Ah! say you so?"

"There is in Rome a certain old ruined monastery that has for those young men a family reminiscence. The uncle of one and the father of the other in those old ruins made a compact of friendship."

"You seem well posted in their family history, Blakely."

"It has interested me to study it, Orsini. Well, those young Englishmen have been in the habit of visiting those ruins."

"And you think—By Jupiter! the very spot, if we can trace them there."

"My secretary informs me that for several days past the fellow pupil of Terese nightly visits the old ruins alone."

"Ah! then by the patron saint of that same old monastery, we will make his solitude agreeable," exclaimed the Italian, with fierce satisfaction.

Just then Farinelli rushed through the greenroom, flushed with passion and jealousy, yet with the marks of mental agony lining his face. The management had just informed him of the retirement of his foster-sister from the stage.

CHAPTER XXI.

IN THE TEMPTER'S NET.

Snap immediately followed the foster-brother, but with a mien so soft and unruffled that it disturbed not so much as the atmosphere. He of all the rest seemed the one who had not noticed Farinelli, and to all appearance was most uninterested in him. As for his leaving the green-room immediately after him, it could have been with no possible intent of following the singer, and then any one would have wagered against any odds that the snail-like Snap would never dream of keeping up with the excited Farinelli.

"A moment," said Sir Herbert hurriedly to Orsini, and he made after his mentor.

But it was more than five minutes before he could even overtake his secretary, who kept at a given distance that varied scarcely an inch from Farinelli; yet the singer dashed along with the steam of the boiling blood that gushed from his jealous heart. Seemingly however, Snap was walking easily along without effort, and none but a close observer, struck with the relative distance so exactly kept up between the two individuals, whose movements formed such contrast, would have thought the follower was walking with more than very common speed or imagined him to be following. Yet his steps were nearly as quick and certainly longer than the ones taken by Farinelli, for the appearance of slowness was not through a lack of rapid action, but in his soft, long-striding, regular-drawn-out undemonstrativeness. And thus it was with him in everything. He traveled faster and accomplished more than almost any other in what he undertook, for all his seeming slowness. Sir Herbert at length overtook him, well-nigh winded.

"Snap, I want a word with you."

"When I return, Sir Herbert," he smoothly answered, paying no more attention to his master. He was concentrating himself in one direction.

"I have learned that Templar is making arrangements to leave Rome in three days."

"Ah! that is important," Snap answered, but still no excitement, still no breaking in his even course, which was on—right on.

"I thought it might help you, Snap."

"It will."

"You are for bringing Farinelli to the point?"

"Yes. Now return to Orsini."

Sir Herbert did so and the mentor continued on, right on, long and even in his course; undemonstrative in his manner.

When Farinelli came within sight of Spontini's villa he slackened his pace, and his movements and actions became spasmodic. He had obeyed the same impulse that one does who mounts his horse under an agonized state of mind, and rides as though the very furies pursued and lashed him into wilder course. But the foster-brother was now near enough the spot that daily drew him under its fatal influence and less charged with his own electricity—near enough for the tantalizing torture to which he subjected himself. We are like the poor moth, ever fluttering around the flame that burns us. He seldom entered the beautiful villa where he would have been cordially welcomed and treated with sisterly affection by Terese; but the old confidence and companionship which existed between them when she was a girl and he plain Beppo—her Beppo—her champion—her slave—no longer existed. Now she was only his sister, who received him like a woman receiving affectionately her natural brother, but no more than a brother.

Often he would lean against some tree for hours, gazing forlornly on Spontini's Paradise in the distance, where dwelt with him his two pupils and young De Lacy. Sometimes he would brood over doubts of Sir Walter Templar making Terese his wife, and that even made his spirit fiercer than all beside. Often he scourged himself with wishes that she was his wife, and then he would find comfort in the imagination of a little Terese again dancing on his knee and then a fairy girl taking her mother's place and caressing him fondly as her own Beppo, as she had done before, or scolding him with gentleness and singing to him to drive away the evil spirit, until he sobbed again as when a boy—baptized unto repentance in his own tears; but even with this consolation there would come self-wailings that he should never know wife or child of his.

The foster-brother at length stopped and reclined against a tree exhausted, and wiped the perspiration from his brow—more the sweat of agony that his burning soul oozed out than from his hurried walk. Snap also had slackened his pace and for a moment lifted his hat from his over-heated temples; for even Snap could not "keep cool."

"Nothing to her—nothing to her now!" wailed the poor foster-brother. "The manager, the greenroom, the fashionable gossips all know of Terese before Beppo. No, I am not Beppo. I wear a better sounding name. When I was Beppo 'twas her Beppo. Then I was everything to her; nothing to her now—nothing to her now! Holy mother, I ask not to be her husband; I would have her Sir Walter Templar's wife, for she loves him, and I should be so happy. Beppo would be so happy to see her his wife."

But the hot tears that coursed down his face, burning furrows as they rolled, told how much of happiness there was to the foster-brother in the thought of her being the wife of another, but it also told how entire was his love that wished her another's for her happiness.

"But O! I ask to be what I once was—her Beppo—her slave!"

The tempter was near the distracted foster-brother! His coming was not harsh but mesmeric. The analetic Snap, like Mesmer and others recognized the subtle agencies of nature, and without comprehending in exact science used them. He had often observed the fascination he could throw around others and what a concentrated will had enabled him to exercise over the minds he sought to influence. The presence of a human being may be felt sometimes when not seen and by the side of one who sleeps affect the sleeper; every one has felt a hundred times others looking back at them and proven it by looking back themselves. So Snap now made his own presence felt and made it insinuating. The foster-brother partook something of the other's calmness and cynical spirit.

"Why has she rejected the prima donna-ship of Rome when she has just reached her first great triumph? What is she going to do? Where is she going to? Bah! I will ask the gossips of the city; for I know nothing of my foster-sister now."

"Shall I answer your question, my good Farinelli?"

The singer bounded from his reclining position from the tree, and his appearance and feelings were those of a man who thought the arch fiend had suddenly come to his elbow to answer him.

"I am flesh and blood, my good Farinelli."

The singer gradually became reconciled to the presence of the individual who was regarding him with a sympathetic and kindly smile. There was no sinister spirit manifested. Snap was scientific in his spirit. He was solving a problem. It was a human one; and he solved his problems in sympathy and not ill-nature.

"Shall I answer your question, my good Farinelli?" he repeated.

"Well, signor, if you can, though I like not your intrusion."

"Be not offended, Signor Farinelli. You are on a public road and were only oblivious to my approach because not sufficiently attentive to surrounding objects. I overheard your questions, and, as they were asked of the gossips of Rome, I proposed to answer them."

"No trifling with me, signor," broke in the singer impatiently, "Do so, I say, if you can."

"I can, my good signor. Your foster-sister is going to England."

"Ah! How know you?"

"Because I know that Sir Walter Templar returns to his native land."

"Yes, yes, signor, I know he does; but when?"

"Has not Terese refused to re-engage? But my information is more exact. In three days, my good Farinelli, he leaves Rome for England."

"Then my foster-sister goes with him. She is to be his wife, signor. Well, I am glad; but wish she had not left it to a stranger to tell me."

"Would she not have told you, my good Farinelli, were that the case?"

"Ah! what mean you, signor?" the foster-brother demanded, excitedly, for his assertion that Terese was to be our hero's wife was made more to hide his own misgivings than from assurance.

"During Sir Walter Templar's association with your foster-sister, have you never heard of a certain betrothal between him and his cousin?" asked the tempter, and then added, cynically, "Oh, I am foolish to ask. That of course has been hid."

"There you wrong Sir Walter Templar, signor. He has never hid it. I think he designs not wrong to my foster-sister, and, though I am not in their secrets, believe he will make her his wife. By Him who made me, if he designed dishonorably by her—Bah! I am babbling to a stranger. Good day, signor. I like not meddling in my foster-sister's affairs," he said, making away.

"Be not churlish, my good Farinelli. Read this letter. It will convince you that Sir Walter Templar is going direct to England to marry his cousin Eleanor Courtney. I like not my words to be challenged without giving demonstration:" and the secretary-mentor of Sir Herbert handed him Wortley's letter which he had with him for that purpose. The post-office stamps-both of England and Italy were on the back of the sheet; and it was evident to the agitated reader that it was a bona fide letter from a legal adviser to his client.

When the foster-brother had read the letter, he returned it, his countenance frightfully pale and haggard, his manner agitated, observing—

"Yes, Signor, I grant that is presumptive evidence that Sir Walter Templar is returning to England to marry his cousin."

"And your foster-sister?" querried the Tempter.

"I grant that I believe it will affect her happiness; but it is no evidence that she is going with him."

"Her refusal to sign the re-engagement," suggested the other.

"Has no reference to the letter I have read, Signor," answered the singer, trying to argue that down which troubled him so much.

"You reason well, my good Farinelli. That letter proves only what it refers to and no more; but shall I prove the other two points started, and something besides, which the foster-brother of Terese ought to prevent? Shall I make it clear to you, my good Farinelli?"

"Holy Mother, I hope you cannot."

"When I informed you that Sir Walter Templar was going to England and in three days would leave Rome, what conclusion did you jump at?" pursued the Tempter. "Why, that Terese had refused the re-engagement to go also: just what I concluded; for it is so relative."

"True, true: both coming together, it can have no other meaning," conceded the singer.

"Now the letter read proves not that, but it does something beyond it."

"Holy Mother!" the foster-brother exclaimed, fresh doubts rushing upon him at every step.

"You concluded, besides, that she was going to England to become his wife. That letter shows that his uncle has written for his return, that his family is making preparations for marriage, not to Terese, but to his cousin Eleanor Courtney."

"Yes, yes, Signor, I read it. Torture me not with its repetition. The letter tells no more."

"But I have made an addendum: Sir Walter Templar leaves Rome in three days. You will find it so."

"You have repeated that also, Signor."

"But the inference, my good Farinelli. He is going not to marry your foster-sister, but his cousin and betrothed."

"Well, well, go on!" and the tortured foster-brother, still forced on with eagerness, that which his jealous mind formed as the sequel, but which he ran from and towards with dismay.

"And yet we both agree that your foster-sister has refused the re-engagement at the opera house to go with or follow him to England. But still more certain, my good Farinelli, I heard Spontini intimate as much to the management in his embarrassed excuses for Terese. In fact, my good Farinelli, the composer was very agitated as though much troubled."

"Mother of God! Spontini himself cannot think my foster-sister is going as his mistress. The maestro's countenance was an assurance to me. O, if he doubts too— Holy Virgin! she is too good, too innocent, too pure for that. O! you know her not, Signor, or you would not conclude that."

And he who, when a boy, was her Beppo, wailed, and his manner was that of one who would have groveled at the Tempter's feet for proof that Terese would not become Sir Walter Templar's mistress.

"I will take your knowledge of her, my good Farinelli, not mine, as her standard," continued the Tempter, knowing the singer was completely under his influence. "And as for Sir Walter Templar, I know his character much better than you do. I have studied him as one of my problems."

"And you think not honorably of him, Signor?"

"Nay, nay, my good Farinelli. I have even a much higher opinion of him than you have. I measure him by a very high standard, but I temper my judgment with worldly wisdom and experience. You fully understand the meaning of sophistry, do you not?"

"I believe so, Signor," the other answered.

"Well, now, my good Farinelli, the sophistry of lovers is matchless. O Cupid is a blind god, believe me; and blindfolds all who submit to him; and if, when blinded, his victims wander into a labyrinth—"

"Holy Mother! I am lost, lost;—no finding the way out!" burst from the agonized soul of one who was hopelessly wandering in its windings and bewilderments.

"But that is not all, my good Farinelli. I was about to show you the lovers sophistry. They take for their motto, 'The union of hearts before the union of hands;'—a very good motto; and when the latter follows unexceptionable. But when the union of hands cannot follow, then comes the lovers sophistry: they lay down their own code of laws, excellent in the abstract but not sanctioned by society, pure in theory, but pernicious in practice."

"Mother of God! my foster-sister Sir Walter Templar's mistress!"

"Ah! my good Farinelli, you must not use such repulsive epithets as mistress and seducer."

"But they are the names, Signor. God! I shall go mad in looking at them, they are so repulsive."

"Have you never heard them till now? What, are you holier than the rest of us that they shock you so?"

"No, no; not until they touched my foster-sister did they seem so hideous."

"But, my good Farinelli, I said you must not use such repulsive names. They are not in the vocabulary of this lover's sophistry. It is wife and husband—wife and husband by holier, higher, diviner laws and sanctions than the formalities and cruel arrangements of society that link hands, not hearts."

"Yes, yes, I know that is the sophistry. Holy Virgin! watch over my foster-sister!"

"You have judged wrongly, Farinelli, believe me, in thinking your foster-sister safe, because she is pure and good and Sir Walter Templar honorable and noble in his nature. To me, this omens their fall. Why, my dear Signor, my philosophy is, that it is the best and not the worst part of humanity that err."

"O, Terese, I would we both had died before we saw him," still wailing from the tortured heart of the Beppo of happier days, and still the tempter pursued his subtle course.

"Now, my good Farinelli, your foster-sister is a child of genius; white as the lily in her innocence; trustful as woman's nature; but she is also trustful as the orphan who loves and finds father, mother, and her all—in the hands of that one like the plastic wax. Can you not see how much all this fits her for the union of hearts and wife by the higher laws?"

"Curse him! Oh, that my dagger was in his heart!"

"Nay, nay; Sir Walter Templar never will be a seducer. He will be Terese's husband. Himself of a poetic type, he is a fitting mate for her. He is just the man to break down the altars which the artificial, the selfish set up, and in their place establish those which nature's fitness ordains."

"Plausible fiend! 'tis mistress to me. Sooner would I see my foster-sister in her grave than Sir Walter Templar's mistress. Oh, I will plunge my dagger into his heart before she shall be that."

"Did I not just now say, my good Farinelli, that the lover's sophistry was excellent in theory but pernicious in practice!" unruffledly replied the tempter.

"Sooner see her in the grave!—in the grave sooner than that!" moaned the tempted soul.

"Yes she would be his mistress. I agree with you, and society would call her children illegitimate and nameless, except in the tell-tale slander of bearing their mother's name, Even at the best—not the worst, my good Farinelli—they would be in parentage outcast, blushing over the history of their mother, if they knew it, and concealing it from others as the children of the hangman would their parentage."

"I will kill him!"

"Do nothing rashly, my good Farinelli."

"I will kill him!"

"Prevent your foster-sister from becoming the mistress of Sir Walter Templar. Nothing more!"

"I will kill him!"

"Go to your foster-sister, and remonstrate with her against becoming his mistress."

"I will kill him!" was still the fierce response.

"Tell her how society, not how love, will view it."

"I will kill him! And now, Signor, leave me. We shall meet again. No more now. I think you mean well to me and my foster-sister; but I see you wish him out of your way, too. Be satisfied, Signor, I will kill him!"

The idea had taken such possession of the foster-brother's mind that it filled it, and the resolve calmed him and blunted his mental agony.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket: that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific, having made me often a mere whisperer.

N. P. WILLIS.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of.

A SONG.

I'll sing you a song, my love,
I'll sing you a song,
And it's all about the old summer times,
When the days were long.
It's all about the old sunny times,
When the flowers grew,
When we walked underneath the linden-trees,
I and you.

And I'll sing it so sweet, my love
I'll sing it so sweet,
That you'll think of the pleasant scented hour
When we used to meet.
You'll think of the leafy laden band,
Where the blossoms blew,
When we talked underneath the linden-trees,
I and you.

And I'll sing it so sad, my love,
I'll sing it so sad,
That you'll think my poor heart's full of pain,
When it's only glad.
You'll think that it's full of foolish pain
When it's only true
To the days when we walked by the linden-trees,
I and you.

A STORY OF EVENING SHADOWS.

It is a tale, this that I am about to tell, of good deeds revealed, of good instincts roused, of a good work done, and a good result attained, and all through Evening Shadows.

My story begins at the time, some years ago, when, as a single man, I was living in a narrow and rather crowded street in one of the old parts of London—one of those streets where very decent houses are mixed with much poorer ones—and in one of the best and cleanest of which I occupied two rooms; a bedroom and a sitting-room. Having at that time, as I have now, a great dread of noise while at work, I made use of the back room as my studio, sleeping in the front of the house, which was quiet at night but not in the daytime, by reason of the day traffic. My painting-room, then, was on the second floor, and at the back of the house, and as there was a street running at an acute angle to that in which I lived, and joining it only a few yards higher up, it will easily be understood that the backs of the houses in this slanting thoroughfare, which was called appropriately enough, Cross street, were in tolerably close proximity to my painting-room window. I have been thus exact in describing the topography of my place of abode, because then you will be better able to understand how it happened that my attention was directed to the circumstances which I am about to detail.

You will be able to understand how it was that, sitting, especially during the short days, as the dusk was beginning to fall, looking meditatively out of the window and thinking of my work, my attention would often be drawn, almost without my knowledge, to some of the windows in the slanting street which I have described, and how I found myself not unfrequently speculating about some of the inhabitants of the rooms which were separated from that in which I was sitting, by so small a space.

I augured the better of the occupants of the room opposite, from the fact that I could see through the lower panes of the window the leaves and branches of a great big fuchsia spread out fan-wise on a wooden frame. Other little contrivances and adornments there were about this poor casement, which, though of the cheapest and most twopenny order of decorative art, showed yet some love of the gentler side of things, and a wish to put a good face on poverty.

But it is, as I have already said, towards dusk and in the evening that my attention has been oftenest fixed on the window which I have been describing. It is then that, the room being lighted up, the shadows of things and persons within it are thrown upon the blind, with a clearness and distinctness which those who have never observed such matters would hardly credit. The shadows tell me, then, that the room is tenanted by a husband and wife, both young, I am certain. The man, as I gather from his position, and what I take to be the shadow of a tissue-paper screen, behind which he stoops over his labor, is a poor drudging engraver for whom the days are not long enough, sitting cramped up at his patient toil through many hours of the night. As I watch him, he will rise and stretch back his head to relieve the muscles of his neck, and then I see that the shadow thrown on the blind is that of a young figure, spare but well made. The light shows me also that he wears a beard; it is a very strong light indeed, and this makes me more sure than ever that he is an engraver. The shadow of his wife is there beside him—almost always. How she watches over and tends him, how she hangs over his chair, or kneels beside him! I had never, at the time I speak of, seen her, but I could not help fancying that she was pretty and good enough to light up a darker room than that in which she lives, and to make her husband's life of toil—if he can keep it up—not only bearable but delightful.

If he can keep it up—but can he? His shadow is all that I have seen of him, but it looks like the shadow of one in delicate health. I never miss him from his place at night, and I can see the edge of his blind by which he works at his window all day. "If he sits drudging there," thought I, "he will surely, as is the case in all excess, defeat his own object and end in being disabled altogether."

It was not long before I began to fear that what I had apprehended had taken place. There came a day when the blind was not drawn up to let in the light on the engraver's work, but remained drawn down the whole day. It would be difficult to express how anxiously I longed for the evening, and the shadows which should tell me more.

That evening the light was burning in the room as usual, but the straight-edge of the engraver's blind was not seen cutting against it. There was the shadow of but one person, it was that of a woman, and as the figure which cast it moved so quietly about, I could make out that she was pouring out drugs and mixing the different compounds, wanted in a sick-room, by the light of the lamp. Sometimes she would pause in these occupations and look towards one end of the room, where I concluded the bed was placed; and sometimes I could even imagine, but this must have been pure fancy, that, looking still in the same direction, her lips would move at times, and that she was speaking. I could even see her tasting the food she was mixing, with her head a little on one side; altering and tasting it often before she carried it across the room to where, I felt sure, the sick man lay. So much will shadows tell.

From my front window I can see a long way up and down the street, even to that corner where the early breakfast depôt is found every morning—a poor stall enough, and driving a poor business, I should have thought; a business, however, in which I am so deeply interested that my first morning act is to go to the window and see if the poor old proprietor has got a customer—nay, once I put on a pilot-coat and a wideawake hat to appear in character, and purchased a cup of his coffee, which was a sound coffee enough, though a little gritty, and perhaps a thought weak. Enough of that. I can see to the coffee stall one way, and nearly as far the other, and at the back I command a bit of a court, two mewses and a half, and, by great dislocation of neck, a little scrap of Brewer-street, Golden-square. Now in all these regions which are continually under my eye, I have noticed one constantly pervading presence, one figure which comes upon the scene without fail every day in the year and at all conceivable hours. It is the figure of a tallish gentleman of about five-and-thirty, who stoops a little, has a very round back, wears spectacles, is always dressed in a buttoned black frock-coat, is always in a hurry, always expected anxiously at the houses he visits, and always followed to the door, on coming out again, by some who question him eagerly as he leaves them, and who seem to seek for comfort in his most inscrutable face. Of course I have not watched this gentleman's proceedings long, without coming to the conclusion that it is Mr. Cordial, the parish doctor, whose surgery in Great Pulteney-street I am so often in the habit of passing.

If there had been any previous doubt on my mind as to the state of things in the house opposite, it would at once have been put to flight when, on the day succeeding that evening on which I had watched the engraver's wife in her capacity of nurse, I caught a dark glimpse of this gentleman's head (rather a bald head for so young a man) at the window of the room opposite, which he had come to, to prepare some mixture or other.

"Now here," I thought to myself, "is a pretty business. This is just what I feared. Here is this poor fellow laid up, unable to work, and probably not only ill in body, but harrassed in mind by the consciousness that as long as he is ill, there can be no money coming in to supply the daily expenses which, however poorly they live, he and his wife must of necessity incur."

I thought over this matter, and turned it all sorts of ways, as people who are unlucky enough, or unwise enough, to live alone do turn and twist things, and was so haunted by the thought of what was going on in the room opposite, that in the course of the afternoon I was obliged to go out and take a long walk, in order to fill up the time that must necessarily intervene before the lamp would be lit, and the shadows thrown upon the blind. When I got back from that walk I was in such hot haste for such silent news as I might reasonably hope to gain, that I did not even stay to light my candle, but felt my way as well as I could across the room, and stationed myself at the window.

At first I thought that there were no shadows at all on the white glaring blind, except those of the poor bits of curtain and of the spreading out fuchsia before mentioned, but by-and-by, noticing a small and continually moving shadow mixed up with that of the curtain, and observing that it rose and fell regularly and quickly, I presently connected it with another mass of shade a little above it, and arrived at the conclusion that this last was thrown by a woman's head, and by the moving shadow by her hand, as it rose and fell in the action of working with the needle. It was not long before I found out that my hypothesis was well grounded; for a little while the shadow of the hand was still and that of the head was raised, as if the person whose silhouette lay thus upon the blind was in the act of listening—and then it rose, and I saw the well-known figure of the engraver's wife pass the light, and knew that she had moved towards that quarter of the room in which I had made up my mind that the bed with the sick man in it was placed.

During the greater part of that evening, as I watched, and my occupations were frequently interrupted that I might do so, I made out no shadow but that which I have just mentioned, But, at about nine o'clock, I saw another shadow pass before the blind, and as it was that of a man, I had for a moment the hope that it was cast by the invalid. It was only for a moment, another glance showed me that this person wore no beard, and that there was greater bulk of figure than would have been cast by the poor engraver. I soon concluded that it was the doctor; and if I had any doubt on this subject it was removed when I presently observed the workman-like angle of the elbow made by the shadow as it stood before the light, pouring something into what I suppose, from its size, must have been a teacup.

Twice a day, then. He was ill enough for the doctor to come to him twice a day.

My determination was taken as I made that reflection. I had got wrought up to a great state of interest and suspense about this case which I could hardly explain to myself. I felt a strange longing to know more of it, and I came to the resolution—it was like what might have been expected of a man half-cracked with living alone—that I would go out then and there, waylay the doctor as he came away from his patient, and ask him all about it.

I had lost some time in reflection, and when I looked hastily across before leaving my room I did not see any shadows on the blind, yet it was reasonable to suppose that I might still catch the doctor in the street; so out I rushed. Sure enough there was the doctor just coming out of No. 4, Cross street. How lucky I was to be in time!

I found the parish medical authority not very communicative or prone to take a very romantic view of sickness and suffering. He was a good sort of man enough, no doubt, but dry and matter-of-fact. He had seen so much of sickness and misery that he was used to it. He answered all my questions, however, politely, though seeming a good deal surprised at them.

"He had just been visiting a sick man in that house, had he not?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied, "he had. Bad case of low fever."

"Second floor—a married couple?" was my next inquiry.

Again an answer in the affirmative.

"Was it a case of great distress?"

"Yes, of very great distress."

"They have nothing to live upon but what the husband makes by his labor?" I asked.

"Nothing," was the answer.

"And he is laid up and unable to work."

"That is the state of the case," replied the doctor.

"Ah! thought so," said I. "Would you be kind enough, Doctor Cordial," I continued, "to take charge of this small sum" (it was a very small one) "for the benefit of these poor people—on no account mentioning how you came by it."

The doctor promised that he would, and I was just going to leave him, when I thought I would ask the poor fellow's name.

"His name is Adams;" said the doctor, and so we parted.

I now felt quite a sense of proprietorship in looking at my poor shadows opposite, and watched them more eagerly than ever. There was one action of the shadow, now unfortunately the only action to watch, which used to puzzle me not a little. The sick man's wife used all times to stand before the light, and, as it appeared to me, used to hold some article of clothing, or other piece of drapery, and examine it closely; sometimes I fancied that I could make the object out to be a shirt, or a coat, at another time a pair of trousers. After this she would disappear, and I always noticed that the lamp would then be turned down till its light was very low, and would remain so for a considerable period. I could not understand this at the time, though I did afterwards. She was testing the condition of different articles of clothing before taking them to the pawnbroker's.

And now I began to discover one of the bad results of my solitary life. Though I had given Doctor Cordial a small sum to go towards helping these poor people, it was quite impossible, in my straitened circumstances, that I could spare more. If I had resolutely kept my friends about me, there would have been somebody or other to whom I could apply in behalf of my poor shadows, while now it was impossible to do so.

Whilst I was engaged in turning all these things over in my mind, there came across it the memory of one individual to whom I really felt as if I should not mind applying in this difficulty.

This was a certain Mr. Pycroft, a copper-plate printer, with whom I had formerly had dealings. He was an old man, and it so happened that at one time in my life I had been in a position to do him a service, and had done it. There was something about his age, his position, and our former relations, which made me less shy of approaching him than I should have felt with any one else.

I remembered to have heard that some short time ago he had acted with great severity towards his eldest son, who, having contracted a marriage against his father's wishes, had been deprived of his share in the business, which he had formerly enjoyed, and left to make a living as well as he could by his own exertions. The fact is, that the old man had had a darling project of marrying his eldest son to a young girl whose father was a business connection of his own. The old copper-plate printer was not only thwarted in this, but was further outraged by his son's choice having fallen in a direction particularly distasteful to him for private reasons. I suspected also from what I had heard, that the conduct of the eldest son had been represented to his father as being violent and rebellious in no ordinary degree, had been made the worst of by the younger brother, who not only stepped into the lion's share of the business on his brother's removal, but himself contracted the marriage which his brother had declined. I could not help thinking when I heard the circumstances of the case that this younger son had had a great deal to do in poisoning the old man's mind with regard to his elder brother's conduct.

At all events, old Mr. Pycroft was the only person I could think of just now as likely to help my unfortunate shadows, and to him I determined to apply, but in a roundabout way.

It so happened that I had often promised my old acquaintance to show him a collection which I had of Rembrandt etchings, and it occurred to me that now was the time when these might come into play with great effect. So, making an excuse in relation to the matter of business which had formerly brought us together, I called on my old acquaintance, and, in the course of conversation, invited him, naming an evening, to come to my lodgings, and examine these curiosities, intimating that we would moisten that pleasing labor with a glass of brandy-and-water. Punctual to the time named Mr. Pycroft arrived, and we got through the first hour very comfortably, though I could not help feeling rather anxious about the success of my scheme.

After examining the etchings, Mr. Pycroft, over the second glass, began to rally me about living in such a labyrinth of streets, asking me if I did not find it dreadfully confined at the back.

"By-the-by," I said—and here I must own that I was guilty of some small amount of deception, for I spoke as if the matter in hand were of no sort of importance—"by-the-by, Mr. Pycroft, you wouldn't imagine how much recreation I derive from observing my neighbors in that very cross street which you find comes too near my windows."

"If you was to come out of this kind of solitary life," replied Mr. P., "you would have other things to amuse yourself with besides the goings on of a parcle of people whom you know nothing about."

"Now here, for instance," I went on, unmindful of the interruption, as I drew aside my own curtain and pointed out the window of the room occupied by my poor young couple—"here is a window which has revealed to me all sorts of interesting matter—enough to make a story out of almost, I can tell you."

"What, this window opposite? But do you mean to say, Mr. B., that you think it right to look into people's rooms like that?"

"I have scrupulously abstained from doing so," was my answer, "and have made all my observations with the blind down, as you see it now."

"With the blind down? But how could you make any observations with the blind down?"

"By means of the shadows of the occupants of the apartment," was my answer.

"Shadows?" cried Mr. Pycroft, obviously incredulous. "You don't mean to tell me that you could make out what was going on in that room by means of shadows on the blind?"

"Something of what goes on," I replied, "at any rate. Enough to interest me in the fortunes of those to whom the room belongs."

"Well, really Mr. B.! If I had it on any other testimony than your own I should have thought it simply impossible."

"Would you like to look for yourself?" I said. "I dare say something will take place behind the blind before long, which will give you an opportunity of testing the accuracy of what I have said."

"Well, without doubting that at all," replied my guest, "I really think I should."

Mr. Pycroft was sitting near the window, but my reading-lamp upon the table made the room rather too light for our observations. So I pushed the table away to the other end of the room, turned down the wick of the lamp and lowered the shade over it as well.

"Well," said Mr. Pycroft, "I see nothing at present but a white blind with a light behind it."

The shadow of the little wife's head was there in the corner by the curtain, and the shadow of the hand rose and fell as usual; but Mr. Pycroft had not such a practised eye as I had for detecting such matters. I pointed these out to my friend.

"I do see something bobbing up and down," he said, "now you mention it. But I should never have found it out without your help. Stop! there is a shadow now covering nearly the whole blind. What's that?"

"I suspect that is the shadow of the same person," was my answer. "She will probably go nearer the window and farther from the light presently, and then you will see."

In a minute or two the shadow appeared again, and this time not so large.

"I can make it out now," said my friend, "quite easily; it is the shadow of a woman. I can see the line of the waist and of the skirts of the dress."

"Can you make out the face at all?" I asked.

"Oh yes," answered Mr. P. "It is turned sideways, looking to the left there. She's gone now," he added in a moment.

In a few minutes her shadow was thrown again upon the blind.

"What's she about now?" asked Mr. Pycroft.

"Nay, you shall tell me," I answered.

"Well, she seems to have some small object in her hand which she is shaking."

"And now?" I asked again.

"I can't make out, her elbow seems raised—both hands are raised. No. I can't make out at all."

"I think she is pouring something out," said I.

"So she is, no doubt," answered my guest, who was evidently becoming much interested. "Stay," he continued, after a moment's pause, and looking at me quite anxiously as he spoke—"shaking, pouring—'to be well shaken before taken'—why, it must be medicine."

"I suspect it is medicine," was my answer.

"Is there some one ill, then?" asked Mr. Pycroft.

"Yes," I replied, "her husband."

"And did the shadow tell you that, too?"

"Yes, the shadow of her husband used to appear on the blind as often as hers, now I never see it. Exactly coincident with the disappearance of the husband's shadow has been the arrival of another shadow, which has been that of the parish doctor."

"And pray," asked Mr. Pycroft with the air of one whose credulity had been really too much tasked at last, "may I ask how you knew it to be the doctor's shadow?"

"Doctor Cordial has the roundest back you ever saw in your life," was my answer.

"Well, this is really very curious," ejaculated the old copper-plate printer, who was now evidently powerfully interested.

As we continued to look, the light was suddenly removed, and the room was left in darkness.

"What do you suppose has happened now?" inquired my companion.

"I suppose," was my answer, "that she has left the room for a short time. We shall see more presently; no doubt;" and almost as I spoke the light reappeared, and another shadow was in the room besides that of the little wife.

"The doctor?" asked Mr. Pycroft.

"There," I cried, triumphantly, "you see how much may be discovered by shadows. You are expert already."

"He has a round back, certainly," said the old copper-plate printer.

The round-backed shadow now faded off softly in the direction towards which the profile of the little wife was turned so often. The white blind remained for some minutes shadowless.

"I suppose he is examining his patient now," said Mr. Pycroft; "here he is again," he added in another minute. The doctor, however, stood so near the light this time and so completely with his back towards us, that we were unable to determine what he was doing. This was, naturally, often the case with the shadows Much as one was able to make out, there was, of course, infinitely more, an explanation of which it was impossible even to guess at.

In a short time the round-backed shadow was joined by that of the sick man's wife, and then the two stood for some time in conversation; at least it was reasonable to suppose so.

"Giving her directions, I shouldn't wonder," said the copper-plate printer.

"Most likely," I answered.

"I wonder if he's very bad," said my companion. After this there was a pause. The two shadows continued standing by the table. At last, we both thought that the doctor's shadow appeared to give something to the shade of the engraver's wife, and immediately after, the light was removed as it had been before: it had been probably taken out on to the landing in order that the doctor might see his way down stairs.

"And so they're very poor," said Mr. Pycroft, as if talking to himself.

"They had nothing but what the husband could earn," I answered, "and he is wholly incapable of working, and will remain so probably for weeks to come."

The light had now reappeared in the room. The shadow of the little wife seemed to linger near the table after setting it down. Her figure was motionless for a considerable time, and then we noted that the head fell forward, and that the face was buried in the hands as if in an agony of silent grief.

We neither of us spoke, at the same moment I dropped the curtain of my own window which had been fastened back, for I felt that this was sorrow with which a spectator had no right to intermeddle.

Soon afterwards my old friend rose to go, and we spoke not another word on the matter. Just before I retired to rest, however, I looked out once more. The shadow of the little wife's head was in its usual place, and the shadow of her hand rose and fell as usual. She was at work again.

The next day, by an early post, I received a letter from Mr. Pycroft. He had been thinking a great deal, he said, of what he had seen the night before, and enclosed a little money, which he asked me to see applied to the benefit of the young couple in whose fortunes I had interested myself. He also begged me from time to time to let him have tidings of what "the shadows" were about.

I handed the money over to Dr. Cordial, asking him to apply it as might seem best to his judgment, but making no mention of who it came from. I asked him also to let me have news as frequently as possible of the condition of his patient. These I transmitted pretty nearly as often as I received them to the old copper-plate printer.

For some days there was not much to report, nor did the shadows tell me anything different from what they had before revealed. The poor engraver's shadow was still wanting, and that of his little wife was either stationary or in the corner, when she did what she could to earn a little money with her needle, or else was seen flitting about the room in attendance on her sick husband. At length there came a time when the fever reached its crisis, and when it was clear, according to the doctor's report, that the sufferer must sink under it or recover. To make my story as short as possible, I will not dwell on the details of this period of suspense. The one quality of youth possessed by the patient, enabled his constitution to rally, and after this crisis in his disorder he began to mend.

And now a long convalescence followed, and a time arrived when one evening the shadow of a wasted figure moved slowly past the light, and I could guess as I watched it, and observed that it was accompanied by the well-known shadow of the little wife, that the sick man was moving from his bed to a chair by the fire.

Of course I made this advance known to my friend, the copper-plate printer, and kept him well acquainted with all the particulars of the gradual improvement in our invalid's health, even to the period when it was so far reëstablished that he was able at last to sit up for a certain number of hours every day at his engraving table, and work once more for his wife's support.

"They are very grateful," I said, when I made this announcement to my old acquaintance, "to the unknown friend who has assisted them from time to time throughout their trouble."

"Oh no, nonsense, nonsense; it's nothing, nothing at all—nothing at all," ejaculated the old fellow, trying to get away from the subject.

"And they are very anxious," I continued, resolutely, "to thank him personally, if he would but reveal himself and give them the opportunity."

"No, no, not for the world," was the answer; "oh dear no, impossible. Here, here's a little trifle extra just to set them going you know, because he mustn't work too much at first."

"And you won't let them see you?" I asked again.

"No, no, no, on no account," said the old boy. "I'll tell you what, though," he continued in a moment, "I should like to see them—see them as I did before—the shadows you know," he added. "I'll come and have a glass of brandy-and water with you some evening, and have a look at the shadows again."

I was obliged to be satisfied with this, and making an engagement with my old friend for an early day, I left him and went home.

The evening came, and with it an unusual amount of stir and bustle in the quiet room opposite. The figure of the little wife was continually flitting backwards and forwards in front of the light, as if she were engaged in smartening up the poor apartment. Hanging in the very middle of the window, and so close to the thin white blind that I could see it distinctly, there was a birdcage with a bird in it; and it was owing to the presence of this object that I had been chiefly able to form some idea of what my two friends opposite were like. When either of them approached the birdcage, as would sometimes happen, to give a chirp of encouragement to its occupant, I could see the profile of the person who did so as distinctly as one used to trace the silhouettes of the old black portraits which itinerant artists were wont to cut out at fairs. Except at such times as this, when the engraver or his wife stood thus near the window and far from the light, I could distinguish little but a shapeless mass; and when either of them approached the candle nearly, their shadows became so gigantic that the whole space of the window—an unusually large one—was completely darkened, even by one figure. I must repeat what I have said before, that the opportunities were very rare when I could make out what the shadows were about, and that in all cases in which I could detect such processes of mixing drinks, pouring out of medicines and the like, it was owing to the fact that some necessary object connected with the proceeding was placed on some articles of furniture which stood in or near the window.

Punctual to the appointed time, my old friend, the copper-plate printer, made his appearance, and his first question after the usual greeting had been exchanged was:

"Well, how are the shadows?"

I placed his chair in the old position and we both sat down.

The bustle and movement to which I have adverted as going on in the room opposite were noticeable still, and I had little doubt that the apartment was being "cleaned up," an impression to which additional force was soon given by the dawning on the scene of a thin, straight shadow, which I took to be a broomstick, and which was now brought into active service.

I must not omit to mention, that at the moment of a certain pause in the career of the broom, the figure of the poor engraver was thrown with great distinctness on the blind. He had come to the window to stick some object, probably a piece of groundsel, between the wires of the birdcage.

When this happened, I noticed a great change come over the countenance of my guest. He raised himself in his chair, and looking eagerly forward, said, in quite a strange tone of voice:

"What did you say was the name of these people?"

"Adams," was my answer.

"Adams—you are quite sure?"

"Quite," I replied. By this time the shadow had vanished again, but I remarked that for a considerable time Mr. Pycroft seemed absent and uncomfortable, and we had talked of many matters foreign to the subject I had at heart, before he again returned to the shadows.

"They seem quite enough now," said Mr. Pycroft at last.

"I dare say," I answered, "that the cleaning of the room is over, and that they have sat down to a bit of supper."

"Do you think so?" asked the copper-plate printer.

"I dare say that they have some little luxury, furnished by your liberality."

"Do you really think so?" said the old boy, who had a great idea of comfort. "What do you think they've got?" I wish the shadows would show us that!"

I darted at once at the opening which I saw here.

"The shadows will not show it," I said; "but why not go across and see it in substance? It would make their supper all the sweeter to them, I am sure."

The old gentleman had just finished a tumbler of hot grog. He was in high good humor, and as I finished speaking his eyes began to twinkle, and a latent smile developed itself about the corners of his mouth.

"It wouldn't be bad fun, would it?" he said. I wanted nothing more, and in another minute I had him on his legs, and we were on our way to No. 4.

A little girl was on the door-step with a pot of beer in her hand, and we had no sooner stopped before the house than she made known a want incidental to the lives of maidens who stand only three feet two inches in their stockings:

"Please, sir, will you ring the second bell from the top?"

"Second floor?" I said, as I complied; "that's where Mr. and Mrs. Adams live, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir, and he's my father," said the young lady, who evidently looked upon the couple alluded to as one flesh. I thought it odd I had never seen this child's shadow on the blind.

"Well, I want to see him, then," I replied, "and so does this gentleman."

"Oh, but you can't, though," said the little girl, who, by the way, appeared to be a precocious shrew—"for father's at supper, and there's a fowl, and father's been ill, and you can't disturb him just as he's a little better—so that you can't."

"You just hold your tongue, miss, will you?" said a voice at this juncture, "and let me talk to the gentleman."

I looked up and saw that the door had been opened by a tall, gaunt-looking woman, with a large nose.

"Who did you please to want, sir?" she asked in a whining tone, which I disliked very much.

I told her briefly who we were, and the object of our visit.

"Oh, what a joyful surprise!" said the gaunt woman, whining as before in a manner infinitely offensive to me. "Get along up-stairs, Lizzy," she continued, addressing the child, and tell your father that the kind gentleman as assisted him in his illness is coming to see him; I'm his wife, kind gentlemen"—(this the shadow that I had interested myself in!)—"I'm his poor wife that nussed him through his illness, and—take care of the stairs, kind gentlemen—and this is the room, gentlemen; and here's a joyful surprise, James; the gentlemen that's been so kind all the time you've been ill; and be pleased to take a seat, gentlemen, and honor our poor room by sitting down in it."

I was thunderstruck. A little common-looking man was sitting at the table on which a smoking fowl, a bit of bacon and some potatoes had been placed. He bore the evident marks of recent illness, and rose with some effort at our entry. He resumed his seat, however, as I and my companion sat down. I took a chair, as I should have taken anything that was offered me in sheer surprise and bewilderment. I looked once more at the man's wife. What, was that the substance of the neat little shadow which I knew so well—that great gaunt sloping creature? Were shadows so deceptive as this? Would anybody tell me that my opposite neighbor could have had such a nose as I now saw, and that it would not have stood out in bold relief and left its mark upon my memory every time she approached the window?

The husband, too. That was not my poor engraver. He was an inoffensive man enough, as he sat there full of clumsy expressions of gratitude to my companion for the assistance accorded to him during his recent attack of fever. He was a harmless little man, no doubt. Not quite such a heavy blow as his wife; but still, he was not my engraver.

All this time, even while her husband was speaking, the gaunt woman kept up an under-current of gratitude of the slimiest description, to which the old gentleman answered not a word, for he seemed as little prepared for the real Mr. and Mrs. Adams by what he had seen of their shadows as I was. In short, beyond a few words of inquiry as to the state of the invalid's health, which I had managed to utter on first coming into the room, we had neither of us spoken a word.

Suddenly the tremendous idea entered my mind that there must be some mistake. I had been staring some time at the little girl, whom we originally met on the door-step, and who, to do her justice, returned the compliment with interest, when it struck me that her head came considerably above the window-sill, and that consequently, it was a most extraordinary thing that its shadow had never caught my attention. My eyes having, in the course of this comparison of the young lady with the window-sill, been directed towards this last part of the room, I next observed that there was no birdcage hanging in the window.

"Halloa!" I ejaculated, you've taken down the birdcage."

"Birdcage, sir?" whined the gaunt woman, deferentially?"

"We ain't got no birdcage," burst out the small child of the door-step, "nor never haven't had none—nor yet no bird neither.

"Will you hold your tongue, miss?" interrupted her mother.

There was an awkward pause. I looked again about the room, I looked at the woman, I looked at her husband—he had no beard, I now observed. I had, however, presence of mind enough not to ask after that missing appendage as I had done after the birdcage. I determined to make assurance doubly sure, and walking towards the window and pulling aside the blind, observed, as an excuse for looking out:

"I am afraid you must be a good deal choked up at the back with houses. Isn't that rather unwholesome?"

A voluble answer on the subject of confined lodgings, their advantages and disadvantages, followed, but I did not hear it. I was looking for my own window in the house opposite. I had left the lamp alight and the blind half drawn up. The window before me, exactly in front of that which I was looking from, was fastened up and secured with shutters. Stretching my neck, and glancing in a slanting direction towards the next of the opposite houses, I saw that the second-floor window was illuminated, and that the blind was half lowered.

"Your supper is getting cold," I said, coming back to the table, and exchanging a glance of meaning with my companion; "my friend and I only wished to come in and see how you were enjoying yourselves, and so now we will leave you to do better justice to the fowl than you could if we remained here."

So saying, and resisting all entreaties to stay and take a share of the good things, I made for the door, and was soon on the staircase, followed closely by Mr. Pycroft, who, speechless as long as we remained in the room, did nothing now but repeat, "Wrong people, eh?"—been feeding the wrong people, haven't we?" in a loud and perfectly audible whisper. The gaunt woman was, however, too loquacious herself to hear what was said, and during the time that she lighted us down the stairs, never ceased whining out her gratitude for a single moment.

When we got into the street, I turned round and looked my companion in the face.

"It is some comfort, at any rate," I said, "to think that you have been assisting people who were really in need of help, but it is evident that every penny of your bounty has gone to the family we have just left."

"And how do you account for the mistake?" asked my old friend.

"I can only conclude," was my answer, "that by a curious coincidence there have been two second-floor lodgers ill in two houses next door to each other; that after my seeing Dr. Cordial at the window opposite to mine, he had gone from the one house to the other; that he had had time to pay a short visit to the invalid we have just left; and that then I had met him coming away, as I thought, from attending on our poor shadows, but in reality from the deserving personage whose supper has been supplied by your benevolence."

"And the shadows?" gasped Mr. Pycroft, utterly aghast.

"Have, through my unfortunate mistake, not received a single shilling," was my answer.

Mr. Pycroft stared at me for some time in petrified amazement.

"We can never leave the thing like this," he said, at last. "Do you think you could be sure of the house this time?"

"I can understand your feeling some mistrust about it," I said, "but I own that I feel none myself. This is the house beyond a doubt." I looked up as I spoke at No. 5.

"Then let's bring the matter to a conclusion at once," said the old copper-plate printer, stoutly; and with that we actually rang at the second bell handle on the left hand door-post.

After the proper amount of delay, the door was opened by a slatternly woman.

"Second-floor back?" said I, in a mellifluous voice.

"Front," replied the slatternly woman, in rather an injured tone; "you should have rung the bell on the right door-post."

I begged pardon with all humility, and the slatternly woman relented a little.

"The two-pair-back's at home, I know," she said, "and if you're coming up, I may as well light you."

We availed ourselves of this offer, and, in a few seconds, we were on the second-floor landing. The slatternly woman pointed out the door at which we were to knock; and, opening her own, and letting out in so doing a blast of onions that almost made my eyes water, she disappeared into the refreshing vapour, and shut herself in with it.

My curiosity was now powerfully piqued, and I felt as if some great stake hinged upon the opening of the door at which we stood and knocked.

A clear, cheerful voice called to us to enter, and in another moment, we stood inside the room.

Two people, a man and a woman, occupied the apartment. One of them, the man, was at first hidden from view, but in the other, as she rose upon our entrance, I recognized at once the shadow with which I was so familiar.

The room was a great contrast to that which we had just left, which was tolerably well provided with furniture. This room was utterly bare, looking as if all the available objects had been removed, as probably they had, to be turned into money. A mattress and some bedding were on the floor at one end of the room. The table, and a couple of old chairs, were the only articles of furniture I could see. The engraver's lamp was on the table, and the materials for a very poor meal which the two had evidently just been cooking—a very little scrap of bacon and some boiled rice. The bird-cage was hanging in the window, if I had wanted any confirmation of my conviction that I had found my shadows at last.

Of course, all these things were taken in by me at a single glance, it being necessary that I should at once account for my visit and that of my friend. I had begun to do so in a few hurried words, when my attention was suddenly arrested by an exclamation from Mr. Pycroft, who had followed me. The second occupant of the room, whom we had at first seen but imperfectly, had now risen to his feet, and stood with the light full upon him, straining his eyes into the shade where my companion stood behind me. I turned hastily round, and met the stern gaze of my old friend.

"If this is a trick, Mr. Broadhead," he said, speaking very thickly, and with choking utterance, "I can tell you that it does you little credit."

"What do you mean?" I asked, in utter bewilderment.

"I mean that, if this has all been a planned thing to bring about a reconciliation between me and my son—"

"Your son?" I gasped.

"I can only say," continued Mr. Pycroft, "that it shall meet with the success it deserves."

He turned as he spoke and made for the door, but I was beforehand with him.

"Stay, Mr. Pycroft!" I cried. "If you choose to retain this feeling of animosity, which so illy becomes you, you must, but you shall not go away with a false impression of this matter, as far as I am concerned in it. I swear to you that your suspicions of me are false; that when we came to this room, I had no more idea of whom were its occupants than you had, and that I never knew your son was living in this abject misery; though, if I had, I would certainly have done my best to rouse you to a feeling of what, under such circumstances, you owe to one who bears your name."

Mr. Pycroft had glanced once searchingly towards me when I denied his imputation of having been concerned in a plot to trick him into a reconciliation, and now his eyes were directed towards the place where his son stood before him.

He was a fine manly-looking fellow; and as he stood there holding his wife's hand in his, and with the refining influence of recent illness showing on his worn but handsome face, I could not help feeling that surely this picture must complete the work which the shadows had so well begun.

"Look at them!" I said—"look at this room—look at that meal! Can you see such wretchedness and not be moved? If your son has displeased you, has he not suffered? If he has disobeyed, he has paid the penalty."

I looked in my companion's face, and I thought that I saw some shadow of compunction working there.

"Do not," I said, "let the sympathy which you bestowed upon the shadows be wanting for the realities which cast them."

The little wife at this moment left her husband's side, and, advancing to where we stood, laid her hand timidly on that of my old friend. I looked at him once more, and then, beckoning the poor engraver to his father's side, I passed quietly from the room, where I felt that my presence was no longer needed.

About an hour afterwards, I was sitting disconsolately in my room, reflecting on the loneliness of my own position, and rather envying my opposite neighbors, when I heard my own name shouted in a cheery voice from without.

I looked in the old direction, and saw my friend Mr. Pycroft standing at his son's open window.

"We want you to come over," said the old gentleman, "and spend what is left of the evening with us."

I assented gladly, and was just drawing in my head, when I heard myself called once more by name.

"And I say," said Mr. Pycroft, in a stage whisper, "as we are rather short of liquor here, perhaps you wouldn't mind bringing a bottle of brandy in your pocket; and if you happen to have such a thing as a lemon—"

In a few minutes I was sitting one of a comfortable party in the room opposite.

"Do you know what is one of the first things we intend to do now?" said the little wife, smiling as she looked at me.

"I have not the least idea," was my answer.

"Why, we are going to nail up the thickest curtain we can get, in order, to prevent our opposite neighbor from seeing what we are about whenever our lamp happens to be alight."

"You need not be afraid," I said; "and you may save yourself the trouble of putting up the curtain, for the opposite neighbor hopes henceforth to see so much of his new friends in their Substance, that he is not likely to trouble himself much more about—their Shadows."—[Tom Tiddler's Ground.

POWER OF A WORD.

A word—and smiles succeed to tears;
A word—and the torn heart is healed.
Strange that such precious balm should fall
From air-drawn sounds whispered from human lips.

MOHAMMED'S CHAMPIONS.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

For a time Mohammed confided his revelations to his own household, but at length the rumor got abroad that he pretended to be a prophet. This stirred up, at the very opening of his career, hostility from every side. His immediate kinsmen, of the line of Haschem, were powerful, prosperous, and identified with idolatry. They therefore considered their family disgraced in the person of Mohammed, and that he was placing them in humiliation at the feet of the rival branch of their tribe; while the rival line of Abb Schems took advantage of the opportunity, and raised the cry of heresy and impiety, to depose the line of Haschem from the guardianship of the sacred shrine of Arabia and the governorship of Mecca. Thus the matter became an issue of rival family interests, as well as one of a radical conflict between idolatry and the mission of this earnest image-smasher.

During the first three years of his prophetic career the number of Mohammed's converts did not exceed forty, and most of these were young persons, strangers, and slaves; and so thoroughly was the new sect outlawed, that its meetings were held in secret, either at the house of one of the disciples or in a cave near Mecca. Their meetings at length were discovered, a mob broke into the cavern, and a scuffle ensued, in which one of the assailants was wounded in the head by Saad, an armorer, who thenceforth became renowned as the first of the disciples who shed blood in the cause of Islam.

Mohammed afterward had a second vision, in which the angel Gabriel commanded him to arise and preach and magnify the Lord. Accordingly, in the fourth year of his religious or fanatical activity, he summoned the line of Haschem to meet him on the hill of Safa, in the vicinity of Mecca, that he might unfold to them matters of importance concerning their welfare. They assembled, and with them came his uncle Abu Lahab, a man of a proud spirit, who held his nephew in reproach for bringing disgrace upon his family. As soon as Mohammed commenced to make known to them his revelations, Abu Lahab started up in a great rage, reviling him for calling them on so idle an errand. Catching up a stone, he would have cast it at his nephew, but the Prophet turned upon him a withering glance, cursed the hand raised against him, and predicted his doom to the fire of Jehennam, with the assurance that his scoffing wife should bear the burden of thornes with which the fire would be kindled. This woman was the sister of Abu Sofian, the great rival of the line of Haschem, and though the son of Abu Lahab had doubly united him to his nephew by a marriage with Mohammed's youngest daughter, Abu Lahab betrayed his family and united with its rival. Enraged by the curse pronounced upon them, they immediately compelled their son to divorce his wife, who came weeping to her father; but she was soon consoled, by becoming the wife of her father's zealous disciple Othman, who in the number of Mohammed's successors ranks as the third Caliph in the rise of the vast Mohammedan empire.

Not discouraged, the Prophet called a second meeting of the Haschemites, and at this time announced in full the revelations which he had received, and the divine command to impart them to the chosen line of Haschem. "Oh, children of Abd al Montâlleb," cried the Prophet, "to you of all men has Allah vouchsafed these most precious gifts. In His name I offer you the blessings of this world, and endless joys hereafter. Who among you will share the burden of my offer? Who will be my brother, my lieutenant, my vizier?" For a space of time the assembled Haschemites were silent, some wondering, others smiling in derision, until the youthful Ali, starting up with enthusiasm, offered himself to his great cousin, who caught the generous youth in his arms, and pressing him to his bosom, cried out to the assembly, "Behold my brother, my vizier, my vicegerent! Let all listen so his words and obey him." The outburst of the stripling Ali was received with a shout of derision, and the Haschemites scoffingly told Abu Taleb that he must now pay obedience to his son; but notwithstanding their scorn, the youthful Ali afterward became one of the mightiest of men, and fourth Caliph of the Mohammedan empire.

Mohammed now began to preach in public. The hills of Safa and Kubeis were his chosen audience chambers, from which he thundered against the reign of idolatry. These places were well chosen, for they were sanctified in the minds of the children of Abraham's first-born, by traditions of Ishmael and his mother Hagar; and from these holy hills he sent forth a mighty proclamation that God had sent him to restore the "religion of Abraham." The Koreishites, enraged by his denunciation of their idolatry and the stiff-neckedness of themselves and their fathers in "the days of ignorance"—as the period prior to the Islam era is denominated—and, moreover, much alarmed by the spread of the new faith, urged Abu Taleb to silence his nephew, and at length threatened to exterminate Mohammed and his disciples. Abu Taleb hastened to entreat his nephew to forego his work. "Oh, my uncle," exclaimed this grand fanatic or prophet, "though they should array the sun against me on my right hand and the moon on my left, yet until God shall command me, or shall take me hence, would I not depart from my purpose." Mohammed was retiring from the presence of his uncle with a dejected countenance, when Abu Taleb, struck with admiration, called him back, and declared that, preach what he might, he would never abandon him to his enemies; and Abu Taleb, as the representative of his line, forthwith bound the descendants of Haschem and Abd al Montâlleb to aid him in protecting him against the rest of the tribe of Koreish. They considered the new religion of their kinsman a dangerous heresy, but the strong family instinct of the Arabs prevailed, and the descendants—excepting his uncle Abu Lahab—of Haschem and Abd al Montâlleb consented to protect him.

About this time Mohammed was assailed and nearly strangled in the Caaba, but he was rescued by Abu Beker. He therefore deemed it wisdom to counsel those of his disciples who were not protected by powerful friends to fly from Mecca, for their lives were now in danger. He advised such to take refuge among the Nestorian Christians, and Othman Ibn Affan led a little band of the persecuted out of Mecca. The refugees were kindly received by the Nestorians, and others soon followed them. Meantime the Koreishites, finding Mohammed persistent in his work and daily making converts, passed a law of banishment against all who should embrace his faith, while he himself was forced to take refuge in the house of one of his disciples. Here he remained for a month. But his fame had spread abroad, and men from all parts of Arabia sought him in his retreat.

His powerful enemy Abu Jahl sought him and insulted and outraged him by personal violence. This was, however, avenged, and the circumstance was the indirect cause of bringing into the faith of Islam two of its mightiest champions. This outrage was told to his uncle Hamza, as he was returning from hunting, whereupon, in great ire, he marched with his bow unstrung into an assembly of Koreishites, where he found Abu Jahl boasting of his exploit; and Hamza smote him with a blow, wounding him in his head. The friends of the smitten man were in their turn about to avenge him, but Abu Jahl, fearing the warlike Hamza, himself pacified them, and apologized for his conduct, urging as his excuse the apostacy of his nephew. "Well," retorted Hamza, fiercely, "I also do not believe in your gods of stone; can you compel me?" Forthwith he declared himself a believer in his nephew's mission, and took the oath of allegiance. Yet more important a convert even than the warlike Hamza was Abu Jahl's own nephew Omar, whose very walking-stick, it is said, struck more terror into beholders than any other man's sword. Omar, instigated by his uncle to avenge the blow dealt him by Hamza, promised to penetrate to the retreat of the Prophet and strike a poniard to his heart. He was on the way to execute his purpose, when he met a Koreishite friend, to whom he imparted his design. "Before you slay Mohammed, and draw upon yourself the vengeance of his relatives, see that your own are free from heresy," cautioned his friend, who had himself secretly embraced the faith. "Are any of mine guilty of backsliding?" demanded Omar. "Even so," was the reply. "Thy sister and her husband Seid." Omar, overwhelmed with astonishment, and beside himself with wrath, hastened to his sister's house, and surprised her and her husband reading the Koran. In his rage he struck Seid to the earth, and would have plunged his sword into his heart, but the wife interposed, and received a fierce blow in her face, which bathed it in blood. "Enemy of Allah," sobbed his sister, "dost thou strike me thus for believing in the only true God? In spite of thee and thy violence, I will persevere in the true faith. Yes, there is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet. And now, Omar, finish thy work." But Omar, struck by his sister's spirit, relented, and took his foot from her husband's breast. "Show me the writing," he said; but his sister refused to let him touch the sacred scroll until he had washed his hands. He opened the 20th chapter of the Koran, and read: "In the name of the most merciful God! We have not sent down the Koran to inflict misery on mankind, but as a monitor, to teach him to believe in the true God, the creator of the earth and the lofty heavens.

"The All-Merciful is enthroned on high; to Him belongeth whatsoever is in the heavens above and in the regions under the earth.

"Dost thou utter thy prayers with a loud voice? Know that there is no need. God knoweth the secrets of thy heart; yea, and that which is most hidden.

"Verily I am God; and there is none besides Me. Serve Me; serve none other. Offer up thy prayers to none but Me."

Omar, greatly moved by the new revelations, continued to read, and before he left his sister's house this fierce man of war was a penitent and firm believer in the Prophet, to whose retreat he hastened, and knocking, humbly craved admittance. "Come in, son of Khattab," answered the Prophet. "What bringest thee hither?" "I come to enroll my name among the believers of God and his Prophet," reverently replied the new convert.

No half-hearted manifestation of faith satisfied this proselyte. He desired to make his conversion most public, and prevailed on Mohammed to accompany him to the Caaba to perform openly the rites of Islamism. A procession of the faithful forthwith paraded the streets of Mecca, Hamza walking on the right hand and Omar on the left hand of the Prophet, to protect him from violence; and though the Koreishites viewed this demonstration with astonishment and dismay, none dared to interrupt it, for Hamza and Omar glared upon their enemies "like two lions that had been been robbed of their young." Next day, also, the fierce nephew of Abu Jahl went up to the holy shrine to pray, in defiance of the Koreishites, who, though they dared not to interfere in his worship, fell on another of the disciples who also went up to worship. Wrathful at this, Omar immediately sought his powerful uncle. "I renounce," said he, "thy protection. I will not be better off than my fellow-believers." This terrible military apostle of the Arabian prophet became the third successor of Mohammed, and under him the conquests of Egypt, Syria, and Persia were added to that of all Arabia.

FROM SALT LAKE CITY TO OMAHA.

BY QUIZ.

PREPARATORY.

Departure of two coaches at 4 p.m. loaded at the rate of nine passengers to one square yard of coach room—A confusion of legs and personal property to which the confusion of tongues was a cypher—A supper in a stable on the way—A splash, a tumble, and drag through the Weber bottoms — Twenty frantic rushes of aforesaid nine, including the writer, in vain endeavors to get out of a fifteen-inch window in order to balance up and keep the coach "on its legs"—An upset of companion coach containg four men and a young marriageable lady; marriageable lady being deposited on her feet with her head out of the upper-side window, and the balance of the passengers in positions too graceful to describe—Recovery of aforesaid performers to positions of ordinary life; and a deposit of both coach loads at eleven o'clock at night in the rain on the muddy but rich and alluvial soil of "Ogden switch."

Quiz wishes it to be distinctly understood here, that the above brief description of his journey to Ogden, is thus abbreviated simply out of pure love for the public and at his own expense—he being paid by the line. Considerations growing out of the support of a young and highly interesting family, however, now compel him to enter more into detail, even if the public do suffer in consequence. Besides, it is one of his maxims that philantrophy is always relished best in small doses.

One idea that strikes a visitor on his arrival in Ogden —especially if it has been raining hard for three days—is that nature used up a great deal of mud when she made it. Another idea is that there is a great deal of waste water there, which would be very useful in the sandy deserts of Arabia, if it could only be got there in the hot season. As to Quiz's experience in Ogden he is prepared to take oath before Justice Clinton that he jumped rain puddles on the side-walk, one night in the dark, till he gave up the performance in despair, and took to the streets. The greatest objection to these puddles, however, is that they disappear between the wet seasons and don't stop long enough to get trout in them; otherwise they might be turned to excellent account.

These muddy views it should be stated do not apply to "OGDEN ON THE BENCH." "Ogden on the Bench" may be said to be above anything of the kind. Perhaps on this account and to keep "Ogden on the Bench" from being influenced by the watery example of "Ogden in the Bottom," nature has arranged it that "Ogden on the Bench" is never permitted to see "Ogden in the bottom," until "Ogden on the Bench" puts on her thick-soled water-proof boots and goes down to pay it a visit. This argument about the influence of example is, however, unfortunately spoiled by the fact that dry and salubrious Ogden is equally invisible to Ogden the watery, who, one would naturally expect, ought always to have such a proper example before its eyes.

To refer back to the subject of roads, Quiz, having by the above reflections, worked himself up into a very proper condition for a nice comfortable grumble, must be permitted to deviate from the description of his journey and say that it is an unhappy fact peculiar to most western cities (including some in our own Territory), that roads generally are better made than side-walks. The only way that Quiz has of accounting for this peculiarity is by supposing that a humane feeling led to the making of such streets more with a reference to the wants of the horses than the men. His view of the way of correcting this matter is by suggesting that in future all City Fathers be selected from men who are too poor to keep carriages, and having to use the side-walks themselves, will be very apt to give humanity the preference to horse-manity. But this is of little moment at present. As Quiz expects, in a few years, to run for Mayor of Ogden, unless the Railroad Shops are not built there, in which case he will fall back on some other city. He intends to secure all the ladies' votes by announcing as his platform —"Gravel side-walks; No more Puddles; and Dry Skirts." If "them sentiments" don't secure his election, he will, very properly, retire into private life disgusted with the world at large and leave the Utah Magazine to conduct its affairs single-handed. But to return to our journey.

A whistle—a shriek—a sound like ten thousand bushels of pea-nuts being crushed up, and the train arrives. A hub-bub—a rush—some snorting or hard breathing (very like a giant with a bad cold)—a few spasmodic jerks, and the train started, carrying Quiz to the region of the new Railroad Towns to take notes in passing for the benefit of humanity—at ten cents a line.

His first impression about these towns was that owing to the gravelly nature of the soil, the atmosphere was dry, every other house being a drinking saloon. This wonderful illustration of the effect of soil upon the human constitution is very remarkable. Another thing that struck him was that humanity in these regions has a very decided tendency towards the pockets. Every man he saw in them either had his hands in somebody else's pockets or else in his own. He only saw one disengaged man whose hands were out of his pockets, and he stood behind a crowd feeling, no doubt, ashamed of himself. Whether his pockets were sewed up, or his hands were two big to get into them is a point too nice to decide; but he seemed to feel his degraded position deeply. The principal occupation of the inhabitants of these canvass towns seems to be standing in rows and staring at the trains; after which they retire to talk over the event, until the next train arrives, when they turn out again, stand in a row and stare as before. Aside from this highly intellectual pursuit, the selection of titles sufficiently grand for their palatial residences must take up all their surplus energy and genius. Here you may find a "Granite Saloon," ten feet square, or thereabouts, and made of odd pieces of lumber. You will also gaze with wonder and delight upon that vast national structure—the "Empire Saloon"—which will on a pinch accommodate at least ten persons besides a table, two benches and a cooking stove—provided the aforesaid individuals be not too fat or too particular as to the disposal of their knees. Here also may be seen that world-renowned hotel—"The Tomkins House,"—which, being built half of clap-boards and half of canvass, is in every way a highly ventilated and salubrious abode; and should you be of a metaphysical turn of mind, you may turn the splendor of your genius on to that highly interesting but puzzling question, how two saloons, both of them the "Sole and only agent" for that delicious beverage "The cream of the Rocky Mountain Lager Beer," are found in one city and working amicably side by side.

Quiz closes this portion of his journey with the following brilliant and startling reflections:—What a sweet thing is human nature! No sooner is a Railroad town laid out, with a prospect of twenty poor devils going there to invest than four restaurant-keepers, six bar-keepers, a baker, a butcher and three store-keepers go there with no object in the world but to wait on them and make the place comfortable. But for this lovely principle in human nature, they might starve or go thirsty. But so wonderfully is everything arranged in the universe, that no sooner does any man want to buy than another man is ready to sell to him regardless of sacrifice. The attention of little boys in our public schools ought to be called to this wonderful "compensating principle" in nature.

The Drama.

THE MISSION OF THE DRAMA.

NUMBER TWO.

From the very rise of the English drama in Shakspeare's times, excepting in such honorable cases as Charles Kean, managers and actors have not conceived a very high mission for themselves nor aimed after anything exalted for social and moral good. Actors and actresses, though they have been itinerant enough, have been anything, in their motives and in the moral of their lives, but traveling elders. They have had a mission in their hands, but they have neither conceived it nor desired it to this day. It is true Shakspeare gave to them "the purpose of playing, whose end, both at the first, and now, was and is, to hold as 'twere, the mirror up to nature, and show the very age and body of the time his form and pressure." The profession know their dramatic catechism better than many of us do the decalogue, but they follow not their Moses.

If the drama has fallen—if the profession has never been highly respected, and a general decline has come, with a contempt in the public mind for theatres, managers and actors are themselves to blame. Even after a long history, since the rise of the British drama, though they hold all the opportunities of a mission in their hand, and the very best literature in the English language—though they hold the book of Shakspeare, which has been classed next to the Bible in its dominion over those who speak the Saxon tongue, yet to this hour they persist in their suicidal course. They dare to offer us Mazeppa as a great draw, and everything that is "broad and showy" in its immorality, with all that is full of sensation and stage materialism, they catch at and play against the public as their best cards. How is it that they presume on society thus? Managers, whom the public have most to blame, would dare more, but they fear lest their balloons would burst. So they would, and will in a few years, unless there be a radical reform in their course and policy. Do they not see that the further they go on their broad and showy course, the broader and more showy they must become to be fresh and taking.

In consequence of this general contempt in the public mind for theatres and their managers, comes the cant that the drama is declining. Pshaw! The drama will never decline. It is as old as Greece, and in their adaptation to society, the dramatic functions are as old as man himself. There is in our nature a vast amount of dramatic element. Children abundantly illustrate this. They are nature's first dramatists and players. Every one has witnessed this in their "playing" schools, chapels, mothers and fathers, in fact every character or phase in their little world around, their plastic minds delight to reproduce. This illustrates how radical and universal is the dramatic instinct, and how much the drama is an institution of nature. This, too, is further manifested in the growth of civilization from the earliest ages. The first birth of poetry, and the primitive forms of literature, were dramatic in their elements and character, and thus even religion, in its first phases, is almost entirely ceremonial and theatrical. It is a divine drama rather than abstract theology. Instance the Catholic religion, to the present day, which ever has and perhaps ever will have an immense influence over the human mind through its dramatic agencies, especially as manifested in its mass service. Nor is this merely true of the ignorant multitude. Those agencies take a tenacious hold of natures of the highest class, especially among a people with the plastic genius and character of the Italians. Indeed, Protestantism, as we understand it in Saxon-England and America, never could find an extensive mission in Italy. It is too abstract—too anti-dramatic in principle; for the Italians, though subtle in their intellects, are much like children in their natures, and like them can better perform religious services than realize a cold abstract theology. It was also the case with the Hebrews and all Asiatic nations. The Greeks, though they were philosophers—the first apostles of philosophy—were also the founders of the secular drama. The temple service of ancient Israel was exceedingly dramatic in character, rivaling even the Catholic church in this feature. Read the full description of the opening of Solomon's temple, from which is the following:

"Also the Levites, which were the singers . . . . . with their sons and brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals and psalteries and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets; . . . . . and when they lifted up their voice with the trumpets and cymbals and instruments of music and praised the Lord, saying, For he is good; for his mercy endureth forever; that then the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord; so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud; for the Glory of the Lord had filled the house of God."

And if it be true that Solomon was the Moses of Masonry and his temple of divine building the tabernacle of a universal religion and brotherhood, swallowing up the Mosaic economy like Christianity in a world-wide mission, it is further seen how much there is of performance and illustration of divinity — how much even religion is a divine drama.

Shall the world again adopt ceremonial faiths and religions of creeds and forms? Nay; let Christianity live most in spirit, and not in forms and creeds; nor would we have Protestantism lose its robust mission, which has struck down the theatrical enchantments of the church to reach a higher state.

All this but shows how dramatic is human nature even to its manifestations of religion and in its worship, for the drama is essentially performance and so is life.

Hence the powerful functions of the stage for good or evil. The secular drama is the world and life as we find them. It shows us what we are, what others are, and what human nature is as well as in its better phases what it should be. We are made reflective and chastened when the proper mission of the stage is brought to bear upon us. Let an intelligent society, then, recognize the mission of the drama and the stage, and redeem them. Demand of managers and the histrionic profession (which scarcely now deserves that name) that they make theatres teachers, humanizers and re-creators of the mental and physical vitality which the business and cares of the day have drawn from us. Give to the public, should be the demand, historical panoramas animated and illustrated with the spirit of their times, and with them give wholesome plays, comedies and the domestic drama. Let them throw down their profane altars and their brazen images and cast out their unwholesome things. Let them restore the pure dramatic faith and reinstate their apostolic writers with Shakspeare as the great high priest of their profession. If they do it not themselves, then let the voice of society be, cast them out! Reform, and give to the drama the functions of its mission.

Music.

OUR HOME COMPOSERS.

The musical editor, whom we expect by the first conveyance from the south, in writing to the office says: I have carefully reviewed the composition, "Do they pray for me at home." There is considerable merit contained in the musical subject, but the words are, in style, metre, poetical feet and sentiment, too much like the ballad, "Do they think of me at home." Our principal object in publishing music from home authors, especially in the case of our amateurs, is to stir up the creative powers of our own poets and musicians. For these reasons we have invited them to send us their compositions for publication; but we must have original music and poetry. We are willing to revise, correct and publish creative merit, but composers must study the rules of poetical and musical forms; and the musician must also become acquainted with progressive harmonizations, i.e., the relationship of harmonies and the preparation and resolution of discords that require such treatment.

Hints to Poets.—In connection with the subject of home authors and musical compositions, I would advise poets never to take a song or ballad for a pattern, for if they do they are almost sure to catch the spirit and style of the pattern, thereby causing non-originality. Hint second.—Those who have the talent for poetry should study, at least, a few of its rules, namely, metre, and the most efficient method of using the poetical feet, both separate and in mixture; for they may depend that the acquirement of such knowledge would not only add beauty to their inspirations, but would bring out all the originality that is required by genius. They must also avoid in simple forms for music-setting, the imperfection of displacing the feet in the second or following verses. Every line in all the verses should correspond in feet with the first. Although the practice of changing the position of feet does not alter the metre, it causes some difficulty to the amateur musician when reading music at sight, should three or more verses be printed under one set of notes. If the feet are changed, we find in one verse one note and one syllable, and in the next two syllables in the same position for this one note. In order to make it singable, the musical composer must add another note. On the other hand, should there be two syllables and two notes in the first verse and only one in the second, the slur must be used. This is perplexing to some readers, and in fact no musician is partial to the form. When all the verses are printed with the music under them, it is not noticed. We are quite aware that, to avoid this imperfection, more labor will be required to find suitable words. These remarks apply only to the simple forms. At some future opportunity I will again take up this subject.

The letter of the author of "Do They Pray for Me at Home," published in No. 4 of this volume, is an excellent epistle and his musical composition has much talent. The writer must try again and select original poetry. With a little study he will make a good composer, but I must be honest when reviewing compositions for publication.

I have also received the Magazine containing Master Daynes' anthem, "Praise Ye the Lord." It is a clever little thing, showing much genius and many mistakes. There are consecutive fifths in similar motion and in the most dangerous positions. Upon this subject musical authors write strongly and the errors which the talented youth has committed are worse in ecclesiastical music than in secular, because the style is so strict. There is also a doubled unison in two parts, and many other points which I have no time now to mention.

Both for the sake of the musical character of the Magazine and also to afford instruction to our home authors on the science of composition, on my arrival in the city I will review the musical pages of the Magazine, including the compositions from Professors Careless, Pratt and Thomas, as well as those from our amateur authors. The object will be for the benefit of those who are desirous of mastering the science and becoming musical composers, whether professional or amateur, and it must be remembered that no person can become truly a composer without mastering the science, at least so far as he uses its forms. It is not necessary for a musician to have solved all the problems of the science, but at least the simple forms and rudiments of composition must be understood before a man can even attempt musical authorship with safety. Indeed, if errors in music are published they must be corrected, for musical theory has no latitude and margin for errors. The composition is either correct or incorrect. Science in its fundamental rules is strict and receives no excuses. If Professors Careless, Pratt or Thomas permit their pieces to be published with errors of composition in them, I shall take the liberty to point them out, and shall take great pleasure in publishing any review of my own from some other pen. Our reviews will thus be rendered not depreciatory of the compositions, but mutually instructive.

ATTRACTIVENESS OF CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

The Christian Banner and Tract Journal upon this subject says:

The attractiveness of congregational singing does not consist in its cheapness. Perhaps we should say it ought not to consist in this. Congregational singing that is practised because it is cheap, will be cheap singing. It requires a good choir that is willing to do its duty as a servant of the assembly in the matter of worship, and a good organ or other powerful instrument. It requires a liberal expenditure of time in congregational rehearsals.

The attractiveness of congregational singing does not consist in its carelessness, uncouthness or utter disregard of musical correctness, and correctness of pronunciation.

The attractiveness of congregational singing consists in its magnificent volume of sound. Call it noise if you please; but it is grand. Its very quantity buries up defects. It is only half-way congregational singing that offends the ear. What goes by this name is often little more than dispersed choir-singing, where the few who sing are separated from each other by the many who hear and criticise the several solitary performers; but when one great tide of music floods the whole assembly, drawing out the timid and covering up those who ought to be timid, then we are attracted, captivated.

Another attraction is the heartiness and sociality of congregational singing. For an assembly to read together is something; but how leaden is the ring of their voices till they strike together into a musical note, and then into a full and swelling harmony of notes! This brings them together in heart as well as voice. Can two sing together a hymn of praise, and have war in their hearts?

Here, then, is power to be used over the world for Christ. We want to draw the masses into our churches. Have we tried fairly the attractiveness of singing God's praise with the loud and hearty voice of the whole congregation? We have in this country, in Mr. Beecher's church, probably the finest model of congregational singing in the world; we have many other admirable examples of it; but we have, it seems to us, hardly begun to realize the attractiveness, to "those that are without," of this branch of the worship of God.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;
OR,
NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE DUEL IN THE OLD MONASTERY.

In spite of all his efforts to throw it off, since the arrival of his uncle's letter, a presentiment of the approach of a night troubled and black in his life, had rested upon Sir Walter Templar. It came over him on the revelation of Terese's love, when he also found the everlasting chains that linked them together, but in the short interval of bliss that succeeded, he was numbed with ecstacy against the foreboding instinct within. But now again it ruled him. He felt the night of his life approaching, and it fascinated him horribly as the night of each day drew him by a kindred spell to the old ruined monastery. When there, he was in the very magic circle of superstition and family compacts, leaning against the broken altar where Sir Richard Courtney and Lord Frederick De Lacy, more than a quarter of a century before, took their vows of everlasting friendship and family union. No wonder that in such a place, with all the complications and crossings around him, he gave way to weird intuitions and dark forebodings of the future.

Approaching the old ruins, a figure, looking tall in statnre, glides along and, through the intangibleness of night, seems in physical substance thin as a cloud. A sable cloak is drawn tightly around him, and a broad slouched beaver, conceals his lean but prominent and sharply moulded face. His footstep awakes no echo to startle the sinister silence of the neighborhood, heightened by the gloom of a dark November night. 'Tis Snap. He is there first, for it is a policy with him to let nothing miscarry for lack of foresight and precautions. He is the master magician of the night, unseen to direct the whole—Satan's high priest to officiate in the ceremonies of the deed designed. The charm of superstitious associations resting upon Sir Walter Templar rests not over him. He is there to solve problems. They are human ones. If demons, ghostly monks or other incorporeal beings appeared, he would meet them in a scientific spirit and attempt to solve them too.

Approaching the old ruins next is the foster-brother of Terese. He is also muffled in a cloak with a hat slouched over his brow. Measured are his steps and firm, but it is evident that within the lava tides are raging, for his hand ever and anon seeks his side as if to clutch something beneath his cloak. He plants himself firmly in the ruins and leans against a marble column.

"Poor wretch!" said Snap to himself, as he observed him from his concealment. "Of all the teeming millions of human beings, there are at this moment only three in whom I am interested," mused the mentor sentimentally. "They are Templar, Farinelli and my old master's son. I am as indifferent to the rest as though they existed not. These three alone I feel for, care for. I wish I could give them a better solving, though. This stupid murdering—ugh!"

Just then the foster-brother started from the column against which he reclined and paced for a moment excitedly the marble floor, threw open his cloak, disencumbered his hand that held a long dagger in a convulsive grip of iron, and again planted himself firmly by the marble pillar.

"Ha!" said Snap, mentally, "he hears the long, strong, haughty step of Templar in the distance. The fellow comes as though he would challenge Fate herself with his coming."

The mentor was right. Sir Walter Templar was now approaching the monastery, his whole bearing haughty and imperious. It was his last night in Italy, and he came to a spot where a superstitious instinct and the associations of the place gathered a host of antagonistic fates against him: he came to wrestle with, and defy them. He was outside of love's gentleness now, and nought of caresses or drooping was in the temper of his spirit there.

March and countermarch, haughty and strong—to and fro in the aisle of those sombre ruins, like a fearless sentinel, strode Sir Walter Templar. His every step a proclamation of his presence—his every march up and down the aisle imperious defiance.

Several times the foster-brother stole towards him. On that marble floor the language of his footsteps was counter to that of our hero. In soundless utterance they spake,

> "Thou sure and firm-set earth
> Hear not my steps which way they walk, for fear
> The very stones prate of my whereabouts."

But as often as he approached he returned as stealthily back to his post abashed. He was no prowling assassin. "Withered murder" was but the horrid form into which the poor foster-brother, like the distracted Othello, was breathing the soul of sentiment.

Twice, as Templar unknowingly advanced towards him, he seemed resolved to meet him boldly and proclaim himself, and then for the strife between them. This he would have done, but the Magician of the night was there to rule him by his superior will.

Just as the foster-brother drew himself firmly up and was about to boldly confront his foe, charge him concerning his foster-sister, and force him to an encounter, the mentor's soft, solicitous "My good Farinelli!" was breathed into his ear.

The singer knew that voice in a moment, and though so unexpected it startled him not.

"Hist! Hear you not voices? They are coming this way, Farinelli."

"Ha!" ejaculated the foster-brother in an under tone.

"My good Farinelli, trust yourself to me."

And he took him by the hand and led him outside the monastery.

Farinelli's movements were noiseless with effort, but the mentor was noiseless without effort. His presence there was as strong in its noiseless expression, as Sir Walter Templar's was in emphasis.

"What do they here, Signor? Is all Rome summoned to witness? Well, let them. I'll strike him in the presence of Rome. My foster sister shall be saved. I will challenge him with the wrong designed her and strike him as I challenge. I will kill him, Signor. Why lead me here? My dagger would have found his heart ere now."

The desperate mood of the foster-brother, which had been partly worked up by the sense of the humiliation and abhorrence he felt in killing Templar as would the common assassin, suited not the purpose of the master mind that was leading his soul to the brink of its perdition. Though the subtle tempter had made it so apparent to the foster-brother that unless he struck down Sir Walter Templar, Terese would become his mistress, yet he himself was not so assured of that case. True, Sir Herbert thought so, and Orsini had readily accepted his view, but the Mentor was of a "learned spirit." Priest of Satan though he was, he had much more faith in humanity than many a theologian who makes man's innate depravity his cardinal doctrine. Moreover he had studied the character of Sir Walter Templar, and knew him.

"Let me return, Signor, I say," remonstrated the singer, trying restively to slip away from the soft firm hold that restrained him. But it was only soft when in repose, as though no grip of the Mentor held him; when he tried to break away then it waxed firm, tightening when the singer resisted, releasing as he relaxed.

"Nay, nay, my good Farinelli; be not rash."

"By my soul, Signor, if you loose not your hold I will strangle you."

"Strangle your enemy, not your friend, my good Farinelli; and that you may not fail, be not rash."

"While he lives my foster-sister is in danger, signor. If you are a friend, loose your hold and let me grapple with him."

"Well, go; but be not rash, my good Farinelli."

Snap relaxed his hold upon the foster-brother without altogether disengaging him, and returned to the monastery with him. The party whose clamorous voices had been heard was by this time inside the ruins. He knew they were Orsini and his companions, among whom was Sir Herbert Blakely, and that Farinelli would at least for a time be superseded.

The mentor's programme was all arranged. He had resolved that Orsini and his dissolute fiery companions should make the first attack on Templar. Theirs would be scientific. They would fight like gentlemen. Several of the party led on by Orsini had resolved to challenge the skill of Sir Walter Templar as a swordsman, upon the strength of his having once braved them. Snap took exquisite pleasure in anything cleverly done, and to see the mastery of Templar challenged and tested in a scientific manner, suited exactly his taste. Could he be solved thus,—well; if not, then the foster-brother's dagger; but he had resolved to save the poor fellow, if possible, from murder. He would fashion his evil to his taste, and ruffianly murder was not to his taste—it offended his intellect. If it was determined by his god, Necessity, that the foster-brother should kill, then he had doomed him to the damning deed, but if not, he would save him, and with his goodwill he might gain his foster-sister as reward for trusting him. He would scientifically cut and torture to kill or cure his patient, like a surgeon: but his very skill was a friendly guarantee that the best would be done for him.

As soon as they were inside the old monastery again, the mentor left the side of the foster-brother and sought Sir Herbert Blakely among the crowd of gallants who were gathering around Templar, as he stood near the broken altar, like Night, in his mood of haughty silence, waiting to know what meant their presence in such a place at such a time. He had recognized Orsini's voice and thought it might have meaning to himself.

Templar found himself surrounded with the identical crowd of gallants already introduced in their revels pledging Terese, the new and triumphant prima donna. One of them carried a flaming torch, the light of which he threw on the young Englishman.

"Ha! comrades, what have we here? An adventure found, by the mass!" exclaimed Orsini, as they gathered around Sir Walter.

"Some ghostly monk at service, Orsini, I'll wager," exclaimed another, insolently.

"It would seem so, for he is at his altar, and looking solemn and ghostly enough. Throw the light of the torch nearer, Count." said Orsini to the torch bearer.

"Nay, gallant friends, as I am a soldier, carry it not thus. 'Tis the young Englishman with whom we have already made an interesting acquaintance," remonstrated the Marquis of Baglioni, whom they called the Benedict.

Walter Templar had drawn his sword, planted himself with his back to the broken altar, and confronted the Italians with an air of supreme defiance. There was neither fear of their numbers, nor excitement at their presence in him, but a fierce spirit and instinct of antagonism that gave him by its very strength calmness and a feeling of mastery. They could not have found him in a better mood.

"Well, gentlemen—noble gentlemen!" he said at length, tauntingly, "commence your assault. Ay, come all together. Or do you intend to play the ruffian first, Count Orsini?"

The fiery Italian's sword leaped from its resting-place like a flash of lightning, while Templar, in calm defiance, stood on his guard.

"Nay, gentlemen, not thus," interposed the Benedict, and then addressing Sir Walter gallantly,

"On the honor of a soldier, signor, we come to fight you like gentlemen. When you were last in our presence you vaunted your skill as a swordsman. We are piqued to a test of it."

"You were insolent and threatening to me, signor, I beg you to remember, and I brook not such. Be pleased to take my re-assertion, if you come to give a like provocation," answered Templar.

"Signor, we must crave your pardon. We knew not you were of our class, and committed a mistake for which we apologise."

"Speak for yourself, Marquis; speak for yourself, Baglioni," shouted dissenting voices.

"I believe I am speaking for gentlemen; and if any of my gallant companions doubt that I am speaking for myself, on my honor as a soldier I shall take pleasure in settling that point."

"No dispute among ourselves, brave friends," said Sir Herbert. "It is due to my countryman. The Marquis is right."

"Baglioni is right," joined in Orsini. Let him speak in reason for us."

"Let the Benedict speak for us!" echoed the rest, for they were ashamed, when challenged upon the point, to outrage their own notions of the code of honor.

Sir Walter Templar, now that his caste had been discovered, and his identity since tacitly accepted by himself in society, was another man to be treated with than the unknown artist for whom they had first taken him. The Benedict again politely addressed him:

"Sir Walter Templar, allow my noble friends through me to apologise for our mistake; and at the same time to claim that, as we threatened you and you braved us, we come to mutual goodwill by crossing swords."

"Right willingly, Marquis; as many of you as wish it," replied Templar, relaxing from his haughty bearing to one of cordial politeness.

"On my honor, Sir Walter, I shall be proud to cross swords with you."

"I return your compliment, Marquis. Shall I have the honor of your sword first?"

"That claim is mine, Sir Walter," quickly put in Orsini. "You will remember, gallant friends, that the Englishman and myself were principals in the affair in question."

"Yes, yes; let Orsini take the lead," agreed the company, knowing both the skill and fiery courage of the Count, who was a famous duelist.

While the combatants were stripping for the contest, which the vindictive Orsini had resolved if possible to make fatal to his antagonist, but Templar merely to vanquish his, the others were choosing a place for the fight, and planting the torch so as to throw a clear and equal light upon the swordsmen.

"Orsini," whispered Sir Herbert Blakely aside, when all was ready, "Remember, you fight with one who has vanquished you several times already, braved you in public with his defiance, vanquished you, especially, in the case of the prima donna."

"I shall not play the fool, Blakely," the Italian hissed in his ear.

"Be cool, Orsini," returned Sir Herbert.

"Be marble, Count" added the mentor who was by Blakely's side to prompt if necessary.

"Templar is planted like an iron statue. Meet him as a marble one, Count."

"Thank you, my good friend, for your counsel," returned the Italian noble to the mentor, who, though he was known to be not a man of rank, was accepted in the character he sustained to Sir Herbert, and respected as a man of superior intellect and subtle wisdom.

"I like not the mood of Templar," observed Snap aside, when Orsini left them to open the combat.

"No; by the fiend, as you say, he is like an iron statue. I had calculated on his impulsive nature giving us some advantage."

"And yet," said the mentor, "that iron statue is just as full of force. It is the master antagonist. We have found him in a mood to meet and combat all opposed to him."

"Ready, Sir Walter," at this moment came from Orsini.

"Ah! their swords cross, Sir Herbert. Let us draw near them."

And the combatants commenced their sword-play which, unless Templar proved the master, was designed to be fatal to him.

They fought with equal skill and coolness. It was evident that as swordsmen they were well matched. The utmost elaborations of sword science were at the fingers' ends of each. Orsini was as cool as Templar, for he was fighting, and coolness is the discipline of the duelist—a cardinal point of his art; yet Walter fought with more than coolness. There was a conscious mastery in him, not emphasised at first, but to the analytic mentor, who loved to note the metaphysics of things, this consciousness of mastery was more certain because unemphasised at first. But this superiority, which none of the on-lookers, except Snap, could detect, was not in his superiority of skill as a swordsman. In that Orsini was decided, by all who were watching with interest the combatants, to be the young Englishman's equal at least; and excepting that there was power expressed in the large but well-chiseled hand and in the finely wrought steely fibres of the wrist, there seemed to be no advantage possessed by Sir Walter over his antagonist. Nor could this physical power, in such a scientific sword-match, avail much, for the Italian lacked nothing and his great practice gave him all the power of hand and wrist that their combat could require. Yet it was in this personal superiority, physical and metaphysical, of the young Englishman, that the mentor discerned the mastery. It was the superiority of Sir Walter Templar's self above Count Orsini's self—the superior individuality and nature of the one above the other. The philosophic Snap well knew that if they were equally matched in skill as swordsmen, then Templar was the master, for he could put himself into his sword. The mastery would then pass from the equality of sword-skill to their inequality of nature and character—equal as swordsmen, unequal as men. And thus it was.

For a long time they fought without either having shown the least advantage in the play. At first the simple aim of both was to test each other's skill and master each other's points. Orsini was the first to show the decided intentions of a duel, and from that moment the heart of his antagonist was the constant aim of his sword. But Templar was in no hurry, careful in his guards, confident in his defence. He had matched the swordsman; he was now mastering the man.

At length suddenly came a new phase in the combat. Both had mastered each other's sword theory, and were satisfied with their test; but Templar had mastered the man also, and from that point they were unequal. This was seen by the lookers-on but not understood, and Orsini felt something suddenly introduced that was new and eccentric. There was now more than sword theory brought into the play. Templar had inspiration in his nature, and he was now inspiring his sword with his genius.

The chief distinctive quality of Napoleon the Great was that he was one of the types of that same family to which belong the poet and the rest of the creative and intuitive natures. He wrote his epics not on paper, but on the battle-field and in the affairs of the great world. Like the poet he created his characters and called them marshals, princes, kings, and with them elaborated his stupendous compositions.

Thus was it now in some degree with Walter Templar; he was composing with his sword, and Orsini could no more match him than could the host of experienced generals stand against Napoleon with all their science of war. No longer was he the iron antagonist. Life and soul were in the combat; less of coolness and more of danger to each. He dashed to his finale. It was reached; Orsini's sword was conquered, and Templar's touched with light design the region of his antagonist's heart.

"Count Orsini, I have observed that your sword has constantly sought my heart with a design to kill. You failed. This is the first time that mine has sought yours, excepting for your points of play. My aim is reached. I give you your life, Sir Count, as my revenge."

"Insolent boaster!" hissed Orsini, palpitating with passion, "give me the privilege of my sword again, and kill me if you can. I claim it, signor. I will not have my life at your gift."

"You have no right to claim your sword again, Count Orsini."

"By my soul, but I have, signor. I demand my sword again, unless you are disposed to run me through in cold blood. I will not have my life at your hand," said Orsini, fiercely.

"And I refuse to fight you again of my free will, Count."

"By Satan, you shall, sir Englishman, or take the advantage that was yours. Fight me again and kill me if you can, as I will certainly do by you," he said savagely.

"Sir Count, I am no duelist. I will not, if I can help it, have the life-blood of a human being on my hands."

"Mawkish sentimentalist!" sneered the Italian, and then continued with concentrated hate, "It shall not save you from the alternative. Fight me again or kill me. You shall, though I have to strike you to provoke it."

"Carry it not thus, Orsini. On my honor as a soldier—"

"Your pardon, Marquis. One moment," interrupted Templar, and then he addressed his antagonist sternly:

"Now mark me, Count. I will give you the privilege of your sword again, if you persist; but as sure as there is a heaven above us, if you claim the hazard of my life again I will not take yours, but I will disfigure you for all your days to come."

Templar turned from Orsini to Baglioni and said:

"Marquis, I resign the affair into your hands as a man of honor."

"Orsini, you have nothing to complain of the Englishman. As I am a soldier his conduct to you is handsome. You have lost nothing of your reputation for skill. The saints defend us, I never saw such play. I should consider it no disgrace to be overmatched by Sir Walter Templar."

Sir Herbert Blakely, seeing that Orsini dared not brave such emphatic opinion of his companions, even if he defied the disfigurement threatened, led him, beside himself with rage, away.

"Marquis, shall I have the honor of your sword next?" courteously asked Templar.

"Sir Walter, I shall be proud to fight with you," returned Baglioni, with delight.

The character of the Marquis Baglioni was generous, reckless, inclined to gay dissipation, but full of a sense of native honor. He loved his profession, and would sooner fight than leave it alone. He had no spleen against those he fought, had a contempt for a match with one who was not his equal, and as now would be in ecstacy to cross a superior sword.

The new combat now began, and was a fine display of swordsmanship. Neither sought each other's life, and when they had done each other's skill sufficient credit, Templar said:

"Marquis, I propose we end our play as equals. What say you?"

"On my honor, you are a right gallant fellow, signor. I have no doubt, had you played with me as you did with Orsini, I should have been beaten."

"You do yourself injustice, Marquis. I have fought you with all my skill, and you have equaled me."

"I can not believe that, signor. You have not fought me as you fought Orsini."

They were both right. Templar had fought the Marquis with all his skill, but he had not put his inspiration into his sword nor composed with his weapon for the grand finale—victory, for he willed not to humble his gallant, generous antagonist. Had not the Marquis matched him in sword-play, the advantage would have been Sir Walter's; but Baglioni and Orsini were counted the best swordsmen in Rome, and Templar never felt a disposition to conquer, only with those who thought to master him or stood against him in malicious enmity. So the combatants ended their fight as equals.

Those who had come out against the young Englishman with considerable ill-will, now flocked around him and shook him by the hand with mingled expressions of admiration and apology.

"Sir Walter Templar, I shall be proud to cultivate your acquaintance in a more social manner," said the Marquis.

"And I! and I! and I!" went round with acclamation from all excepting Orsini and Blakely, who had withdrawn.

"Gentlemen, I thank you with the cordiality of your own spirit; but I leave Rome to-morrow, and that is the reason why you found me here to-night, busy with my own thoughts and affairs."

"Sir Walter, we must beg your pardon, then, for our intrusion."

"Name it not, Marquis. It has diverted me."

"And to us, friends all, a most agreeable meeting. Eh, my brave companions?"

"Most interesting! Delightful! Right gallant!" and similar expressions from the company, was the reply to the Marquis.

"And now, my friends, let us relieve the Englishman of our intrusion. Sir Walter, should you visit Rome again, it will give me pleasure to meet you in our circle."

"So with us all! So with us all! Baglioni utters the sentiments of us all!"

And the gay, dashing young Italian nobles respectfully left the presence of Walter Templar. They were "not all dross."

But Walter was not alone. Unseen—undreamt of, two still were with him in the sombre ruins of that old monastery. They were the foster-brother and the magician of the night—Snap, the mentor.

CHAPTER XXIII.

CRUSHED AND BLEEDING.

Unseen, the foster-brother had watched the combat between Templar and those who had come against him to battle with, and overwhelm him. At once he perceived that the meeting was designed on their part, so far as its hostile features were marked, and that, at least with Orsini, there was a determination to kill the young Englishman. Moreover, the presence of Blakely was a sufficient cue to direct conspiracy to that end, though evidently, from the conduct of the Marquis Baglioni and the rest of the young nobles, the conspiracy extended no farther than Orsini and Blakely. The others had merely a common hostility that imperiled life only in the ordinary sense of a duel, and the Marquis had manifested the reckless and generous gallantry of a soldier, with no malice in the fight. With the presence of the assailants Farinelli readily connected the mentor and himself, and saw that they were all actors in a regularly arranged drama, and that the master mind of the mentor was its author, and the rest of those engaged playing their parts in the dark; but whether Orsini was in the secret of the whole pre-arranged affair, or like himself, only partly so, he could not tell. As for himself, he was only acting his own part, without any reference to others, though he had perceived that he who tempted him had a secret desire for the removal of Templar; but the foster-brother had not known that even he would be at the old ruined monastery that night. Yet now, as he took in the scenes as they progressed and the characters as they came on, the mentor arose before him as the chief designer and master spirit that ruled the action against Sir Walter. Nor could he well fail to discern that his own attack on Templar had been restrained with the direct intention to remove his enemy by another instrument if possible. For this the foster-brother felt grateful, and an increase of confidence in the good-will of the mentor towards himself, though, to do Farinelli justice, he would have preferred to attack his rival himself, and strike the blow, as he in his jealous delusion conceived, for the honor of his foster-sister.

As Farinelli, from out the gloom that mantled the old monastery, hid in the ghastly obscurity made by the smoky glimmering of the torch, watched the combat between Templar and Orsini, a trembling came over him, and the chill of the cold, damp atmosphere around crept like a slimy creature through his blood. It was not fear that thus relaxed him from the intensity that had kept him impervious; but the very mastery of Templar, as it conquered Orsini, also by sympathy conquered him, and subdued the excitement that had toned him to his deed. He felt the imperial antagonism of Templar's superior self as much as Orsini, who was fighting with him. The keen remembrance of Walter's superiority over him years before at their first meeting, when as foster-brother Beppo he flew like a tiger at him, and was only saved from the rending lion by his gentle foster-sister, and the realization of how absolutely and without effort of rivalry Templar had mastered him in his dominion over his foster-sister, again subdued him. He feared not; still was he resolved upon an attack: but he felt he dared not challenge an open issue between himself and Walter Templar, and risk upon his defeat the safety, as he considered, of his foster-sister. He abhorred to strike like a common assassin, but he dared not risk a defiant combat.

Walter Templar is leaning against the broken altar; his sword still unsheathed lying on the ground, and the voices of the gallants are dying in the distance. The mentor again is by the side of the foster brother, whose hand he grasps with a strong-nerved grip, and whispers in his ear:

"Be like a thunderbolt!"

The foster-brother was starting towards Templar with too much emphasis, which the mentor felt in the electric shock through the hand he griped.

"But thunder not, my good Farinelli, till you hurl your bolt!" he cautioned, releasing him to his purpose.

Again the foster-brother stole towards Templar with noiseless tread over the marble floor. Step by step, until his presence was near enough to be felt though not seen by Templar in the utter darkness around; for the moon, which had occasionally been peeping into the old ruins, now hid herself in "the blanket of the dark," and looked not upon the scene. Suddenly, like a thunderbolt hurled against the spot where he had marked that Walter stood—suddenly an unearthly voice rang in the old monastery:

"For my foster-sister!"

There was such a mixture of pathos, horror and vengeance in the cry that Templar took in its startlingness without its import, as he started from his reclining position to feel the pang of the sharp dagger in the bloody furrowed hand that turned its point from his heart. The wrist which he caught by instinct rather than design, was crushed as beneath a mailed hand, and the dagger fell ringing to the floor. But Farinelli was unconsious almost of the pain of his imprisoned wrist, in his great struggle and the intense spirit of deadly strife that made him like unto a demon. His left hand fiercely leapt at the throat of his rival—it was the grip of their first meeting—as he threw his whole weight upon him to bear him to the ground. But Templar was now terrible in his rage. He deemed his foe a common assassin set on by Orsini, and was no longer restrained by the courtesy of open and equal combat. Quick as lightning he changed the imprisoned wrist of Farinelli to his left hand, and with the bleeding one that had turned aside the dagger, gripped the wrist of the hand which held his throat, and then with all his might crushed it as in a vice, and with a wrench that tortured his foe he tore the paralyzed hand from his throat. A moment he held him thus, the hot breath of each scorching the other's face and both gathering all their strength to the issue. Suddenly he jerked down the arms of his assailant, pinioned them to their sides, and with main force caught him up and hurled him off, hissing with guttural fiereeness, "Assassin!"

No fierce response rung in the old ruins, for Templar's assailant fell at some distance from him, broken, bleeding and senseless.

Had Walter recognized the foster-brother, there would have been a far different termination. He would have protected himself, but would have held him powerless until he had undeceived him. Respect for the deep love of the poor fellow for his foster-sister would have disarmed resentment, for he was too confident in his dominion over Terese to feel rivalry. Had Farinelli boldly challenged him, he would have learned that Terese was to be Sir Walter Templar's wife, not his mistress—or perchance an unhappy sister to weep for and lavish a brother's love upon, but not to avenge.

The marble floor of the old monastery proclaimed the crushing fall of his foe, and he knew that he was senseless, perhaps dead, but, as he deemed him a common assassin, he felt neither humanity towards him nor further desire to hurt. Disgust not enmity he bestowed on his broken foe. It was too much for him to be the good Samaritan to an assassin. There was much of tenderness in Templar's nature, and his soul was full of poetry and sentiment, but there was in him also a haughty severity of character that made him as a strong expression of justice, not only against others but against himself as well. His life was struck at and he had crushed the striker, nor condescended to notice him further, but left him to the fate he had provoked. Thus he remained in ignorance that the foster-brother was his assailant.

Walter left the monastery in a spirit of gloomy reverie. It was his last night in Rome. On the morrow he designed to leave for his native land. That last night was an omnious one.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE OLD JEW.

"Bolt the shutters, good Levi. Aye, be very certain you bolt them safely. 'Fast bind, fast find.' Caution, Levi, becomes our race."

Thus spoke an aged Hebrew, as he stood by his door with a flickering lamp, watching his man-servant securing his shop-windows, across which he bolted heavy iron bars.

"That is well, good Levi. I think no prowling Christian can break into the old Jew's dwelling."

"The Gentile dogs!" growled the man-servant.

"Wolves, good Levi, wolves. Such have I found them."

"The curse of our tribe be on them."

"Nay, good Levi, curse them not."

"Have they not blighted your life, my master?"

"Thou art right, good Levi. They have,—robbed me of my gold and sent my children into exile. Father Abraham, shall I ever find them? But curse not the Christian, Levi; 'tis the heritage of our race to suffer wrongs."

"Hark, my master," suddenly exclaimed the servant, as the old Jew was about to enter his door.

"Ha! groans. Some bloody business is abroad. In, in, good Levi," cried the old man, in affright, after listening for an instant.

"Footsteps are approaching, and the groans more distinct," returned the servant.

"In, in, good Levi. 'Tis some ruse to trap us. Let us secure the door. In, in."

"Help, help, old man!" cried a voice at this moment.

"Haste, Levi, close the door. Bar it quickly. They would rob us, murder us. The God of David be praised!" sighed the ancient, as his servant threw the iron bar across the massive door, which would have stood a long siege, ere it would have given way to admit an intruder.

"Help, help, old man!" again cried the voice from without. It was the voice of the mentor, who almost exhausted laid Farinelli down at the old Jew's door.

"Help, help, old man, for a wounded dog. No answer? Help for a wounded fellow-creature, then, old man. Help, I say, or I will beat humanity into your heathenish dwelling," continued Snap, with more wrath than was his wont, as he laid heavily on to the door with vigorous blows.

"What would you with the old Jew?' at length returned a tremulous voice through a small iron grating at the side, which seemed to have been made on purpose for cautious inquiries to untimely visitors.

"Open the door," commanded Snap, in answer.

"God of Jacob, would you break into my house? Come to-morrow, my son, come to-morrow. 'Tis past midnight. I can do no business till the morn."

"Nay, nay, father; 'tis a poor wounded fellow, and I can carry him no farther. No harm is designed to you."

"Father Abraham preserve us!" said the old Jew, as he unbarred the door, but threw not off the chain which still partly secured it.

"Fear not, old man, but let me bear my wounded friend into your dwelling. I too am a Jew. Bring your lamp to my face. See you not the stamp of our race upon me?"

"By the staff of Jacob, thou sayest truly! Thou art indeed of Israel. I took thee for a Gentile."

"The dogs," growled Levi from behind his master, who now with eagerness opened his door to admit the stranger.

"Come in, my son. Is thy wounded friend, too, a Hebrew!"

"Nay, father, but he is a fellow-creature as sure as you and I are Jews", replied Snap, as he bore Farinelli into the house.

Levi again secured the door; and then the venerable Hebrew led his visitor through a long dark passage into a back room of the house, where the wounded singer was laid upon a couch.

In the seeming accidents and chances of life there is ofttimes a fate, or what the reverent-minded more fitly call a providence. The rationale of that providence none can give,—the methods of that fate none can trace in its infinite detail. Yet there is no thinking person who cannot trace out some providence, some fate, some miscalled chance in his or her life, in which there is a wondrous method, as if invisible agencies were overruling all, according to a special design for each individual case. Is it wholly improbable, then, that the departed members of our own families—our grandfathers, grandmothers, fathers and mothers—work out a great deal of this individual providence?

Perhaps such had been the case in Snap's bearing the wounded singer to the house of the old Jew, for that venerable man was no less important a personage in our story than Isaac Ben Ammon, the grandfather of Terese, whose exile to Siberia we have before related.

But, supposing some member of that ghostly realm to have prompted Snap to bear the wounded Farinelli to old Isaac's abode, what has the mentor to do with Ben Ammon,—what with Terese, the Hebrew maiden?

We shall see.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELPS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Troches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

THE FIRST LOVE OF HENRY IV.

WATCHING.

At noon when old Lucas came in from the castle-garden to dinner, he said: "Who can have done me that trick? The unbidden gardener has been at work again, laid off the beds well, levelled them well, and begun to set out a few flowers. Early as I came out, the work was finished, and the gardener invisible. I have watched the whole day, and yet discovered nothing. The matter is far from plain. He who works must do so by night, in the starlight.

Not until the evening, when she came with the pitcher to the Garenne fountain, did it occur to Florette, that the young prince might possibly be the gardener. For it was from this very direction that he had come in the morning from the garden to her window.

When the court returned from the fête at sundown, Henry had nothing more pleasant to do, than to ramble through the whole castle-garden. He came to the Garenne fountain and found there Florette's hat lying. He took it up; he pressed it to his breast; he kissed it. In the gathering darkness, he plucked the most beautiful flowers wherever he found them, fetched from the castle a pretty sky-blue ribbon, and wove the flowers into a sort of wreath around the hat. Then he slipped to the gardener's house. There the windows were closed. All slept. He hung the hat beside the window.

On the following morning, contrary to every custom of the house, and contrary to her usual habit, Florette had risen before sun-up. She had formed the firm resolve of doing her old father a pleasure, by discovering and betraying the nightly gardener. Besides, she was a little curious herself, although young girls usually are not in the least so. She had perhaps one more thought too, which she told no one, and therefore no one has a right to know.

When she had dressed in the quietest manner possible, and opened the window, she saw the hat with its sky-blue ribbon, and its wilderness of flowers about it. Now she was reminded that she had left her hat lying by the garden-fountain the evening before. She first smiled upon the flowers and the ribbons, then assumed a more serious look.

"Ah!" sighed she, "then he has been there before me. He has been here too already."

Whom she particularly meant by that he she said not.

She looked at the flowers just once more, loosened them, put them in a vessel of pure water, folded the sky-blue ribbon, and added to her otherwise simple dress. Then she mounted into the window, and from the window down upon the little bench, and from the bench to the ground. It is very true that the building was furnished with a regular house-door, but that was yet closed and could not be opened without a noise.

Then she went across the bridge and again remained irresolute. "I certainly came too late. Father says he only works by star-light, and already all the stars are set, and it is almost sun-rise. Already all the bushes are glowing with the morning red. I came too late." So thought she, and determined again to turn around, yet still kept going forwards from the banks of the Baize to the garden. She heard the splashing of the fountain. Already she saw the freshly laid out flower-beds around, through the thicket. Yes, with joyful alarm she caught sight of a spade, on the ground near one of the beds. "Then he cannot be far off, since his working implement is still here. He is not here himself, though, or I could see him plainly. Perhaps he has only gone to dig up flowers to transplant here. I will hide myself, I will watch for him." So thought Florette, and went softly, lightly through the dewy grass, behind a tall green wall of elm trees, through whose green foliage she could perceive, unobserved, everything that approached the Garenne fountain.

As she stood there in concealment her heart beat violently. For, if the morning wind sported gently with the leaves she believed she saw the movements of some one coming. And if a bird hopped about and fluttered away, she fancied she heard foot-steps. Her fears, however, all proved groundless.

for she saw nobody coming, no matter how sharply and attentively she kept her eyes on the watch.

THE SURPRISE.

Suddenly two hands were softly laid upon her eyes, and held them fast shut; but they were strange hands, not her own. The poor child was very much frightened. And a voice whispered in her ears: "Now guess, Florette, who is it?" She had already guessed. For as she attempted to draw away the strange hands, which came from behind, from before her eyes, she felt a ring upon the hand of a youth. She did not speak her thought though, but said, laughing. "I know you well. You are Jacqueline; and on this finger is the ring Lubin gave you."

"You are mistaken!" whispered the voice again behind her "And because you do not guess who I am, I have the right to punish you." And the lips which whispered this, pressed a kiss upon Florette's beautiful neck. She seemed very sensitive indeed under the punishment, for she suddenly tried to extricate herself. But she was so encircled that she could not move.

Seeing her efforts all in vain, she said: "Let me go, Minette, you bad girl. Now I know you. You will retaliate upon me my own jest, shutting your eyes three weeks ago, when you were in the height of your talk with Colos."

"Mistaken again!" whispered the voice once more, and again the voice altered, punishing with three kisses this time the soft, curved neck.

Florette shrank at each kiss, and begged for freedom, but obtained it not. Yet after all, she did not seem so very earnest in her wish, for why did she not name him who she knew it to be. It could only have been through some strange caprice, for pretty girls are sometimes very capricious.

She even invited the punishment a third time, by saying: "Then, it is nobody else but Rosina Valdes, the worst, most mischievous creature in the whole town and neighborhood, at whom I threw almonds yesterday, through the open window of her room, where she sat thinking, heaven knows, about whom. You were frightened at the shower of almonds were you not, and thought the sky was falling?"

"Far from the mark!" whispered the voice; and now the kisses falling upon the neck could not be counted; they followed each other like the almond shower described.

But in a trice, Florette had slipped from beneath the strange hands, and freed her little head from its imprisonment. She turned around. There stood Henry. There stood Florette. He smiled on her composedly. But she lifted her finger threateningly, although smiling bashfully, and said: "Could I have believed that you could have been so rude? One should beware of you, young sir."

Now he begged pardon for his presumption. Had he not done so, methinks the crime would have been already pardoned. But because he now sued for favor, she swiftly bethought herself, that no favor was due him.

At last the tears came into Florette's eyes so deeply did she feel herself aggrieved by his audacity, and her voice quivered mournfully, and seemed to be stifled by pain.

Notwithstanding, he spoke a great deal, and she spoke very little, doing nothing at all but listening to him: plucking every leaf from the nearest elm-bough, and piling high within her hands the torn off leaves.

When he saw all his trouble was in vain, he said: "Then, I shall go away, if the sight of me is so distasteful to you, fair Florette. Then I shall go away, if you are so inexorable, and know not how to pardon a jest. Then I shall go away, and never show myself before your face. Farewell! But let me not leave you without giving me the comfort of knowing that you are not angry'" sighed he, and he fell on his knee before her.

She looked kindly through her tears, upon the handsome youth, quite silent, but thoughtful. Then still kneeling, he bowed reverentially before her, with his hands folded. At this, she was forced to laugh herself, took both her hands full of leaves, scattered them over his head, so that he was quite hidden by them, and sprang away laughing aloud. He hastened after her. Now both were merry again. "Now just acknowledge to me alone," said Florette, "it is you who is forestalling my father in his office, and making a new garden here."

He willingly made confession. "When Florette comes to the fountain of Garenne," said he, "she shall think of me, whether she will or not. I will surround her there with the most beautiful flowers, which I can find or buy. Could I purchase all the joys of heaven, I would encircle her with them."

"Right graciously said," answered Florette. "But young sir, my father is not at all pleased with you. You spoil his garden for him, and transplant the flowers out of their season, so that they must die. You have not watered them once."

"If I only had a watering-pot!"

"You might have procured that, twenty paces from here, if you had taken the trouble, there, where the door in the cliff opens into the grotto."

Hereupon both sprang away, and soon found the watering can. One after the other, both watered the flowers, and took counsel together as to how the circle around the fountain might be improved.

Thus time sped, and Florette hastened to the cottage.

THE EVENING.

The prince now worked day by day as well as by night at his pleasure-garden. They allowed him that privilege. Lucas helped him. Florette was not missing, she went to and fro, gave good advice, and watered the freshly planted flowers in the evening. Even Queen Joanna came, and looked at her son's work. The king of France had little taste for it, still less the duke of Guise; so much the more, the prince of Bearn himself.

He had, indeed, in latter days, more varied, more showy, and more luxurious life; but never sweeter, than in the simplicity and repose of his glorious gardener's life; made so by the magic of first-love. Florette and Henry watched one another with all the ingenious delight of innocence. They played with one another like children; were confidential together, like brother and sister. They enjoyed the present, without questioning the future, and their harmless passion was conscious of no evil aim. Florette never thought that she had won the love of a Queen's son. She saw only, the strong, blooming, affectionate youth. He was her equal. In his gray doublet, in his simple dress, such as the country people wore, there was nothing to remind her of his prospects, or his future destiny. Henry, on the other side, troubled himself not about the great men or the beauties of the court. Compared with Florette, nothing else was beautiful to him; compared with his quiet delight in beholding her nothing else was great. His eye always rested upon her finely formed figure whilst he worked, and then his work was bad and never came to an end. But who could weary of admiring such charms? Each of her movements was lovely; each of her words full of unspeakable power.

One thing only was not right to either, namely, that the days in the garden were much shorter than those out of it. To lengthen them they must certainly call in the help of the evening. It is true, nothing could be done by moon and starlight, but then they could rest, and while resting talk and chat together.

"I come to the garden a little while after tea, about nine o'clock," said Henry, softly to Florette, whilst he knelt by her side, and set out plants. "And you, Florette?"

"My father is already in bed at that time," answered she.

"And you, Florette?" he whispered again, with looks of entreaty. She nodded her pretty head smilingly. "If it is a clear, bright evening."

About nine o'clock Henry was at the Garenne fountain. But the sky hung lowering over him. Florette was not there. "If it is a clear, bright evening!" said she. Now she will not come! thought he. Then there was a rustling in the thicket. Florette came, her water-pail on her head, to the fountain. To fortunate love it is always clear and bright. He took the pail. He thanked her, said a thousand tender words; they gladly forgot that the sky was not clear. It was clear in the breast of both.

Great drops of rain fell singly from heaven. They felt them not. The warm May-shower finally wet them through, and drove them for shelter to the grotto behind the Garenne fountain. They must have stood there, perhaps a half hour. They bore the little accident without vexation. As the moon broke through the clouds, they stepped forth hand in hand. Henry took the full water-pail upon his head. Florette walked by his side, leaning upon his arm. So they came to old Lucas' cottage. He was already asleep. Henry gave the pail to Florette, and she thanked him for his trouble. "Good-night, sweet Florette," whispered he. "Good night, dear friend," whispered she.

THE WET CAP.

The evening at the fountain did not seem to have been tedious to either. From henceforth, let the sky be clear or cloudy, they were never missing from there, about the ninth hour.

So flew by four weeks of the brightest spring. Every evening the prince bore home the water-pail of his beloved.

Florette's father observed not, that from the first evening his daughter took delight in making her customary walk to the spring so late. On the other hand, the wise Lagaucherie, at last became conscious that his royal pupil regularly vanished at a fixed hour, towards dusk, and that the upper part of his cap was always wet, let the weather be dry as it might. For a long while he could not unravel the mystery. The young prince never spoke of his actions; therefore Lagaucherie on his side, forbore to question him. Yet the affair struck him as very singular, and the wet cap of the young prince excited his curiosity.

To gratify this, he one evening stealthily followed the night-rambler. He followed him at such a distance, that he could not easily be discovered by him. He saw him at the spring of Garenne; he saw, likewise, a female form. Both vanished. Now, a part of the riddle was explained to the tutor.

Yet it remained a mystery, why the prince's cap should be made wet. He had already waited a long while. He crept closer and closer. He heard their whispers. Presently he saw the prince of Bearn, a bucket of water upon his head, and a young girl supported by his arm, took his way to the castle-gardener's cottage. The mentor shook his head thoughtfully. He secretly imparted his observations to the Queen. The mother was perplexed and indignant. She wished to give her son a serious lecture.

"No, gracious lady," said the wise Lagaucherie, no passion was ever killed by a lecture. Their charm is heightened by punishment and persecution; the torrent is only made to swell more mightily by obstructions opposed. Temptations are best conquered by flight. Passion is destroyed by depriving it of nutriment, or supplanting it by what is nobler.

So spoke Lagaucherie. The Queen concerted her measures with him, as she entirely coincided in his views. On the following morning, Lagaucherie approached the prince, and reminded him that the world now expected deeds from him: that he must perfect himself as a ruler; that, in conflict, whether with the reverses of fortune, or the inclinations of his own spirit, or with foes on the battle-field, he could have but one motto, which is the basis of all religion and all renown, viz: Victory or death!

After this introduction, in the most natural manner imaginable, Lagaucherie informed him that the Queen was to set forth the next day in company with the court, for the castle of Pau; that Henry was to remain there, only a short time in his birth-place, and then repair to Bayonne to be present at the conference of the King of France with the Queen of Spain.

Henry silently listened to these communications from his teacher. His countenance betrayed great embarrassment. Lagaucherie saw this plainly, but acted as if altogether unconscious of it. The Queen on her part, seconded Lagaucherie. She talked much of the brilliant assemblage at Bayonne; of the fêtes to take place there; of the renowned men whom Henry would meet there. What could Henry oppose?

His staying alone at Nerac was not to be thought of. How dare he ever hint that the meeting at the Garenne fountain was worth infinitely more to him than the kingly presence at Bayonne.

THE PARTING.

With the evening star in the heavens, the young prince stood by the fountain in the castle-garden. Florette hovered near. But when he announced to her the coming separation, she almost lost consciousness from pain.

"You forsake me now, Henry!" said she, sobbing. Now you will forget me. I am alone upon earth. Now that you, my dear life, flee, nothing is sweet for me but death."

"But," said he. "I flee not forever. I will come back. To whom do I belong but to you? I am no longer my own property, because I am yours now and forever. What should I remember, if I forget you? You are the soul of my brightest memories. If I forget you, may I forget breath itself!"

"Oh! Henry, you will return no more; or if you do return, you will no longer know Florette. I shall wither like the flower without the dew. You are my sun, how shall I survive when you have vanished?"

"No, Florette, you are happier than I. To you still remain the scenes of our happiness, to you this fountain, this garden. I shall live for you in all these flowers. But, to-morrow, when I have lost you, I shall be thrust out of paradise. While my companions hate and dread me, yours love you. Oh! how beautiful you are! Who could help loving you? Others will idolize you, and you will find some one more worthy of your love!"

So they spoke for a long while. Tears, promises, caresses, new doubts, new consolations followed each other, until the clock of the castle-tower called the prince away, and warned both to part.

Then Florette seized Henry's hand with earnestness and pressed it to her heart, and spoke: "Do you see this fountain of Garenne? There will you ever find me, always and forever as to-day! And, Henry, see, as this pours forth its unconquerable life, so is my love, Henry: I can cease to live but not to love. You will find me again, ever as to-day. Always there—always there!"

She fled. The youthful prince reeled through the castle-garden, sobbing and miserable.

THE MEETING AGAIN.

The distractions of the journey did his spirits good. He conquered the pain. The fifteen first months which followed that last moment at the Garenne fountain, filled his mind with other cares. In the tumult of party contentions, by which France was at that time torn, on her battle-fields, was unfolded the full extent of his activity, and his heroic mind, which afterwards won for him an imperishable name. Already had the young hero become the admiration of all the brave, and the noble ladies at the court of Catharine de Medicis consoled him, more than was conducive to Florette's peace of mind.

The lovely Florette heard of her lover's fame, and how all the world praised him. He was no longer the gardener, who planted flowers at her side; he was the warrior, who marched forth to earn laurels on the field of victory. She had only loved Henry; never the prince of Bearn. His dazzling transformation moved less her astonishment than her grief. Full well she knew how the beauties of the court laid siege to him, and how, only too flatteringly he gave heed now to one, now to another.

Florette had known and loved only one man in the world; this one was Henry. Now losing her faith in him, she lost faith in all mankind. But meanwhile her heart broke. What had happened and must happen, her reason had in vain foretold.

In one of his progresses, he came once again to Nerac. Then she saw the prince of Bearn once more strolling in the garden and thicket of Garenne, with the fair lady of Ayelle. She could not resist her desire to cross their path.

The countenance of Florette, which, although pale and suffering, was yet more beautiful in its sorrow, than ever in the hey-day of her joy, suddenly revived in the young prince all the remembrances of his first love. He became restless. The young lady at his side, the presence of the courtiers prevented him from yielding to his wishes. But on the following morning, when he saw old Lucas in the garden, he secretly hurried to the house. He found Florette alone. The too speedy return of her father prevented him from conversing long with her. He implored her for one short hour at the Garenne waters. She answered without raising her eyes from her work: "At eight o'clock this evening I shall be there."

He hurried away. He was again as in former days: his whole soul burned for Florette. He could hardly await the hour.

It was dark; the clock struck eight. Through the private gateway of the palace, in order to meet nobody; and by footpaths which he well knew, he repaired to the fountain, through the thicket. Arrived; his heart beat audibly. Florette had not yet appeared. He waited for a few minutes. The rustling of the leaves in the night breeze startled him joyfully more than once. Already he was extending his arms to fly towards her, to take her to his heart. But it was not she. Impatiently he went to and fro. Then he noticed, not far from the fountain, in the darkness, something white, like a portion of her dress. He hastened to it. It was a sheet of paper, beside the arrow, and the pierced rose. There was writing on the paper. The darkness of the night hindered him from reading it.

Shocked, uneasy, touched, he flies back to the castle, and sighs: "How? She comes not? She sends me back the arrow, because she no longer loves me?"

He read the writing—only these words: "I have promised you, you will find me again at the fountain. Probably you will go past without seeing me. Search better. You will certainly find me. You love me no more, therefore, for you I live no longer. Oh! my God, forgive!"

Henry guessed the meaning of these words. The palace resounded with his calls! They ran thither on hearing the prince's shouts. A few servants attended him with torches to the fountain of Garenne.

Why prolong the melancholy narration? The corpse of the beautiful maiden was found in the pool formed by the water of the spring. They buried her between two young trees.

The grief of the young prince was without bounds. Henry IV is to this day the idol of the French people. He accomplished great things. He experieneed, gained, and lost much. But a heart as pure and true and affectionate as the heart of Florette he never won again. And the painful remembrance of this angel never left him.

Such was the first love of Henry IV, such this only one. So loved he never again!

THE STRANGER.

BY BETTY PINE.

He sat alone on the banker's doorstep. His clothes were soiled, and his face weather-beaten. His dark eye was turned downwards. His was a countenance unlighted by hope or ambition.

The wind was blowing, and a cloud of dust obscured every object.

As I approached, he started to his feet as if some thought of recognition disturbed him. He seemed unwilling to meet the glance of eyes he had met in other days.

Could I pass him in silence? Nay, I could not; I bowed, spoke but a word and passed on.

When I returned, I saw him on the opposite side of the street at the door of a low restaurant, alone. Yes, alone. He seemed to feel no interest in the passers-by or the inmates of the house. A quick feeling of concern came into my heart. Was he hungry? Was he sorrowful? Why should his eyes be downward? Why should his acts betray the heaviness of despair? Had some act of passion planted remorse in his bosom? Why had he come hither? Why did he leave the golden shore, and the home where hearts were warm for him with love and sympathy?

I lay upon my bed, wakeful with the picture before me. The stranger sitting alone!

Alone! alone! O lonely sound;
'Tis like a deep and cureless wound,
That ever aches and ever bleeds
While on your life it slowly feeds,
Until the fount is dry.

The next day I saw him not, but hoped he would find me. "Perchance there is not a house he feels free to enter. He is too proud to beg, and I believe he would die of hunger rather than steal!" With feelings of this kind, I set out on the third day; and, after walking up and down, summoned courage to enter the restaurant. I did not find him there, but learned that he was without means to pay for one meal.

I left a note and came home praying that his feet might be directed to me.

Late in the afternoon, he came faint and weary; I prepared that he might bathe. I hastened the meal that he might be rfreshed.

I introduced him to my friends, and sought to throw him in the way of employment, and in a few days, his way lighted up and all went on well. We found in him wealth of thought, and rich stores of knowledge gained by application when others perhaps trifled with time and spent in folly their precious moments.

MOZART'S FIDDLE.

In the Josephstadt at Vienna, there lived, about forty years ago, a poor man who traded in all sorts of second-hand articles and curiosities. This man, whose name was Ruttler, was blessed with a numerous family, and the profits of his business were barely enough to provide for his wife and fourteen children, the oldest of whom was scarcely sixteen years of age. Nevertheless, in spite of his poverty, Ruttler was benevolent and obliging; and no one in trouble appealed to him in vain for his help and counsel.

Before Ruttler's shop a man passed every day, whose serious, thoughtful features excited respect and interest; he appeared to be suffering from an incurable illness; only, when he saw Ruttler's children, who always respectfully greeted him as he went by, as they played about in the streets, a smile passed over his colorless lips, and his gaze, directed toward heaven, seemed to implore for them an existence happier than his own.

Ruttler, too, had noticed the stranger; and, as he never lost an opportunity of serving a neighbor, he requested to be allowed to have a seat ready for him when he returned from his usual promenade. The sick man accepted the friendly offer, and every morning, Ruttler's children came out, bringing a chair for the stranger.

On Whit-Monday morning, the invalid returned earlier than usual from his walk, and Ruttler's children at once surrounded him with the news—"Dear sir, we have got such a pretty little sister born in the night." The stranger entered the shop to ask Ruttler how his wife was going on. The good man at once came out, and concluded his thanks with the words, "Yes, dear sir, this is now the fifteenth which the good God has sent us!"

"My good man, you have then much to care for; but have you already found a god-father?"

"No, sir; when one is poor, god-fathers are not so easily to be found. My other children's sponsors are neighbors, all poorer than I am."

"Call the girl Gabriel," said the stranger. "I will give her this name. Here are a hundred florins for the christening feast, which I will attend, and which I request you to provide." As Ruttler hesitated, he added, "Take it, take it; when you know more of me you will see that I am not unworthy to share your cares. But you can do me a service. I see there in your shop a violin; be so good as to bring it out to me. I have a happy thought, and must at once put it on paper."

Ruttler took down the violin from the hook and gave it into the stranger's hand, who soon drew such wonderful tones from it that the street was speedily filled with eager and curious listeners, and many persons driving by, whose ear recognized the great musician in these notes, stopped their carriages to enjoy the beautiful strains. But the invalid, absorbed in his melodies, did not heed the crowd which had assembled before Ruttler's shop.

When he had finished his piece, he wrote it down on a music-sheet, which he took from his pocket, and then said farewell to his new friends, leaving his address, with the request that they would let him know the day of the christening.

Several days passed away, and the invalid did not appear. The chair before Ruttler's door stood unoccupied.

Ruttler decided at last to go himself and inquire after his kind guest. He arrived at the house to which he had been directed. The door was hung with black. A coffin surrounded by burning tapers, a number of gentlemen who were crowding into the house as pall-bearers and mourners, made him guess the truth.

Here he learnt to his astonishment, that Mozart was to have been his daughter's godfather, and that this sad crowd had assembled to accompany the great man to the grave.

At his house, Mozart, sitting in his chair, had composed his glorious Requiem, his last Song of the Swan—his Funeral Hymn.

After Ruttler had paid the last honors to the great master, he returned home; but he was surprised to find his modest dwelling surrounded by a crowd of people, who, as it so often happens, first began to honor the great genius at the moment when he was taken from them.

This event brought Ruttler into so prominent notice, that his business became quite a flourishing one. He was able henceforth to make a good deal of money, to get situations for his children, and to pass his old age in comfort.

His youngest daughter he called Gabriel, as Mozart had wished; when she was sixteen he gave her the fiddle which Mozart had used a few days before his death. This violin was afterwards sold for four thousand florins ($2,800).

Ruttler would never part with the chair, though large sums of money were offered to him for it. He preserved it as a memorial of his poverty—as that which had led to his good fortune.—Demorest's Young America.

Correspondence, Etc.

We extract a little posie of good thoughts from a letter of Bishop Harrington's, which, although somewhat scattering, we think too good to be thrown away.

Mr. Editor:—May your praiseworthy publication meet with decided success, for, in my judgment, it merits it. Many pleasing reflections occupy the mind while partaking of your bill of fare. One or two that occur to me I will mention. When intelligent thinkers commit their cogitations to writing, embracing a variety of subjects, it reminds me of the saying of the Psalmist—"Deep calleth unto deep." Later inspiration has said—"Intelligence cleaveth unto intelligence," and again "Wisdom is justified of her children."

I make no pretensions to write or fathom deep things, but I like to read and ponder over them. In diversity, there is unity; in nature, wonderful harmonies; in intellectual development permeating benisons.

> "The spacious firmament on high,
> With all the blue ethereal sky,
> And spangled heavens a shining frame,
> Their great original proclaim."

True, indeed, but does immensity, with all its vast designs and embellishments, its awful harmonies, the storm-clouds of the heavens answering to, and sympathising with, the storms below, which so terribly agitate the great deep, and which the waterspouts bear witness to, originate the idea of a God? Nay indeed, for without revelation man would never have found Him out. It is true that after the idea is conceived, nature and all things else bear testimony. Only "the fool hath said in his heart there is no God." For one I fully accord with the somewhat unpopular saying of a former apostle "by philosophy no man knows God."

It is generally admitted that a small part of mankind do the thinking for the race. Then how important that they should think rightly. I have often thought that a class of our fellow-men who claim to be philanthropists, were far from being benefactors of mankind, from the fact that under the guise of friendship they would rob us of our hope, make us believe we are orphans, no father in the heavens, no mother, no rational hope for the future, no fond assurance that if we die we shall live again; but rather give us the (to them) brilliant prospect of a "No" to that (when properly considered) inspiring couplet:

"Shall spring ever visit this mouldering urn Shall day ever dawn on the night of the grave?"

At some convenient time I would like a word or two with your Dramatic Editor. In my judgment he makes the drama the cause for much that is the effect of other causes; but opinions are private property. The unity of faith is to be attained, "for the just shall live by faith."

Fraternally yours,
L. E. Harrington,
American Fork.

We publish with especial readiness the last paragraph in the above letter. The conscientious expression of a difference of opinion is what we believe in, as the best possible way to arrive at truth on all questions. We shall as thankfully receive the Bishop's criticism as his kind expression of satisfaction with our labors. Progress and light is what we are after. It is only ignorance that fears to be questioned or set right.

THE DARKEST HOUR BEFORE DAWN.

When through the shades of life we pass,
And all seems dark above,
Let not unwelcome thoughts that rise
Wound the fond heart we love.

For soon the light will come again,—
The darkness be dispelled;
Oh, then, 'twill give us joy to know
Such thoughts have been withheld.

Look up and see the light that gleams
To guide us on our way,
When earth's drear night is darkest—then
'Tis never far from day.

So murmur not, because we have
The lights and shades to know.
Without them we could never learn
Celestial joys below!

AS PERTAINING TO SCIENCE IN UTAH.

We were pleased to note in the procession on Monday last, (5th July), a handsome and well designed car, as representative of our brethren the Engineers, Machinists and Founders of Utah, of which the following is a description:

CAN THERE BE A CULMINATING CIVILIZATION?

In our estimation there can be no culmination to the eternal series of progressive attainments of which civilization is capable. There can be no culmination to man's course, or to the efforts of undying divinity that exists within him. Created, as man is, perfectly destitute of any inward sense of the possibility of death, or limit to his being, or powers, man's soul, long ere now, would have aspired to comprehend the universe of truth had not priestcraft—always terrified at the extent of his nature—held him back by the warnings of the wrath of the very God whose awakening he feels and of whose unlimited ambitions his whole being is the counterpart. Let but that spell be broken, and the fact, of the divine and eternal nature of man, be fully accepted in its stead, and under its inspiring influence, the highest civilization we now conceive of—come when it may—with all its gloriously combined results of the efforts of all previous ages, will prove but the lowest stage of a great new series, in connection with which mankind will travel as much higher still.

Such are our views of the future society. With us, man is viewed as an unlimited being, existing in an unlimited universe, surrounded unlimitedly with objects for his scrutiny and comprehension,—a deathless universe to be explored,—a deathless soul within him to explore it! No sense of limit to his capabilities within his soul; no evidence that there can ever be a time when there will be nothing more to learn indicated in the universe without. As it should be, man finds himself fitted in character to the universe in which he exists. Were he limited in his capabilities, or the universe in its resources, there would be a lack of fitness in the nature of things. As to intelligence in the abstract, we cannot conceive of intelligence, but, as deathless ever progressing intelligence, without pain. Supposing intelligence to be created—which we by no means affirm—for God to awaken into existence such intelligence as we possess, while it is in the least degree possible, that there can be any decay or limit to its active career, would amount to his creating the strong instincts of life to face the horrifying prospect of their own dissolution; thus, constituting himself, Creator and Destroyer of life and pleasure in the same act! But this never can be true! When the meanest promptings or wants of our physical being find themselves, without exception, elaborately supplied in the grand provisions of nature; the mightiest, the most intensified yearnings of our spirits, cannot, alone, be created for disappointment. The yearnings for endless life and progress, existing within us, must be true indications of the future that awaits us, or the million-fold evidences that exist of the invariable presence of suchdesires in the human soul, would be but so many evidences that the God of nature has lent himself, to convey a false anticipation to every heart, and to bear witness to a lie in every bosom. Inasmuch as Nature—as heard speaking in the hearts of the good and wise of all ages—cannot lie, the future of our race can only be truly read, in the light of the boundless yearnings for knowledge that exist within us, side by side with the immensity of wisdom evidently for us to learn. Science and art, then, with us, can but have begun their day! As boundless and unexplorable as the universe itself, must be the sciences, that will in due order be sought out by the untiring energies of unclouded humanity. Give man only the same amount of progress he even now can make; assume his slowest rate of growth, and give him but ALL ETERNITY for his day of operations, and you have constituted him, comparatively, a God at once! A greater deity in the future, anyway, than our highest imaginations can conceive or language can convey. Assume then, better, and still better, conditions for his progress than now exist—as well we may—and the same eternal period for his development, and where have you prospectively landed him? And with him, where have you predicted the position of the race to which he belongs? In the very heart, if heart there be, to the infinite circle of the Divine Sciences of creative and beautifying power! Where the Great Universe is found yielding up its secrets one by one to his determined will; where ceaseless ages in their periods, come but to pour new tides of strength into his being, and open wide, and still wider doors, through which his enlarged vision may gaze astonished upon the majestic infinitudes of undiscovered science still without.

But, let us now come back to our own time—to the simplicities of to-day; what shall we say of them? This, that distant and immense as are the leadings of the road that will yet be traveled by mankind, we are on that road to-day, or on paths that lead to it! Immortal, expansive and divine, as necessarily will be, the sciences that will in due time reveal themselves, the simplest truths mankind have already made their own, are as immortal and divine as any that ever will be reached. All truths form but so many strata of a boundless series supporting, overlaying and interlocking each other and forming one grand and indissoluble whole. To be connected to any one truth, therefore, is to be in a sense connected to the whole, for the whole is then within our reach. We have, consequently, in any truth, we have ever learned, one end of a thread running through all the facts of universal life; and by following which, we may explore unlimitedly, the chambers of the palace of immensity. What we gain, therefore, in conceptive, inventive, or creative strength, to-day, however limited in extent it may be, is so much gained of the immensity of wisdom and capacity, which creates worlds and harmonizes universes. Even in all the small accomplishments that lie betwen the creation of a table, to the invention of a telegraph wire, we grasp faculties of Deity. Small as the draught may be, we drink of the "stream which makes glad the city of our God." However close to the shore, as yet, we sail, we are on an unlimited sea on whose boundless waters the revealing light of truth never sets,—as much on the sea, as archangels, or celestial beings of any order, who, eternal ages hence, left the shore, and turned their exploring eyes towards the exhaustless, but not incomprehensible mysteries ahead.

So much, then, allow us to assert, for the oneness of the truths we know, with the truths that ever have or ever will be known. As to the fitness of our nature for the deepest researches into the mighty volumes of undiscovered truth, we have the continual witness with us. We seem like a mine of jewelled thoughts when once the vein is struck, and such a mine, in fact, we are, for deity is hid within us waiting to be developed; while, on every hand outside, a living, palpitating universe of inspiration exists, waiting to take hold upon us, and connect our intelligence with the immensity of wisdom without. Then the Divine within our nature, answering to the divine whisperings without, like blaze answering to blaze, gladdens again! Like a mirror answers to the glances of the sun, and forms one radiant glory with the messengers of light, so, sunlike inspiration, glancing on any polished quality of our souls, wakens a glory there, and in that faculty of our being God is revealed. Thus we draw nigh to Him and whether we seek to appropriate to ourselves His wisdom manifested, in artistic, scientific, or so called sacred truths, He is always there answering to every call of our being for light or truth. Thus through eternal ages must it ever be; a boundless infinitude of truth ever present to answer the utmost requisitions of our infinite souls. Endless unfoldings of art and science, and still higher developments of social and sacred truths must, therefore, needs take place; and endlessly our race must rise, from "culminating civilization" to "culminating civilization," and that without end.

IMPERIALISM IN AMERICA.

As illustrative of some remarks by Elder John Taylor made on "the 4th," with reference to the insane idea of imperialism in America, we quote the following from the Boston Investigator:

Every ism, however insane, whether religious or political, has its organ, as well as its adherents. No absurd conceit can be presented to the public without meeting with some favor. The proofs of this are as abundant as sand in the desert. The latest example of this is a movement in New York in favor of imperialism.

The seventh clause of the seventh section of the first article of the National Constitution declares in defining the power of Congress: "No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, and no person holding office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State."

Something over a year ago, numerously signed petitions had been sent to Congressmen, praying for the repeal of this clause. The main reason assigned was that the public debt presented this issue: Either imperialism or repudiation. No attention was paid to these petitions. The next move of this class of fanatics was to start a newspaper. Several repudiation organs have been started, why should not the opposite extremists have their organ? They have lately commenced the publication of one in New York city, and it is entitled the Imperialist.

The advocates of imperialism, as well as all other opponents of liberal institutions are but blind moles working in the dark. The whole genius of the age tends to liberty and the overthrow of despotism. Trouble and difficulty may attend our young republic, but it is only for awhile. Instead of ever seeing America disrobed of her cap and mantle of liberty, we look with perfect assurance to the time when she shall be, not in theory alone, but in fact, the model republic of the world—a great center around which the yet to be republics of the earth shall be grouped.

> "For freedom's battle once begun,
> Bequeathed from bleeding sire to son,
> Though often lost, is ever won."

An age in which Russian serfs are liberated; in which old dynasties like Spain are changing to meet the popular voice; in which men foresee even monarchial England itself sliding towards Republicanism, is a curious one in which to talk of imperialism to the Great Republic.

OPENING OF THE MOHAMMEDAN DISPENSATION.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

In the twelfth year of Mohammed's prophetship he published the revelation of his famous night journey to the seven heavens. At first, it was too much even for the credulity of his disciples, and some of them left him; but Abu Becker timely vouched for the Prophet's veracity; and his prompt testimony to the truth of the night vision turned again the wavering faith, and raised the credit of Mohammed as the favorite Apostle of God to a towering pinnacle. It is thought that this hit of the Prophet was a bold stroke of policy. Says Mr. Sale, in his preliminary discourse to his translation of the Koran, "I am apt to think this fiction, notwithstanding its extravagance, was one of the most artful contrivances Mohammed ever put in practice,and what chiefly contributed to the raising of his reputation to that great height to which it afterward attained."

The star of Mohammed's mission was now rising; his enemies, by their very warfare against the faithful, were fast rolling the wheel of empire toward him; and their rejection of the new revelation was but preparing the way for the epoch of his military apostleship! He had reached the period of his prophetic career most famous for its results. It is called the "Accepted Year," in which, among other notable events, stands foremost the immortalized "Hegira," or the Flight, whence dates the Mohammedan era. First, in the order of remarkable events, came twelve citizens of Medina on pilgrimage to Mecca, who, hearing the prophet preach, received the word and swore allegience and obedience to him. These were honored with the title of "The Defenders." Returning to Medina, they brought others into the faith, and soon after seventy-three more converts from that city came to enroll themselves under his banner; and these on Mount Akaba took the oath pertaining to the gospel of the sword. "If," said they, "we be slain in thy cause, what shall be our reward?" "Paradise!" answered the Prophet. "Then," said they, "stretch forth thy right hand," and he did so. They then took the oath, and swore that they would defend and uphold the Prophet and his cause. Thus began that mighty military organization which in its growth built up a vast empire, and for centuries, against the chivalry of Christendom, contended even for the dominion of the world.

Up to this important period the "kingdom of God," as represented in Mohammed's mission, had not received its perfect organization, for according to the very genius of Islamism, the apostleship is the power of God ordained to bear off the kingdom. Notwithstanding, therefore, that unto the Christ of Ishmael's seed it was given to build it up by the might of the sword, he, like the Christ from the chosen seed of Isaac, now called twelve apostles; and thus endowed, Mohammed's dispensation was fairly opened.

Mohammed's "kingdom of God," being now once more perfectly set up upon the earth, by the choosing of twelve apostles, the Prophet sent away "The Defenders," and counseled the residue of his disciples to take their flight to Medina; But the Prophet, with Abu Beker and Ali, remained behind in his beloved native city, not having, he said, as yet divine permission to leave Mecca. This exodus of his followers alarmed the rival branch of the Koreishites; for since the day that the twelve pilgrims took the oath on Mount Akaba, so great had been the success of Islamism in Medina, that this chosen city was now ready to welcome the Prophet as its divine lawgiver and sovereign. His enemies in Mecca, fearful lest his new allies should proselyte other powerful tribes, and return to avenge the cause of their prophet, resolved to interrupt the flight of Mohammed and at once put him to death. They accordingly held a council, in which his assassination was formally arranged by the chief men of the city; but scarcely was the conspiracy against him conceived ere it was known to the Prophet, professedly revealed to him by the angel Gabriel, who now ordered him to take his flight to Medina.

Thereupon, "to amuse his enemies," he directed Ali to lie down in his place, and wrap himself in his green cloak, which he did; and Mohammed escaped miraculously, as they pretend, to Abu Beker's house, unperceived by the conspirators, who had already assembled at the Prophet's door. They, in the meantime, looking through the crevice, and seeing Ali, whom they took to be the Prophet himself, asleep, continued watching there till morning, thus giving Mohammed the advantage of escape. At length, bursting in the door, they rushed toward the sleeper, when Ali started up and confronted them. Amazed, they demanded, "Where is Mohammed?" "I know not," replied Ali, sternly, and walked forth, none venturing to molest him.

Abu Beker and the Prophet took refuge in a cave at Mount Thor, where they arrived at dawn of day. Scarce were they in when they heard the sound of pursuit. "Our pursuers," said the apprehensive Abu Beker, "are many, and we are but two." "Be not grieved," replied the grand enthusiast, "there is a third, even God himself. He will defend us." In this cave they remained three days, according to tradition, preserved by another miracle, after which they set out for Medina, taking a by-road. But they had not journeyed far before they were overtaken by a troop of horse, and Abu Beker was again dismayed. The comforting word was still, "Be not troubled; God is with us!" As the Koreishite leader overtook Mohammed, his horse fell, and the Prophet taking advantage of the incident, spoke to him with such words of power and authority that the stern warrior was awed, and entreating forgiveness turned back his troop. The fugitives continued their journey until they arrived at a little village two miles from Medina, where they remained four days, in which time there gathered to him the refugees of Mecca, and a little host of auxiliaries, among whom was a warrior chief with seventy followers of the tribe of Salram, who forthwith made profession of faith.

On the morning of the Moslem Sabbath, after the service of prayers and a sermon from the prophet, he mounted his camel and set forth for the chosen city, the troop of horse attending him as guards, and his disciples from Mecca took turns in holding a canopy of palm leaves over his head. By his side rode Abu Beker. "Oh, apostle of God!" cried the Salram chief, "thou shalt not enter Medina without a standard." So he unfolded his turban, and, tying it to the point of his lance, bore it aloft before the Prophet. "Thus," says Washington Irving, "did Mohammed enter Medina more as a conqueror than an exile seeking an asylum."

New dispensations have ever found their crowning opportunities made by the force of the action against them, as though an overruling power worked in harmony from opposite sides. The Egyptian bondage brought forth the exodus of the chosen people—the exodus the nationality of Israel. So also from the flight of the Arabian fanatic grew up the Mohammedan empire.

He now boldly proclaimed his military apostleship, and empowered his followers to make war upon the idolaters, and build up the kingdom of God by the sword. There was a new revelation—a second seal of his dispensation opened. "The sword," exclaimed the Prophet, "is the key of heaven and of hell; a drop of blood shed in the cause of God, a night spent under arms, is of more avail than two months of fasting and prayer. Whosoever falls in battle, his sins are forgiven; at the day of judgment his wounds shall be resplendent as vermilion and odoriferous as musk; the loss of his limbs shall be replaced by the wings of angels and of cherubim."

The first of Mohammed's victories was won in the second year of the Hegira, in the Valley of Beder, over the idolatrous Meccans, headed by his great enemy, Abu Sofian. The forces of the Prophet consisted of only 319 men, while that of the enemy numbered nearly 1,000; notwithstanding, he put them to flight, killing seventy of the principal Koreish, and taking as many prisoners, with the loss of only fourteen of his own men.

In the Koran this battle is immortalized, and the victory of the little band of the faithful ascribed to the presence of the angel Gabriel. Nor less fortunate was the spoil taken from the enemy of the whole caravan, consisting of 6,000 camels, richly laden, from Syria. With this spoil he possessed the means of present reward for his followers, while to the warlike tribes of Arabia the promise of the future was most fascinating, and soon a formidable host flocked to his standard.

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

THE MYTHOLOGY OF EGYPT.

It is estimated that the catacombs of Egypt contain four hundred and fifty millions of embalmed human bodies. What a burlesque upon their conception of a literal resurrection and re-use of this old worn-out tabernacle, previous to its mouldering into dust, is the fact that, to-day, the barbarous Arabs, whose progenitors were a constant source of annoyance and dread to them when living, should now use their sacred remains for fuel, with which to cook their food and make their camp-fires and beacons throughout their chilly night vigils. The bituminous substance with which they were embalmed rendering them very inflamable, and making them far better fuel than "buffalo chips."

This worship of the beasts of the higher order, was based upon the supposition that the lesser deities, whose duty it was not only to protect but to serve man, were tabernacled in the most noble specimens of the animal creation. The bull was the motive power of Egypt, he drew the plow, hauled the cart, pumped their water to a higher elevation; at death his flesh was good for food and his hide was useful for arts. The cow was then, as now, queen of the dairy and a source of joy to the juveniles of the whole land. The great and ruling deities of day and night were too far removed and had far too much to do to preside in person over the minute affairs of human life. Some divine offshoots of those great divinities were supposed to be with them always in the forms of the most noble and useful of the animal creation. The spirit of the chief god of Egypt clothed himself with the body of a bull. The god Apis was the titular divinity of the whole land.

THE PRIESTS.

The priesthood of Egypt was a great power behind the throne, greater than the throne itself. The priests were supposed, by the sacredness of their calling, to be always in direct communication with the gods. They held the power to bless and curse in this life and possessed the keys that unlocked or closed the gate of the unseen world. They were repositories and expounders of the laws—their rebuke filled kings with dismay—their favors rendered the possession of the throne secure to the occupant. The theology they taught their people was unmistakably the lowest and most contemptible of that believed in by any of the nations of antiquity. The living representatives of their numerous duties covered the whole range of animal, reptile and insect life. Earth, air and water were drawn upon for tabernacles for their divinities. They taught the people of different sections or provinces of the land the worship of deities of different and sometimes of directly opposite characteristics: While the canine race were animated by the spirit of the lesser deities, in one province; the animals of feline type predominated in another. The worshipers of the canine divinities had as great contempt and dislike for the devotees of the feline deities as the dog has for the cat. The inhabitants of one city would eat each other in times of famine rather than kill a dog for food. The dweller in another province would endure the most horrible tortures in defence of a cat; the worshipers of the feline deities would destroy every dog they could lay their hands upon,—the worshipers of dogs were irreconcilably hostile to the cat. This to the casual reader may seem incredible; but let it be remembered that "the unity of the faith" would be of small use to a people who worshiped an infinity of gods. The sectional worship of deities of sectional types and callings prevented unity of thought and unity of action, and worked wonders in behalf of a sacerdotal dispensation. It was only in respect to the worship of Osiris and Isis (the sun and moon) and the big bull that there was any agreement in the religious faith of the people of the whole land. Extreme gravity of deportment and deep and profound mystery in all that pertained to the inner worship of the temples of their nobles and deities held the people in awe and did the priests good service in the absence of brains.

THE SOCIAL CODE

Of Egypt was, probably, better calculated to hold a people together in perpetuity and hold them in slavish obedience to the king (the governers of provinces and the magistrates of cities, who, in their turn, were made equally subservient to the priesthood) than that of any of the social compacts that the world has ever yet received. It was equally well calculated to build up and sustain the most perfect system of agriculture and the highest possible development of the mechanic arts attained to by any of the nations of antiquity. It was ordained, by laws as old as the establishment of the commonwealth, that each "caste," or order of society, should maintain an unalterable and never-varying social status. The descendants of a king were forever royal; of a noble, forever noble; the sons of soldiers must confine themselves to the arts of war in all time; the sons of the husbandman must forever till the soil; the sons of the workers in each branch of mechanism must perpetuate the calling and trade of his fathers forever. No excellence, no extraordinary development of individual talent, could ever lift a man out of the "caste" he was born in. Who cannot see that this social organization, based on a social code like that of the Egyptians, would transmit from posterity, from age to age, a power and skill in the manipulation of the elements used in the various trades and occupations of life greater than could be attained by any other system, all things being equal. The ruins of the temples of Upper Egypt and the pyramids and obelisks of Middle and Lower Egypt have been the wonder and delight of the lovers of the marvelous and beautiful in all ages.

The manner of living, in occupation, food, dress, religious observances and social recreations, were all regulated by unalterable laws; new or additional observances might be ingrafted upon old ones, but the old could never be abrogated. Age after age multiplied rules and regulations for their conduct in this life and the mode of entrance into the life that is unseen. Unquestioning obedience to the king, honor to the priesthood, and worship of the gods was the only passport to the Elysian abode in heaven.

The Nile or some canal that everywhere ramified the land, represented the river Styx, when sepulchre was sought for their friends, notice had to be given the priests and magistrates of the fact, upon the banks of the nearest canal or river; those grand functionaries met the funeral cortege, and sat in judgment on the dead; if it could be proved by the mouth of two witnesses that he or she had ever disobeyed the king or his representatives, dishonored the priests or blasphemed the gods, to pass the canal and find sepulchre was forbidden—emblematical of the certain failure of the individual, when he reached the banks of the great and fearful river Styx. The catacombs that everywhere honey-comb the rocky heights of Egypt would never have been excavated, or if hewn out would never have been tenanted by the bodies of dead Egyptians, had it not been for the force and power of that old adage, that it is not safe to throw stones when one lives in a glass house himself—kings, priests, magistrates and commoners, being conscious that they in their time would need the forbearance of society—when seeking sepulchres—were not hard to please, and believed it dangerous to be too critical.

THE MARITAL RELATIONS

And family organizations of the Egyptians were at the base of the whole social policy—and did more towards establishing and perpetuating the social institutions of Egypt than all other influences combined. The wife owed implicit and unquestioned obedience to the husband; the children owed their lives and all that they received to the affection and care of their parents—perfect obedience to paternal authority was enforced by the laws. A son or daughter would never take a seat in presence of father or mother until bidden to do so. Habitual disregard to parental authority was punished with death. The division of the population into "castes," and the impossibility of intermarriage between the "castes," rendered it necessary that as few barriers should exist in the marriage of relations as possible—the marriage of brothers with sisters was not only permitted but encouraged. The familiar intercourse of the sexes in their family relations, unchecked by those restraints imposed by religious faith, were prolific of all the evils of the most unlimited sexual license, as brothers and sisters destined to become husbands and wives to each at probity, were more than likely to anticipate their nuptial privileges. Therefore virtue, as understood by the people of this age, was unknown in Egypt.

The Drama.

MACBETH AND DR. JOHNSON.

Dr. Samuel Johnson, in his review of the play of Macbeth, says:

> This play is deservedly celebrated for the propriety of its fiction, and the solemnity, grandeur and variety of its action; but it has no nice discriminations of character; the events are too great to admit of particular dispositions, and the course of the action necessarily determines the conduct of the agents.

This is correct, and the only part of the Doctor's remarks upon the play worthy a masterly reviewer. How meagre and wide of the mark is his next paragraph:

> The danger of ambition is well described; and I know not whether it may not be said in defense of some parts, which now seem improbable, that in Shakspeare's time it was necessary to warn credulity against vain and illusive predictions.

Is, then, the subject of the play of Macbeth the danger of ambition? Has all its splendid fiction, solemn grandeur, and variety of action merely evolved this as the great illustration of Shakspeare's masterpiece? To say that Macbeth was ambitious, is critically next to nothing; or that a wicked ambition is dangerous, is still more puerile in nice discrimination of review. Now, in Richard, the ambition of a very incarnate Satan, and his greatness of character in the likeness of his physical malformation, with the weaving of circumstances in keeping therewith, form the subject and shaping of the play. Othello, again (at his very mention) brings up to us the most famous illustrated character of jealousy; while Lear is the rarest gem of tragedy set in the ingratitude of daughters. "The danger of ambition is well described," is the Doctor's remark upon the complex theme of the play of Macbeth. If all the splendid efforts of that noble work were merely to illustrate ambition, then Richard has stolen from Macbeth his subject.

The grand subject of the tragedy of Macbeth is the illustration of the evil agencies of the world working out their dramas among mortals. This is an epic theme. In it we have something more than a gorgeous dramatic portraiture of character; and it is this epic subject, so masterly handled, that constitutes the play before us a masterpiece.

It is not Macbeth; it is the supernatural agencies that hold the drama. This shows the epic quality and method; a play superior in its essence and theme to the character and action of its chief human personage! The evil agencies of the world leading a soul, great in its twinship of good and evil, to its ruin through ambition—a ruling passion in great men—was the theme that Shakspeare was about to illustrate when he gave his supernatural powers the opening of the play, and made them call up Macbeth into the body of their drama. But this is not all. The subject has a vast bearing beyond the individual Macbeth. It takes in all mankind; and we have a grand illustration of the mighty theme of supernatural powers working out their dramas among nations and mortals in general. The view of the dark sides of this stupendous subject—the blended drama of our mortality and immortality—successfully illustrated in actual performance, and we have the whole. The sun-side is the other half which, though not brought out, is in the prophecy of the theme. We have the whole in substance. Night illustrates Day as much as Day does itself; and more strikingly are we impressed with the two great ordinances of nature when Night reigns.

The human mind is pregnant from the very birth with the twin ordinances of Day and Night in our mortal-immortal drama of life. Another moment and the twin shall be born, and the Day and Night of two worlds—which are but two halves of one birth—shall be fairly revealed before us. Thus it has been for six thousand years, and we are never more than that one brief moment from the delivery. Divines and poets have, in a long illustrious train, taken their turns at the bed-side of mother Mortality, to help on the other birth; and Shakspeare is chief among them there—and among poets none has helped the birth as much as he. At last he reaches the culmination of the capacity of genius, and gives us in an acting play the great drama performed between the beings of two worlds. All is made literal to the audience, and the natural and supernatural blended into the harmony of one great action—that harmony made more sonorous and unique by the very demoniac discords of the play. Yet Dr. Johnson saw in this matchless dramatic achievement no grander design than the necessity which Shakspeare felt "to warn credulity against vain and illusive predictions." Dr. Johnson did not understand Shakspeare's great work, nor was his robust but rude mind capable of appreciating so fine and subtile a composition in which the metaphysics of our two worlds are crowded. The Doctor has brought down a very epic fiction into his circle of a ghost story, or the telling of fortunes by the tea-cup.

Music.

MUSIC EXAMPLES.

SIMPLE DUPLEX AND TRIPLEX FORMS AND THEIR HARMONIC ENDINGS.

FORMS.—The most simple forms of the duplex and triplex, are used in Psalmodic productions. By way of example, we will select the common and the long metre. Two periods are used in the duplex and three in the triplex, completing one movement in each form. In the common metre, there are eight syllables in the first line and six in the second; the third and fourth are the same. Eight syllables constructed in common poetical feet will require a musical section of four bars. The six syllables, a contracted section of three, making in all seven bars of music in each period, and two divisions in the movement.

In the long metre, there are eight syllables in each of the four lines, requiring two four-bar sections in the first period; also the same constructed divisions in the last. With a verse having eight lines, this form has to be extended to four periods, but notwithstanding the four divisions, the form is not changed: "O my Father, thou that dwellest," is an example.

The most simple form of the little triplex is constructed on a six-line verse. An example may be found in No. 8 of the Latter Day Saints Psalmody: "Away with our fears, the glad morning appears."

This, however, is not a six-line verse, but the author has constructed a period by a repetition of the last two lines, making three periods, and the triplex form. The simple triplex, as well as the duplex, has an extended form, for, when a twelve-line verse is selected, six periods are required. But although there are six principal divisions in the verse, the form is still the same, having but one capital movement.

The D. C. triplex was explained in No. 1 of the Magazine.

HARMONIC ENDINGS IN THE ABOVE FORMS.—In composing periods constructed to admit a sequence of thirds and sixths does not only confine the progression of the bass to the tonic and dominant, but causes also the period-endings to be of very little variety. The period-endings have to be governed by the melody in a great measure, and is most likely to fall on a semi or full cadence on the tonic or dominant. But when the melody is so constructed that the bass and inner parts can move at pleasure, then the endings are not only various, but they produce an immense effect by the mixture of the different forms of ancient and modern harmonizations. The ancient chorals have beautiful and singular endings by a similar mixture of forms, but in modern Psalmody, vocal duettos, trios and four-part songs, the choral mixture of endings would not be popular in the present day, so we must be content with methods now used by composers, which are similar to the following order:

When we finish a first section by a modulation to the dominant of the primitive key with a full cadence, a varied ending can be obtained by closing the second period with a semi-finish on the fifth of the tonic. In the third section should the sixth suspend the fifth in the melody, the semi-cadence or close on the dominant, could be repeated. The fourth section being the last in the two-period form, a perfect and satisfactory ending must be on the tonic.

ANOTHER FORM OF ENDINGS IN THE LITTLE DUPLEX.—Should we be led by the melody to close the first section on the tonic, then a modulation to the dominant of the primitive key with a perfect cadence or close, would be a good and various ending.

The next section should be a semi-cadence on the key note, followed by a perfect close in that key, and finish the last period.

ENDINGS IN THE EXTENDED DUPLEX.—The following are the ones used in "O my Father," to be found on page 13 of Latter Day Saints' Psalmody. First period on the dominant; second, a modulation to that key. Third, a modulation of the dominant of the relative minor. Fourth, semi-cadence on the fifth of the key note, and an adjunctive section added to form a final close on the tonic. Endings used in the little triplex by the Editor in the Latter Day Saints' Psalmody. First period, a perfect cadence on the tonic. Second, a modulation to the dominant. Third, a perfect cadence on the key note.

EXTENDED TRIPLEX HAVING SIX PERIODS.—First period, a semi-close on the fifth of the key note. Second, perfect cadence on the tonic. Third, a semi-cadence on the dominant of the relative minor. Fourth, a modulation to the fifth of the relative minor; or the third period could end with a semi-cadence on the dominant-major of primitive key, and close the fourth period with a modulation to the fifth of the key note. Fifth period, a semi-close on the major-dominant and the sixth and last period a full close on the tonic major.

A variety of other harmonic endings by a close study of composition and experience in the styles of different ages, can be effected. In our next, we will briefly explain the use of harmonic forms of combination for the student's guide. When in the city, we will resume the subject assisted by notation-examples

THE ARION PIANOFORTE.—While East we visited the establishment of Messrs. Covell & Co., the proprietors of the beautiful instrument advertised in this week's issue, and were extremely gratified by an inspection of its varied improvements. We were exceedingly charmed by its purity of tone as well as by its power and capacity. Its outside finish is also exquisite. Take it altogether we should say that it is one of the finest instruments now in the musical market. Before purchasing elsewhere we advise our friends to give us a call on the subject.

THE OBJECT OF ANIMAL AND VEGETABLE LIFE.

BY W. M. COWLEY.

For what purpose were animals and vegetables created? To serve the ends of man? I suppose the Almighty had a more definite purpose in their creation. We read that He made nothing in vain; but what millions upon millions of animal and vegetable identities have lived, died, and decayed into mould. Now, can we suppose that the Supreme Being had no other end in view than the temporary use of man?

Let us see from what source animal and vegetable life derive the greater part of their substance. It is from the atmosphere—the oxygen, carbon, nitrogen and hydrogen. The modest flower, the towering pine, the worm, and man have their mission appointed in this transformation of gaseous matter into solid.

Does not this show conclusively a purpose in their existence?

When one form of life ceases, another takes its place, going on in the same endless line. Not only one body does each identity produce, but a continuous process is going on, always to this same end.

Who has not read Leibig's experiment on the willow? From whence came the solid wood? there being no loss in the soil from which it was produced. The only conclusion we can arrive at is, that it was transformed from the atmosphere by the laboratory existing within the twig.

How can we, taking this view of the matter, help looking upon every herb and animal as being our brother and sister, working for the great object of universal existence? Each adding its atom to the immense work. From the granite floor to the summits of the towering peaks, these same operations are ever going on.

But are the forms that we see with the naked eye the only co-workers in Nature's changes? Not by any means. Not by the help of the most powerful microscope is the smallest animal or vegetable form discovered. There are some so small that "millions could exist on the point of a pin." The blood of animals and the juice of vegetables are the medium in which myriads of other animals and vegetables exist. Life is certainly but a compound of other living creatures, of which it is as difficult to find the end in its minuteness, as it is to find on the other hand the greatness and extremity of the planetary systems.

When in the round of things mineral life has completed its course, vegetable and animal life spring therefrom, in its turn to be followed by human life. What results from this? eternal life and transformation?

When our globe was young the atmosphere which surrounded it was more charged with carbon and oxygen. The animals and vegetables of antediluvian ages were "huge monsters" compared with these of the present day. They grew larger simply because the elements were more favorable to their growth—more food material was present; and also greater warmth, on account of the greater density of the elements. Men lived to a greater age in olden times, and grew to gigantic proportions. Why? Simply because the materials of physical life were more conducive to this end.

From the time when the "hosts of heaven sang together" at the laying of the foundation of our globe, to the present day, has this great system of endless change been in progress. Change upon change, transformation upon transformation has been going on, always from the coarser to the finer. In the history of our race, bodily magnitude has given way to spiritual power. Thus from the days of the creation to the present, man has become more angelic—more Godlike—more suited to inhabit a celestial sphere—a spiritual abode.

Our Home Humorists.

FROM SALT LAKE CITY TO OMAHA.

BY QUIZ.

Can any one explain the tendency of eggs and salt bacon at all stopping places for stages or railway trains in Utah? Is there some mysterious but wonderfully productive process by which they are produced in such localities, that they meet you at every meal, stare you out of countenance whichever way you look for something to eat, and obtrude upon your very dreams? One would think that they grew in hills like corn; or that every animal on the farm, from the oxen down, was taken off from every other kind of work to manufacture them. It is true that this staple article of "station-house" diet is sometimes varied by salt bacon and eggs; and at other times by no bacon at all—a variation which—as it destroys the monotony of things—is, of course, very pleasing to travelers. But change or no change, eggs are omnipresent. One of the sweetest reminiscences a traveler carries with him from the Rocky Mountains, to come over him when in distant lands, in his hours of solitude, is the flavor of eggs. This class of fare, it is true, subsides as you leave Echo Canyon, but there is an atmosphere of eggs, yea, even unto Bryan.

Perhaps some day, a great philosopher will arise to explain the mysterious fact that where eggs leave off on this journey, a barren and sterile road sets in. As long as eggs abound, you have cultivation or romantic scenery, but—mournful fact as it is—it must be stated that, as soon as you leave eggs, you plunge into barrenness and desolation. This to Quiz's mind is a great argument in favor of eggs. It is therefore very much to the discredit of Cheyenne and Laramie to say that at these stopping places, you sometimes have to ask for eggs before you get them. There is not a proper minded Hen anywhere but what will join with us in saying that such places can never come to any good. On the other hand, at these points, they bore you with two or three kinds of meat, try your patience with vegetables and afflict you with pastry—eggs appearing only as omelettes; but eggs and fried bacon in their proper position as the staff of life, appear no more until you sniff them again on your return, in the breezes of the Rocky Mountains.

To come to the scenery of the road, after passing Echo, it will take a panorama to do it justice. Quiz has taken some pen and ink sketches which he intends, at a future period, to employ some great artist to elaborate. He would submit his views to Ottinger, but in all probability they would make him Savage, and mix up things in that firm too much; but he can describe it so that an imaginative mind can see it at a glance. Take a dirty white white-wash brush that has fraternized too familiarly with a pot of green paint; dip it in some clay and make a long smudge. This will represent about three hundred miles of the road in the spring. For a fall picture, you must wash out the green, and take up more dirty whiting and clay and you have the thing complete. There are great advantages on this kind of a route to a tourist. You can put your head out of the window and take one intense stare; draw in your head again, close your eyes and sing, "Of thee I'm fondly dreaming." You need not look out any more—you know all about it. You can go to sleep for a hundred miles and awake up thoroughly convinced that the train has not moved an inch—the same dirty white-wash mountains; the same eternal fields of clay, and smudge of sickly green; the same scooped-out look to the country everywhere, as though the ancient giants had been spooning out the plains into holes and throwing the dirt at each other. You will find it a splendid way of getting to sleep to try and discuss with yourself how such a country ever got there. If you have a profound brain like Quiz, you will come to the conclusion that the most reasonable proposition is, that, when the Rocky Mountains and valleys west of them were made, it took all the rocks and decent earth to make them, while the sand and clay were all thrown this side.

When we get to Laramie plains, the scene changes from one monotony to another—but a little better one of the two. Everlasting fields of green in spring, and of brown in autumn—relieved only by distant ridges of sand and boulders; then more fields of green and more low hills of sand and boulders, apparently forever. One great beauty of this journey is that a splendid panorama of a half a thousand miles can be made on a yard of canvass one foot wide, that will show every object of interest on the road. Other routes compel you to keep looking out and wear you to death with sight seeing. Not so with this. After leaving Echo all you have to do is to look out twice, once at Bitter Creek and once at Laramie—and you have it all. Take a dose of laudanum sufficient to sleep you till you get to Omaha, and wake up refreshed and blest. And here, after all, comes in the greatest benefit of this sort of road; for all the repose and surplus strength you have gained on your journey you will imperatively need to enable you to combat the fifty enterprising touters—all anxious to baggage you,—omnibus you,—sleep you, or eat you—who anxiously await your arrival in this young and enterprising city—and in whose tender hands Quiz philanthropically leaves you and the subject together.

NOT ALL DROSS

CHAPTER XXV.
THE LOCKET.

"Who is this man, and how came you with him, my son?" asked Isaac Ben Ammon. "Who assaulted him? Father Abraham, but it is a ghastly sight!"

"Never mind particulars now. Let us dress his wounds first," observed Snap, in reply, with his usual self-possession. He possessed much surgical skill among his other scientific acquirements, and science is cool and passionless. The wounded singer was now his patient.

"Thou art right, my son; first dress his wounds. A ghastly sight, indeed. His face and head are bathed in blood."

"I must examine the skull to find if there be a fracture; and if so, whether serious or not," observed the man of science, as he took off his coat and turned up his shirt-sleeves for surgical business, with the confidence of a professional.

"Water and a sponge," he continued.

"Haste, Levi; water and a sponge," directed the master of the house; and, when it was brought, he added:

"Go call Rebecca thy mother hither, good Levi. Tell her we need her assistance, with bandages and medicines."

"Good, my master," said Levi, as he hurried away.

"Rebecca is a skillful nurse, my friend. Father Abraham, but these are ugly wounds."

"But not so serious as I deemed," replied the mentor. "The skull is not fractured."

"The God of Jacob be praised for that, Benjamin. Didst thou not say thy name was Benjamin?" queried the ancient, less, however, from curiosity than from absent-mindedness that dwelt upon a familiar name.

"Nay, I said it not, father," answered Snap, as he clipped from the singer's head matted locks around the wound, with a small pair of scissors, from a case of instruments which he took from his breast pocket.

"Nay, I said not that my name was Benjamin. Judah is my name," he added.

"Judah! Thou bearest a goodly name, my son," observed the ancient.

"Yet it is so long since I was called by it, that it sounds a stranger to me, father."

"Yes; Judah is a royal name, my son," mused the old man.

"So said my mother, Judith," the other observed.

"Thy mother's name was Judith, didst thou say?"

"It was."

"Judith was my sister's name. It is now thirty years ago—aye more—thirty-three years ago since I saw my sister Judith. We parted in Russia—"

"In Russia!" interrupted Snap, with eager interest, but still cutting the hair away and bathing the wound.

"In Russia, Judah. Wast ever there? 'Tis a land of cruelty. Oh Benjamin, my son, my son!" and the old man seemed for a moment overpowered with the memory of the past, from which, however, he started, and tenderly contemplated the wounded stranger.

"Is he dangerously hurt?" he asked. "The cut is less ugly now the blood is cleaned away. Thy hand, Judah, is gentle as a woman's."

"The hurt is not serious, though the cut is deep," replied he who had given his name as Judah.

"But I fear some limb is broken," he continued, as he ripped up the sleeve of the singer's doublet.

"Alas!" responded the old man.

"No, 'tis but the collar-bone dislocated," Snap remarked.

"God is merciful," said the Jew.

"Your door was timely opened, father," returned the man of science, as he rested for a moment from his operation.

"It is never closed against the needy, Judah. But I took you at first for a midnight prowler."

Just then old Rebecca entered, followed by her son, Levi.

"Ha! Rebecca, it is one of our tribe. His friend is hurt nigh unto death. Light us to my bed-room. The stranger shall be given my own bed. The Jew is not a dog. Father Abraham, my own sufferings have taught me the lesson of humanity. Oh Benjamin, my son, my son!"

With these words, the venerable man passed out of the room, following Snap, who bore in his arms the senseless Farinelli.

Having laid the singer on the bed of the master of the house, the mentor skillfully dressed the wound in the head and set the collar-bone with the assistance of Rebecca and her son. After an hour thus spent, the men left Farinelli in the hands of the old nurse and returned to the parlor. The old Jew then gave orders to Levi to prepare breakfast for the stranger whom for a while he left alone.

"Here is a locket which I took from Farinelli's breast," observed the mentor to himself. "Now, I'll be sworn, 'tis a portrait of his foster-sister. Poor fool, I pity him. To love a woman! A slave of passion, a victim of jealousy! 'Tis the romance of folly. I find pleasure only in philosophy. Here is the spring which opens the locket. Now I never loved any one in my life, but my master and his son; no, not even my—Why, it is the portrait of a little girl."

Snap contemplated the picture which he held in his hand for several minutes with an eager scrutiny as intense as though he had been solving a scientific problem. Gradually a shade of softness stole over his hard, passionless countenance; the cynical expression habitually there died away, and a deep, love-light crept up into his dark, Jewish eye, as from a hidden soul within, which till now had slept beneath a veil.

"Where have I seen this angel-face before? In some dream? And yet there is a reminiscence in this face which is not all a dream. This picture troubles me as if the spirit of some departed one were in the inanimate, and fain would speak to me. Bah, I am growing superstitious."

And the mentor tossed the locket upon the table, seated himself in the old Jew's arm-chair and drew it near the fire. But ere five minutes had passed, he returned to the table and again contemplated the locket as earnestly as before.

"Yes, it is the likeness of my sister Rachel. I have solved the problem," observed he with a sigh of relief.

"It is my sister Rachel; my mother left her in Russia with my uncle Isaac. My little sister Rachel was the only mortal I ever loved, excepting the general and his son. Pshaw! they are no exception. Men are only animals whose instincts make them kin. Their selfish interests and necessities bind them—nothing more. But my sister Rachel, I remember as an angel, such as we sometimes fancy are waiting to welcome the good above. Bah, that is but a dream of folly. I am giving way to superstitious nonsense. Angels are myths. We cannot solve the problem of a hereafter, and therefore the subject is unworthy our thoughts. Science alone becomes investigation, for that is the only Book of Revelation. Yet my sister Rachel is to me an angel at this moment, notwithstanding. How her innocent face moves me!"

And the sceptic kissed the picture, while a tear glistened in his eye.

"Yes," he murmured, "even I have some heart left. The memory of my sister Rachel—"

"Rachel, Rachel!" exclaimed the old Jew, entering, and interrupting the reverie, "Who spoke of Rachel?"

My sister's name was Rachel. Father, is not this the face of an angel?"

"God of Abraham! 'Tis my Rachel—Rachel Ben Ammon! How didst thou come by this?"

"Thy name—thy name, old man?" questioned Judah excitedly, instead of replying.

"My name, my son, is Isaac Ben Ammon."

"Then there is a Providence!" returned Judah. "I must own a Providence in this night's meeting!"

"What meanest thou, Judah?"

"That I am less an infidel," replied the sceptic.

"Believest thou not in the God of our fathers, Judah?"

"I think to-night that the God of Abraham was not a myth," was the answer.

"I know He was not, Judah," observed the venerable Hebrew.

"Yes, I think He was not," said the sceptic. "I would that I could solve it."

"But that picture? Give it me," broke in Isaac Ben Ammon. "'Tis mine. Where didst thou find it, Judah? Nay, my son, withhold it not. 'Tis mine beyond all doubt. Thou wouldst not withhold from the old man the likeness of his child?"

"It is the likeness of my sister Rachel. I am the son of Judith and nephew of Isaac Ben Ammon!"

"Thou, Judith's son?"

"Even so."

"God of Abraham, I thank thee!" said the ancient.

"This picture is our Rachel's then," he added.

"I know not," Judah replied, "but that it is the likeness of my sister Rachel, I am assured. The rest I must solve."

"Where found you it?"

"On the person of Farinelli."

"The wounded stranger?"

"Even so."

"Yes, 'tis Rachel's face, indeed. And my son Benjamin—what of him?"

"I nothing know, uncle, of Benjamin, excepting that he married my sister."

"Father Abraham, shall I ever find my lost children? moaned the old man.

"Know you nothing, uncle, of his fate and that of Rachel, my sister?"

"Naught, Judah, beyond a dreadful ordeal through which he barely passed with life. Oh Benjamin, my son—my son!"

"Be comforted, uncle. If living, I will find him and my sister, Rachel."

"Yes, yes, good Judah," said the venerable Hebrew, with kindled hope. "Thou art young Judah. Thou wilt find Benjamin and his bride. I am sure thou canst. He must be living, Judah. It is impossible that he can be no more among the living. Thou wilt find them, my son. Swear to me by my fathers' God that thou wilt find them. Promise the old man, Judah, oh promise him, that you will search the earth to restore to him his son and thy sister—thy sister, Rachel, also."

"If he is with the living, I will restore him to you, my uncle. And now let us sit down to breakfast. Then take a draught which I will prepare, for you need repose. To-morrow you shall awake refreshed and strong, and I will listen to your history since you parted from young Benjamin. 'Twill help me in my search for him."

"And I had nearly turned thee from my doors, Judah. Father Abraham, pardon me."

"There is a Providence in this night's meeting, uncle Isaac. Sceptic as I have been, I say again I own a Providence in this. It is our own individual experience that brings us into the state of faith."

"The God of our fathers be praised!" responded Isaac Ben Ammon.

CHAPTER XXVI.

ISAAC BEN AMMON'S STORY.

It was in the afternoon succeeding the events related in our last chapter. The aged Hebrew was seated in an arm-chair of antique fashion. His Jewish gaberdine fastened by a rich girdle, hung loosely about his venerable form. On his finger he wore a massive diamond ring which would have been a fitting ransom for a prince. His features were noble; his countenance pale and elongated, and his white beard which reached to his bosom, gave him a most patriarchal appearance.

On the opposite side sat his nephew, whom we have known by the sobriquet of Snap, and by the more classical one of the Mentor. In future, in his associations with his Hebrew relatives, we shall call him by his proper name, Judah Nathans.

"Uncle Isaac," observed Judah, as the old man was about to commence his story "if you are not equal to the task leave it till to-morrow."

"Nay, nephew."

"But you look pale and agitated, Uncle Isaac."

"I am well, Judah—as well as I am wont to be."

"Yet you suffer! I read your history written on your countenance. The intensity of your feelings have drained your life, Uncle. You must throw off this weight of care."

Alas! alas! Judah, you know not what to say. Since the merciless officers of the Czar gave the youthful Benjamin to the dreadful torture of the knout—Oh Father Abraham, the memory of it kills me—I have often, Judah, mentally suffered the agonies which my stripling son endured in that awful hour. Not even did my own personal calamities—the loss of fortune and banishment to Siberia, equal what I have borne in anguish for my Benjamin."

"Dwell not upon it, Uncle Isaac."

"Alas! alas, Judah But I will tell my story in its order."

"Uncle, I listen."

"Your mother was my only sister," began Isaac Ben Ammon. "She was two years younger than myself—no more; for though my form is bowed and the white locks on my forehead as scant leaves on the autumn tree, yet is my age but sixty-seven. My grandsire lived until he was ninety-seven; and scarcely then seemed older than I."

"Yet, your form in youth, Uncle Isaac, must have been like the stately oak."

Alas! Judah! it is now like the oak stricken by the thunderbolt. I had a frame of iron, but suffering has bowed it to the earth."

"Your mother and myself," resumed the old man, after a moment's pause, "grew to maturity. We were happy. I entered into the calling of our race, and thrived as did our father Jacob, when he kept the flocks of Laban, for the blessing of our father's God was with me. I thought not of coming woe. The calamities which in ages past fell upon the chosen people because of their transgressions were as a dispensation of judgments over. My own prosperity seemed to me a bright prophecy of future blessings to Israel."

"Thus it ever is, when we ourselves are blessed," observed his philosophical nephew.

"I grew an enthusiast," continued the patriarch, "for I was devoted to the God and religion of our fathers. I deemed the time had come to favor Israel; for in the nations of Europe the sons of our antique race were rising in political as well as commercial power. I saw the destiny of nations passing into their hands; monarchs courted them; the commerce of the world pulsated at their will; the finance of governments were secretly controled by the house of Judah. To my ardent mind it seemed that the day had nearly come for the jubilee of our return to be proclaimed to our nation. Say unto the daughter of Zion, thy transgressions are blotted out. Return and rebuild with marble the ancient city. Beautify her Temple with gold and precious stones. In fancy, I heard the voice of our Messiah proclaim it to our people with more than the wondrous charm of the ram's horns which our priests blew when the walls of Jericho fell."

"Dreams, Uncle Isaac, dreams," interrupted his nephew.

"Believest thou not, Nephew, that Jacob shall again be a mighty nation?"

"Jacob was never so blessed, Uncle Isaac, as in the captivity which led him into every land. Israel was never so great a nation as now."

"What sayest thou, Judah?" asked the patriarch with astonishment.

"Of old," observed his nephew in reply "our people were but as busy ants in a tiny sand-hill Hardly worth the name of a nation —they were but a large family which generations had multiplied."

"It was the promise to Abraham. Our seed were to be as the stars in the firmament," observed the venerable Hebrew, reverently.

"All that our people have ever been in race they are to-day; but now, as you yourself have said, they hold empires in their hand. In their glory as a separate nation, ever under David and Solomon, they merely shared in common with the gentiles their little Palastine. Their dispersion was a blessing; their restoration—a dream, Uncle Isaac—a long-cherished dream, but still a dream."

"What, Judah; believest thou not that the covenant will be restored and Israel gathered to the land which God gave to our father Abraham?"

"Pardon me, Uncle; I interrupt your story."

Judah saw that his uncle was still an enthusiast. The venerable Hebrew continued:

"When your mother had reached the age of eighteen, she married Levi, your father. She loved her husband; but I—well, no matter, Judah, of that."

"You did not approve of my mother's choice, Uncle Isaac?"

"I said not so much, Judah, as that I did not approve."

"The truth offends me not, Uncle."

"Well, Nephew, to confess the truth, your father was not thrifty."

Isaac Ben Ammon said this as though he was admitting against his brother-in-law a cardinal sin. He "was not thrifty." All of the Jew was crowded in the sentence.

"Levi was of a strange mind," continued the old man, "and loved not commerce. Science was his delight. But there is no thrift in it, Judah. Yet knowledge is very good. Solomon was wise beyond all men, but commerce, Judah, best becomes the genius of our race."

"I believe, uncle, I inherit my father's sins. I admire Solomon more than Jacob."

"Now mark me, nephew," continued the uncle. "Levi Nathans increased not like Jacob in this world's substance; a family grew up around my sister. You were her first-born; Rachel, my Benjamin's bride, her youngest child. Levi and Judeth with their family went to England, what more of sons or daughters were born to them there I know not."

"I will some other time supply their history. Suffice now that my parents are dead as I told you, and of all the family I alone am left. The pestilence swept all away but me."

"Alas, alas!" said Isaac Ben Ammon. "The scourge fell not alone on me. What am I that I should murmur."

"Resume your story, uncle."

"As you have learned, Judah, since we met last night your sister Rachel, whom your parents left with me, became the bride of young Benjamin. He was my only offspring. How happy the union of Benjamin and Rachel made his mother Sarah and myself you well can fancy."

"I can, uncle Isaac."

"But one evil day, Judah, I was induced to loan money to the conspiring nobles of Russia, for they told me that prince Nicholas desired the throne. They told me that this daring prince would carry out the intentions of Peter the Great, and among the rest redeem the Holy Land and break up the Ottoman empire. I was tempted, for I deemed that this would lead to the return of the Jews. Alas, Judah, the result was my own exile and my tender boy was given to the torture of the knout. I cannot dwell upon that day."

Overpowered by his emotions the old man broke off for a few moments, but then continued.

"Sarah, my wife, died of a broken heart, and my children fled, designing to go to Italy. But their fate since I know not. Father Abraham, shall I ever find my children?"

"How came you from Siberia, uncle? Did you escape or did Nicholas on his ascension recall you?" asked Judah, to draw the old man from his unpleasant memories.

"For ten years, Judah, I was an exile in Siberia, and then the Czar granted my petition for pardon. I returned to Russia and was graciously received by Nicholas. Not the most distant reference was made to his favor of the old conspiracy, for he fain would hide the indiscretion of his youth. Indeed, he affected to pity me on the assumption of my innocence, treating the conspiracy as a thing which never had any real existence. His brother Alexander, he said, had been misled by his ministers and betrayed by false tales. The advantage was that the nobles to whom I had loaned my monies redeemed their obligations with a fair interest which, to do them justice, was willingly rendered. Thus I was restored to more than my lost wealth."

"That indeed was handsome in the Czar," observed the nephew.

"Yes," replied Isaac Ben Ammon, "Nicholas of Russia is magnanimous, though his will is of iron, and his vengeance fearful when aroused."

"Did you continue in Russia, uncle?" interrogated his listener.

"For five years I did," was the reply, "and I sent my agents the world over to search for my son and his wife; but they found them not. At length one of my agents traced them to Italy; but the circumstances were so obscure that nothing certain could be discovered."

"In Italy," observed Judah, making a mental note. "There is a link to the likeness of my sister Rachel, found on the wounded singer. Go on, uncle."

"I then gathered together my wealth and resolved to make Italy my home. It was the land to which my Benjamin had fled, and where he had been was sanctified to my anxious heart. I came to Rome, and to occupy my mind continued in the calling of our race, though with but little ambition. Since that time I have traveled through all the cities of Italy to find my son, but in vain, until Providence sent you to my doors last night with the wounded stranger upon whose person you found the picture of your sister Rachel, not a trace of my children could I discover. But oh, Judah, we have found it at last. The God of Jacob, whose faith prevailed, has not sent that angel's face to us in vain."

"It is strange," murmured the Mentor. "Yes it is, uncle, a very strange coincidence that the lost links of our family were found together last night. I am less a sceptic than I was."

"You think that likeness will discover more—you think so good Judah?" eagerly queried the old man.

"Yes, uncle, I think so. But how came Farinelli with it? What connection can he have had with my sister Rachel?" Surely he is not her son? No, he is too old for that. I cannot make it out. I must solve the problem of his connection with that picture."

At this moment old Rebecca entered in excitement, and informed her master that the wounded man was delerious. She had left him with her son Levi, she said, who could only with difficulty hold him in his bed.

"Let us go to him, uncle. I will administer a sleeping draught. I would not have him die without revealing the secret of that picture."

"Nor I," said Isaac. "Half my wealth I would give to save his live to reveal that secret "

And they hurried to the room of the wounded singer, whom they found in the state reported. He seemed to half recognize the Mentor as he entered, for he became still more furious.

"Give me my foster-sister," he cried, stretching his arms widely to Judah.

"Terese, leave me not for him. He would destroy you body and soul. He does not love you as Beppo loves you. Curse him, curse him. No, Terese, forgive me. I will not curse him if you will not forsake your foster-brother for the false English noble. Ha! the villian takes her from me to bear her to England. He will make her his mistress. Let me after him."

"Who is this Terese, good Judah, that the young man's fancy conjures up?"

"I know not, uncle, more than that she is his foster-sister, and the prima donna which has of late been winning triumphs in Rome.

The singer laid exhausted, and Judah stood contemplating him in deep thought. An idea seemed to have struck him and he was finding its connection.

"Yes," he said at length, exultingly, "I have found it."

"What have you found, nephew?"

"The missing link, uncle."

"In what and where?"

"In your granddaughter."

"My granddaughter! God of Abraham, what mean you, Judah?"

"Mark, uncle!" and he took from his pocket the locket and held it before the eyes of Farinelli, who savagely clutched it, thrust it in his bosom and pressing it to his heart murmured "Terese, Terese."

The old Jew understood it all in a moment, and he sunk upon his knees and exclaimed:

"God of Abraham, I thank thee. I have found the child of Rachel and Benjamin. Oh, where are they?" and he hid his face in his hands.

The Mentor, not unmoved, yet still in a scientific mood, looked on with the satisfaction of one who had solved a problem, not one whose faith had received a revelation. His own acuteness had found it out.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE JEWESS AND HER UNCLE.

"Signor Spontini, is your pupil at home?" inquired Judah Nathans of the composer who had answered the knock at the door of his villa, situated on the outskirts of Rome.

"She is, signor," was the reply.

"Can I see her, signor?"

"She is within," the maestro said with some embarrassment, seeming neither to invite the stranger into his villa nor to refuse an entrance.

"I am glad that Terese is at home," Judah replied, thus leaving the composer no alternative between a refusal or an admission."

"What name shall I give, signor?"

"Judah Nathans."

"I would you had not called to-day, signor, for my pupil is in trouble."

"I am very sorry," was the sympathetic rejoinder.

"Her foster-brother is missing."

"I have news of him."

"Indeed! Are you known to my adopted child?"

"I knew her mother."

"Her mother? You astonish me."

"Her mother was my sister," said Judah.

"Holy Virgin! Terese's mother your sister!" exclaimed Spontini.

"Rachel, her mother, was truly my sister."

"This is wonderful."

"Her grandsire, Isaac Ben Ammon, is waiting to fold Terese to his heart," continued Judah.

"Isaac Ben Ammon is her grandsire. This is wonderful news, wonderful news, signor," replied the composer excitedly. "Walk in, signor. My pupil must know of this at once. I hope you are not deceived. It would be cruel to trifle with the poor child."

"Startle her not, Signor Spontini," observed her uncle with cautious solicitude.

"You are right, signor. My pupil is already afflicted concerning the absence of her foster-brother."

"Say that I bring news of him. The rest I will gently break to her."

"Yes, it is best so. This will be a surprise indeed. I hope you do not intend to take her from me. Holy Virgin, I would Sir Walter Templar was here."

Her uncle thought differently, but he followed the musician without reply

"Here is a friend, Terese, who brings us intelligence of Farinelli," said Spontini, as they entered the room where the Hebrew maiden sat looking from the window, her thoughts divided between anxiety for her foster-brother, and uncertain dreams of her departed lover.

One moment the beautiful Jewess would in her trustful fancy picture the future bright as the great love of Walter could make it if she became his bride.

"Yes, Providence will overrule all for the best," she murmured. "His family will release him from his betrothal. Eleanor herself will insist upon it when she knows how dearly he loves me."

But then at the next moment came the uncertainty, and the longing to know the worst or be confirmed in the assurance which her lover breathed into her ear as they parted, and sealed with a prolonged, passionate kiss upon her lips, as though he feared, in spite of his assurance, that their parting would be forever.

With each reaction from her hopefulness came an anxiety for her foster-brother, and the thoughts of what had become of him. She knew somewhat of his jealousy, for she had marked it, and perhaps the indistinct association in her mind of Walter and Farinelli as rivals, so constantly brought the two up together in her reverie that afternoon. It might have been, too, because intuitive natures like that of the Jewess sense the hidden circumstances which are approaching them, and by their prescient instincts foreshadow phases of their lives yet to be revealed. Hence we often think of persons who are nearing us, and forebode events which immediately manifest themselves.

In this en rapport state of mind Spontini and her uncle found Terese, and when the maestro as he entered observed:

"Here is a friend, Terese, who brings intelligence of Farinelli," the maiden started to her feet and came towards them with the eagerness of one who expected some message of deepest moment.

"Oh, signor, where is my foster-brother? What news have you for me? Tell me, I beseech you."

But her uncle, instead of making a direct reply, bent upon the maiden a long gaze of tenderest interest. Fain would he have folded her to his heart as he did his little sister Rachel when he left her in Russia. Not to that heart had he pressed a creature in love since that day; for as a boy he was made churlish by ill-treatment, as a man cynical by his intellectual scepticism of the genuineness of human affections. He deemed that self-interest and passion governed the action of mortals, and to the potency of evil he gave too large an influence in the affairs of life. But he himself was a proof that the world is "not all dross," as he stood with his tender gaze bent upon his niece, and a yearning in his heart to fold her there.

Terese, not understanding the meaning of the stranger's manner, and thinking it had exclusive reference to Farinelli, after the moment's silence, laying her hand impulsively upon his arm, said:

"In mercy, signor, keep me not in this suspense. What has become of my foster-brother?"

"Be not alarmed, gentle maiden," her uncle replied, affectionately. "No serious harm has happened."

"But harm has happened to him. Oh tell me the worst, signor, Oh tell me the worst. Keep me not in suspense."

"I have told you the worst, my child, in saying that harm has happened. Be seated; compose yourself and I will tell you all."

Terese took her seat as desired, and her uncle and Spontini followed her example.

"My child," began her uncle, "your foster-brother has been wounded, but not seriously. 'Tis but a bruise. I will answer for his speedy recovery. I deceive you not, lady. I could not deceive you, my child."

The maiden thought the stranger's tender words were those of sympathy, and evinced no surprise thereat.

"How came my poor foster-brother hurt?" she asked.

"In an encounter two nights ago with some unknown man," was the reply.

"I cannot tell you the particulars, my child."

"It is strange."

"Suffice it maiden, that coming upon the scene, I rescued him and bore him to a house where he received surgical skill and nursing."

"Is he still there?"

"Yes."

"I will go to him. We will go at once, good Spontini. Order our cariage, maestro, while I hasten to attire."

"Nay, nay, my child," said her uncle. "Your foster-brother is in good hands. I have not yet communicated all."

"I listen, signor," observed Terese, resuming her seat.

"We found a small locket on the person of your foster-brother. It was the picture of a child—a little maiden some eight years of age I should suppose."

"'Tis the picture of myself."

"He wore it next his heart," continued her as yet unknown uncle.

"My foster-brother ever loved me," observed the maiden with a blush.

"It is the picture of my sister," said Judah.

"No, signor stranger. That cannot be. It is the picture of myself. I know my foster-brother wears it. It cannot be another picture than mine. If you knew Beppo as I do, you would say so too."

The slight touch of woman's jealousy manifested that Terese was not altogether unconscious of her foster-brother's hopeless love.

"I am right, my child. 'Tis the likeness of my sister Rachel."

"My mother's name was Rachel," observed the Jewess, startled.

"And your father's name was Benjamin, the only son of Isaac Ben Ammon?"

"It was. But how know you my history, signor?"

"You mother was my sister; I am Judah, her eldest brother. Rachel, Rachel, my niece—for to me you are Rachel—I see your mother in you—Rachel, my little one, will you not come to your uncle Judah's arms?"

And the cynic, the infidel, the man of evil as he classed himself, opened his arms, and Terese obeying her impulse, was clasped to his heart with a fervent embrace; and as her uncle kissed her, a tear glistened in his dark eye so usually passionless, but passionless from a nature subdued. Spontini looked on and doubted not the relationship between Judah Nathans and Terese Ben Ammon.

THE GOOD WIFE.

It is just as you say, neighbor Green,
A treasure indeed is my wife;
Such another for bustle and work
I never have found in my life.
But then she keeps everyone else
As busy as birds on the wing:
There is never a moment for rest,
She is such a fidgety thing.

She makes the best bread in the town,
Her pies are a perfect delight,
Her coffee a rich golden brown,
Her crullers and puddings just right.
But then while I eat them she tells
Of the care and the worry they bring,
Of the martyr-like toils she endures—
O, she's such a fidgety thing!

My house is as neat as a pin,
You should see how the door-handles shine,
And all of the soft-cushioned chairs
And nicely-swept carpets are mine.
But then she so frets at the dust,
At a fly, at a straw, at a string,
That I stay out of doors all I can,
She is such a fidgety thing.

She doctors the neighbors—O yes,
If a child has the measles or croup,
She is there with her saffrons and squills,
Her dainty-made gruels and soup.
But then she insists on her right
To physic my blood in the spring:
And she takes the whole charge of my bile—
O, she's such a fidgety thing!

She knits all my stockings herself,
My shirts are bleached white as the snow;
My old clothes look better than new,
Yet daily more threadbare they grow.
But then if a morsel of lint
Or dust on my trousers should cling,
I'm sure of one sermon at least,
She is such a fidgety thing.

You have heard of a spirit so meek,
So meek that it never opposes,
Its own it dares never to speak—
Alas, I am meeker than Moses.
But then I am not reconciled
The subordinate music to sing:
I submit to get rid of a row,
She is such a fidgety thing.

It's just as you say, neighbor Green,
A treasure to me has been given;
But sometimes I fain would be glad
To lay up my treasure in heaven.
But then every life has its cross,
Most pleasures on earth have their sting:
She's a treasure, I know, neighbor Green.
But she's such a fidgety thing.

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES,

7⅓ OCTAVES

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly, The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on, that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching, says the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage: that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELAS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket: that trouble in my Throat (for which Throches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

N. P. WILLIS.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

I recommend their use to public speakers.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Saratoga
A
WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring: four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

THY SPIRIT MOVETH BY MY SIDE.

By Roscoe Monigan.

Thy spirit moveth by my side
In thought, where'er I be;
Nor time nor absence can divide
My soul, O love, from thee.

And now, though parted—far away,
My dear one, as of yore—
My mind beholds thee day by day—
I love thee more and more.

The music of thy gentle voice,
The sweet smile in thine eye,
Still bid me in my grief rejoice,
With hope that cannot die.

I prize thy fondness far above
All joys I e'er have known;
O, take the sceptre, dearest love,
And make my heart thy throne.

THE SIGNAL-MAN.

"Halloa! Below there!"

When he heard a voice thus calling to him, he was standing at the door of his box, with a flag in his hand, furled round its short pole. One would have thought, considering the nature of the ground, that he could not have doubted from what quarter the voice came; but instead of looking up to where I stood on the top of the steep cutting nearly over his head, he turned himself about and looked down the Line. There was something remarkable in his manner of doing so, though I could not have said, for my life, what. But, I know it was remarkable enough to attract my notice, even though his figure was foreshortened and shadowed, down in the deep trench, and mine was high above him, so steeped in the glow of an angry sunset that I had shaded my eyes with my hand before I saw him at all.

"Halloa! Below!"

From looking down the line, he turned himself about again, and, raising his eyes, saw my figure high above him.

"Is there any path by which I can come down and speak to you?"

He looked up at me without replying, and I looked down at him without pressing him too soon with a repetition of my idle question. Just then, there came a vague vibration in the earth and air, quickly changing into a violent pulsation, and an oncoming rush that caused me to start back, as though it had force to draw me down. When such vapor as rose to my height from this rapid train, had passed me and was skimming away over the landscape, I looked down again, and saw him re-furling the flag he had shown while the train went by.

I repeated my inquiry. After a pause, during which he seemed to regard me with fixed attention, he motioned with his rolled-up flag towards a point on my level, some two or three hundred yards distant. I called down to him, "All right!" and made for that point. There, by dint of looking closely about me, I found a rough, zig-zag descending path notched out: which I followed.

The cutting was extremely deep, and unusually precipitate. It was made through a clammy stone that became oozier and wetter as I went down. For these reasons, I found the way long enough to give me time to recall a singular air of reluctance or compulsion with he which had pointed out the path.

When I came down low enough upon the ziz zag descent, to see him again, I saw that he was standing between the rails on the way by which the train had lately passed, in an attitude as if he were waiting for me to appear. He had his left hand at his chin, and that left elbow rested on his right hand crossed over his breast. His attitude was one of such expectation and watchfulness, that I stopped a moment, wondering at it.

I resumed my downward way, and, stepping out upon the level of the railroad and drawing nearer to him, saw that he was a dark sallow man, with a dark beard and rather heavy eyebrows. His post was in as solitary and dismal a place as ever I saw. On either side a dripping-wet wall of jagged stone, excluding all view but a strip of sky; the perspective one way, only a crooked prolongation of this great dungeon; the shorter perspective in the other direction, terminating in a gloomy red light, and the gloomier entrance to a black tunnel, in whose massive architecture there was a barbarous, depressing, and forbidding air. So little sunlight ever found its way to this spot, that it had an earthy deadly smell; and so much cold wind rushed through it, that it struck chill to me, as if I had left the natural world.

Before he stirred, I was near enough to have touched him. Not even then removing his eyes from mine, he stepped back one step, and lifted his hand.

This was a lonesome post to occupy (I said), and it had riveted my attention when I looked down from up yonder. A visitor was a rarity, I should suppose; not an unwelcome rarity, I hoped? In me, he merely saw a man who had been shut up within narrow limits all his life, and who, being at last set free, had a newly awakened interest in these great works. To such purpose I spoke to him; but I am far from sure of the terms I used, for, besides that I am not happy in opening any conversation, there was something in the man that daunted me.

He directed a most curious look towards the red light near the tunnel's mouth, and looked all about it, as if something were missing from it, and then looked at me.

That light was part of his charge? Was it not?

He answered in a low voice: "Dont you know it is?"

The monstrous thought came into my mind as I perused the fixed eyes and the saturnine face, that this was a spirit, not a man. I have speculated since, whether there may have been infection in his mind.

In my turn, I stepped back. But in making the action, I detected in his eyes some latent fear of me. This put the monstrous thought to flight.

"You look at me," I said, forcing a smile, "as if you had a dread of me."

"I was doubtful," he returned, "whether I had seen you before."

"Where?"

He pointed to the red light he had looked at.

"There?" I said.

Intently watchful of me, he replied (but without sound), Yes.

"My good fellow, what should I do there? However, be that as it may, I never was there, you may swear."

"I think I may," he rejoined. "Yes. I am sure I may."

His manner cleared, like my own. He replied to my remarks with readiness, and in well chosen words. Had he much to do there? Yes; that was to say, he had enough responsibility to bear; but exactness and watchfulness were what was required of him, and of actual work—manual labor—he had next to none. To change that signal, to trim those lights, and to turn this iron handle now and then, was all he had to do under that head. Regarding those many lonely hours of which I seemed to make so much, he could only say that the routine of his life had shaped itself into that form, and he had grown used to it. He had taught himself a language down here—if only to know it by sight, and to have formed his own crude ideas of its pronunciation, could be called learning it. He had also worked at fractions and decimals, and tried a little algebra; but he was, and had been as a boy, a poor hand at figures. Was it necessary for him when on duty, always to remain in that channel of damp air, and could he never rise into the sunshine from between these high stone walls? Why, that depended upon times and circumstances. Under some conditions there would be less upon the Line than under others, and the same held good as to certain hours of the day and night. In bright weather, he did chose occasions for getting a little above these lower shadows; but, being at all times liable to be called by his electric bell, and at such times listening for it with redoubled anxiety, the relief was less than I would suppose.

He took me into his box, where there was a fire, a desk for an official book in which he had to make certain entries, a telegraphic instrument with its dial face and needles, and the little bell of which he had spoken. On my trusting that he would excuse the remark that he had been well educated, and (I hoped I might say without offence), perhaps educated above that station, he observed that instances of slight incongruity in such-wise would rarely be found wanting among large bodies of men; that he had heard it was so in workhouses, in the police force, even in that last desperate resource, the army; and he knew it was so, more or less, in any great railway staff. He had been, when young (if I could believe it, sitting in that hut; he scarcely could), a student of natural philosophy, and had attended lectures; but he had run wild, misused his opportunities, gone down, and never risen again. He had no complaint to offer about that. He had made his bed, and he lay upon it. It was far too late to make another.

All that I have here condensed, he said in a quiet manner, with his grave dark regards divided between me and the fire. He threw in the word "Sir," from time to time, and especially when he referred to his youth: as though to request me to understand that he claimed to be nothing but what I found him. He was several times interrupted by the little bell, and had to read off messages, and send replies. Once, he had to stand without the door, and display a flag as a train passed, and make some verbal communication to the driver. In the discharge of his duties I observed him to be remarkably exact and vigilant, breaking off his discourse at a syllable, and remaining silent until what he had to do was done.

In a word, I should have set this man down as one of the safest of men to be employed in that capacity, but for the circumstance that while he was speaking to me he twice broke off with a fallen color, turned his face towards the little bell when it did NOT ring, opened the door of the hut (which was kept shut to exclude the unhealthy damp), and looked out towards the red light near the mouth of the tunnel. On both of those occasions, he came back to the fire with the inexplicable air upon him which I had remarked, without being able to define, when we were so far asunder.

Said I when I rose to leave him: "You almost make me think that I have met with a contented man."

(I am afraid I must acknowledge that I said it to lead him on.)

"I believe I used to be so," he rejoined, in the low voice in which he had first spoken; "but I am troubled, sir, I am troubled."

He would have recalled the words if he could. He had said them, however, and I took them up quickly.

"With what? What is your trouble?"

"It is very difficult to impart, sir. It is very, very difficult to speak of. If you ever make me another visit, I will try to tell you."

"But I expressly intend to make you another visit. Say, when shall it be?"

"I go off early in the morning, and I shall be on again at ten to-morrow night, sir."

"I will come at eleven."

He thanked me, and went out at the door with me. "I'll show you my white light, sir," he said, in his peculiar low voice, "till you have found the way up. When you have found it, don't call out! And when you are at the top, don't call out!"

His manner seemed to make the place strike colder to me, but I said no more than "Very well."

"And when you come down to-morrow night, don't call out! Let me ask you a parting question. What made you cry 'Halloa! Below there!' to-night?"

"Heaven knows," said I. "I cried something to that effect——"

"Not to that effect, sir. Those were the very words. I know them well."

"Admit those were the very words. I said them, no doubt, because I saw you below."

"For no other reason?"

"What other reason could I possibly have!"

"You had no feeling that they were conveyed to you in any supernatural way?"

"No."

He wished me good night, and held up his light. I walked by the side of the down Line of rails (with a very disagreeable sensation of a train coming behind me), until I found the path. It was easier to mount than to descend, and I got back to my inn without any adventure.

Punctual to my appointment, I placed my foot on the first notch of the zig-zag next night, as the distant clocks were striking eleven. He was waiting for me at the bottom with his white light on. "I have not called out," I said, when we came close together; "may I speak now?" "By all means, sir." "Good night, then, and here's my hand." "Good night, sir, and here's mine." With that, we walked side by side to his box, entered it, closed the door, and sat down by the fire.

"I have made up my mind, sir," he began, bending forward as soon as we were seated, and speaking in a tone but a little above a whisper, "that you shall not have to ask me twice what troubles me. I took you for some one else yesterday evening. That troubles me.'

"That mistake?"

"No. That some one else."

"Who is it?"

"I don't know."

"Like me?"

"I don't know. I never saw the face. The left arm is across the face, and the right arm is waved. Violently waved. This way."

I followed his action with my eyes, and it was the action of an arm gesticulating with the utmost passion and vehemence: "For God's sake clear the way!"

"One moonlight night," said the man, "I was sitting here, when I heard a voice cry 'Halloa! Below there!' I started up, looked from that door, and saw this Some one else standing by the red light near the tunnel, waving as I just now showed you. The voice seemed hoarse with shouting, and it cried, 'Look out! Look out!' And then again 'Halloa! Below there! Look out!' I caught up my lamp, turned it on red, and ran towards the figure, calling, 'What's wrong? What has happened? Where?' It stood just outside the blackness of the tunnel. I advanced so close upon it that I wondered at its keeping the sleeve across its eyes. I ran right up at it, and had my hand stretched out to pull the sleeve away, when it was gone."

"Into the tunnel," said I.

"No. I ran on into the tunnel, five hundred yards. I stopped and held my lamp above my head, and saw the figures of the measured distance, and saw the wet stains stealing down the walls and trickling through the arch. I ran out again, faster than I had run in (for I had a mortal abhorrence of the place upon me), and I looked all round the red light, and I went up the iron ladder to the gallery atop of it, and I came down again and ran back here. I telegraphed both ways 'An alarm has been given. Is anything wrong?' The answer came back, both ways 'All well.'"

Resisting the slow touch of a frozen finger tracing out my spine, I showed him how that this figure must be a deception of his sense of sight, and how that figures, originating in disease of the delicate nerves that minister to the functions of the eye, were known to have often troubled patients, some of whom had become conscious of the nature of their affliction, and had even proven it by experiments upon themselves. "As to an imaginary cry," said I, "do but listen for a moment to the wind in this unnatural valley while we speak so low, and to the wild harp it makes of the telegraph wires."

That was all very well, he returned, after we had sat listening for a while, and he ought to know something of the wind and the wires, he who so often passed long winter nights there, alone and watching. But he would beg to remark that he had not finished.

I asked his pardon, and he slowly added these words, touching my arm:

"Within six hours after the Appearance; the memorable accident on this Line happened, and within ten hours the dead and wounded were brought along through the tunnel over the spot where the figure had stood."

A disagreeable shudder crept over me, but I did my best against it. It was not to be denied, I rejoined, that this was a remarkable coincidence, calculated deeply to impress his mind. But, it was unquestionable that remarkable coincidences did continually occur, and they must be taken into account in dealing with such a subject. Though to be sure I must admit, I added (for I thought I saw that he was going to bring the objection to bear upon me), men of common sense did not allow much for coincidences in making the ordinary calculations of life.

He again begged to remark that he had not finished.

I again begged his pardon for being betrayed into interruptions.

"This," he said, again laying his hand upon my arm, and glancing over his shoulder with hollow eyes, "was just a year ago. Six or seven months passed, and I had recovered from the surprise and shock, when one morning, as the day was breaking, I, standing at that door, looked towards the red light, and saw the spectre again." He stopped, with a fixed look at me.

"Did it cry out?"

"No. It was silent."

"Did it wave its arm?"

"No. It leaned against the shaft of the light, with both hands before the face. Like this."

Once more, I followed his action with my eyes. It was an action of mourning. I have seen such an attitude in stone figures on tombs.

"Did you go up to it?"

"I came in and sat down, partly to collect my thoughts, partly because it had turned me faint. When I went to the door again, daylight was above me, and the ghost was gone."

"But nothing followed? Nothing came of this?"

He touched me on the arm with his forefinger twice or thrice, giving a ghastly nod each time:

"That very day, as a train came out of the tunnel, I noticed, at a carriage window on my side, what looked like a confusion of hands and heads, and something waved. I saw it, just in time to signal the driver, Stop! He shut off, and put his brake on, but the train drifted past here a hundred and fifty yards or more. I ran after it, and, as I went along, heard terrible screams and cries. A beautiful young lady had died instantaneously in one of the compartments, and was brought in here, and laid down on this floor between us."

I could think of nothing to say, to any purpose, and my mouth was very dry. The wind and the wires took up the story with a long lamenting wail.

He resumed. "Now, sir, mark this, and judge how my mind is troubled. The spectre came back, a week ago. Ever since, it has been there, now and again, by fits and starts."

"At the light?"

"At the Danger-light."

"What does it seem to do?",

He repeated if possible with increased passion and vehemence, that former gesticulation of "For God's sake clear the way!"

Then, he went on. "I have no peace or rest for it. It calls to me, for many minutes together, in an agonized manner, 'Below there! Look out! Look out!' It stands waving to me. It rings my little bell——"

I caught at that. "Did it ring your bell yesterday evening when I was here, and you went to the door?"

"Twice."

"Why, see," said I, "how your imagination misleads you. My eyes were on the bell, and my ears were open to the bell, and if I am a living man, it did NOT ring at those times. No, nor at any other time, except when it was rung in the natural course of physical things by the station communicating with you."

He shook his head. "I have never made a mistake as to that, yet, sir. I have never confused the spectre's ring with the man's. The ghost's ring is a strange vibration in the bell that it derives from nothing else, and I have not asserted that the bell stirs to the eye. I don't wonder that you failed to hear it. But I heard it."

"And did the spectre seem to be there, when you looked out?"

"It WAS there."

"Both times?"

He repeated firmly: "Both times."

"Will you come to the door with me, and look for it now?"

He bit his under-lip as though he were somewhat unwilling, but arose. I opened the door, and stood on the step, while he stood in the doorway. There, was the Danger-light. There, was the dismal mouth of the tunnel. There, were the high wet stone walls of the cutting. There, were the stars above them.

"Do you see it?" I asked him, taking particular note of his face. His eyes were prominent and strained; but not very much more so, perhaps, than my own had been when I had directed them earnestly towards the same spot.

"No," he answered. "It is not there."

"Agreed," said I.

We went in again, shut the door, and resumed our seats. I was thinking how best to improve this advantage, if it might be called one, when he took up the conversation in such a matter of course way, so assuming that there could be no serious question of fact between us, that I felt myself placed in the weakest of positions.

"By this time you will fully understand, sir," he said, "that what troubles me so dreadfully, is the question, What does the spectre mean?"

I was not sure, I told him, that I did fully understand.

"What is its warning against?" he said, ruminating with his eyes on the fire, and only by times turning them on me. "What is the danger? Where is the danger? There is danger overhanging, somewhere on the Line. Some dreadful calamity will happen. It is not to be doubted this third time, after what has gone before. But surely this is a cruel haunting of me. What can I do!"

He pulled out his handkerchief, and wiped the drops from his heated forehead.

"If I telegraph Danger, on either side of me, or on both, I can give no reason for it," he went on, wiping the palms of his hands. "I should get into trouble, and do no good. They would think I was mad. This is the way it would work:—Message: 'Danger! Take care!' Answer: 'What Danger? Where?' Message: 'Don't know. But for God's sake take care!' They would displace me. What else could they do?"

His pain of mind was most pitiable to see. It was the mental torture of a conscientious man, oppressed beyond endurance by an unintelligible responsibility involving life.

"When it first stood under the Danger-light," he went on, putting his dark hair back from his head, and drawing his hands outward across and across his temples in an extremity of feverish distress, "why not tell me where that accident was to happen—if it must happen? Why not tell me how it could be averted—if it could have been averted? When on its second coming it hid its face, why not tell me instead: 'She is going to die. Let them keep her at home'? If it came, on those two occasions, only to show that its warnings were true, and so to prepare me for the third, why not warn me plainly now? And I, Lord help me! A mere poor signalman on this solitary station! Why not go to somebody with credit to be believed, and power to act?"

When I saw him in this state, I saw that for the poor man's sake, as well as for the public safety, what I had to do for the time was, to compose his mind. Therefore, setting aside all questions of reality or unreality between us, I represented to him that whoever thoroughly discharged his duty, must do well, and that at least it was his comfort that he understood his duty, though he did not understand these confounding Appearances. In this effort I succeeded far better than in the attempt to reason him out of his conviction. He became calm; the occupations incidental to his post as the night advanced, began to make larger demands on his attention; and I left him at two in the morning. I had offered to stay through the night, but he would not hear of it.

That I more than once looked back at the red light as I ascended the pathway, that I did not like the red light, and that I should have slept but poorly if my bed had been under it, I see no reason to conceal. Nor, did I like the two sequences of the accident and the dead girl. I see no reason to conceal that, either.

But, what ran most in my thoughts was the consideration how ought I to act, having become the recipient of this disclosure? I had proved the man to be intelligent, vigilant, painstaking and exact; but how long might he remain so, in his state of mind? Though in a subordinate position, still he held a most important trust, and would I (for instance) like to stake my own life on the chances of his continuing to execute it with precision?

Unable to overcome a feeling that there would be something treacherous in my communicating what he had told me, to his superiors in the Company, without first being plain with himself and proposing a middle course to him, I ultimately resolved to offer to accompany him (otherwise keeping his secret for the present) to the wisest medical practitioner we could hear of in those parts, and to take his opinion. A change in his time of duty would come round next night, he had apprised me, and he would be off an hour or two after sunrise, and on again soon after sunset. I had appointed to return accordingly.

Next evening was a lovely evening, and I walked out early to enjoy it. The sun was not yet quite down when I traversed the field-path near the top of the deep cutting. I would extend my walk for an hour, I said to myself, half an hour on and half an hour back, and it would then be time to go to my signalman's box.

Before pursuing my stroll, I stepped to the brink, and mechanically looked down, from the point from which I had first seen him. I cannot describe the thrill that seized upon me, when, close at the mouth of the tunnel, I saw the appearance of a man, with his left sleeve across his eyes, passionately waving his right arm.

The nameless horror that oppressed me, passed in a moment, for in a moment I saw that this appearance of a man was a man indeed, and that there was a little group of other men standing at a short distance, to whom he seemed to be rehearsing the gesture he made. The Danger-light was not yet lighted. Against its shaft, a little low hut, entirely new to me, had been made of some wooden supports and tarpaulin. It looked no bigger than a bed.

With an irresistible sense that something was wrong—with a flashing self-reproachful fear that fatal mischief had come of my leaving the man there, and causing no one to be sent to overlook or correct what he did—I descended the notched path with all the speed I could make.

"What is the matter?" I asked the men.

"Signalman killed this morning, sir."

"Not the man belonging to that box?"

"Yes, sir."

"Not the man I know?"

"You will recognize him, sir, if you knew him," said the man who spoke for the others, solemnly uncovering his own head and raising an end of the tarpaulin, "for his face is quite composed."

"O! how did this happen, how did this happen?" I asked, turning from one to another as the hut closed in again.

"He was cut down by an engine, sir. No man in England knew his work better. But somehow he was not clear of the outer rail. It was just at broad day. He had struck the light, and had the lamp in his hand. As the engine came out of the tunnel, his back was towards her, and she cut him down. That man drove her, and was showing how it happened. Show the gentleman, Tom."

The man, who wore a rough dark dress, stepped back to his former place at the mouth of the tunnel:

"Coming round the curve in the tunnel, sir," he said, "I saw him at the end, like as if I saw him down a perspective-glass. There was no time to check speed, and I knew him to be very careful. As he didn't seem to take heed of the whistle, I shut it off when we were running down upon him, and called to him as loud as I could call."

"What did you say?"

"I said, Below there! Look out! Look out! For God's sake clear the way!"

I started.

"Ah! it was a dreadful time, sir. I never left off calling to him. I put this arm before my eyes, not to see, and I waved this arm to the last; but it was no use."

Without prolonging the narrative to dwell on any one of its curious circumstances more than on any other, I may, in closing it, point out the coincidence that the warning of the Engine-Driver included, not only the words which the unfortunate Signalman had repeated to me as haunting him, but also the words which I myself—not he—had attached, and that only in my own mind, the gesticulation he had imitated.

ORATORY MADE EASY.

AN ESSAY, BY JINGO & CO.

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary to deliver a stump-speech, most text books will inform you that the first requisite is to have something to say. This is undoubtedly a grand mistake. All the stirring stump-speeches of the day are made by men who have nothing upon their minds—who, being called upon, quite unexpectedly, are consequently utterly unprepared,—always come to listen.

Much depends upon a proper commencement. There are two kinds of commencement—the independent or first speaker's commencement and the dependent, or subsequent speaker's commencement. A very good form of commencement in either case is as follows: "I rise before you." This is a more comprehensive sentence than it would at first appear. I, signifies the speaker. Rise, indicates that he has considerable get up to him, etc. You must avoid too violent gestures in your speaking. We heard of a minister who "danged 'the innards' out of sixteen bibles in three months." The principal objection to this style is that it is rather hard on the American Bible Society, otherwise it has a tendency to keep the audience awake. Should you run short of ideas, you can repeat what you have said, simply by prefixing the remark "as I said before." Or you can repeat the same idea in different words. Or can say, "Taking this view of the subject," "but to continue," etc. Should you still be short of ideas, you can deliberately take a drink of water. This, if properly managed, can be made to fill a full minute. Many of our most brilliant ideas have been suggested simply by blowing the nose. A good preparation for stump-speaking is successful pleading at the bar.

The mention of the words, Irishman, nigger, dog, etc., in connection with short anecdotes invariably has a happy effect, the countenance of the intelligent public expands—once get their mouths open you can insert anything you choose. If your voice should be harsh use Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup, which can be obtained in limited quantity at the Drug Store of W. S. Godbe, any day between the hours of eight a.m. and twelve p.m. If indistinct, use Walker's Vinegar Bitters. We never knew any one to die as long as he could worry down Vinegar Bitters.

Although we have here condensed matter, sufficient to fill a folio volume, yet the subject seems inexhaustible. There are five different styles of speaking, each of which admits of ten or twelve subdivisions: viz, the Impulsive, Expulsive, Compulsive, Discursive, and Explosive styles. For instance, the style of the minister who "danged the innards out of sixteen Bibles in three months" may be termed a mild form of the explosive, which may be considered the acme of oratorical eminence. Poetry sometimes has a very good effect if properly introduced.

Before concluding, we would say that the following latin phrases should never be omitted in a well constructed stump-speech: viz: "Magna est viritas et prevalibet." "Kats narrawap," "Simmilia similibus curanter," "ubet your life," etc.

Gems from the Poets.

THE NEEDED PRESENCE.

And peasant girls with deep blue eyes,
  And hands which offer early flowers,
Walk smiling o'er this paradise;
  Above the frequent feudal towers,
Though green leaves lift their walls of gray,
  And many a rock which steeply lours,
And noble arch in proud decay,
  Look o'er the vale of vintage bowers;
But one thing wants these banks of Rhine,—
  Thy gentle hand to clasp in mine!

BETTER.

Better a little labor
  Than overrest;
Better a pleasant neighbor
  Than tedious guest;
Better the funeral shroud
  With hope behind it,
Than light within the cloud
  That silver-lined it.

Better a sea of light
  When morn has crowned it,
Than all the stars of night;—
  Its spells around it:
Better a life sublime
  Unshrined in story,
Than one gew-gawed by Time
  And bruit with glory.

PLAIN TALKS ON THE SCIENCES.

FOR PLAIN PEOPLE.

No. 1.

Under this heading we shall endeavor to give a plain view of some of the sciences. We shall give no minutiæ, or details of laws or rules, but just such general facts as a non-studious man can keep in his mind; and such as every man and woman should be acquainted with to enable them to converse intelligently in society. Our first talk will be on Astronomy.

In the good old times it was naturally enough supposed by mankind, that they lived on a flat earth; for who could have supposed that there were men on the underneath side of the globe, sticking to the surface with their heads in the air and their legs pointing towards their own? Or who could have been expected to have believed that every night their own heads were pointing to an opposite portion of the heavens to that which, in the day time, was immediately above them?

The fact, however, that men could commence sailing in what was nearly a straight line, and instead of finding the edge of the earth and tumbling over, keep sailing straight on, and yet come back to the place from whence they started, without their ever having had to turn around to get there, soon convinced our ancestors that if the earth was not round, it was so much like it that they could not tell the difference.

Perhaps one of the very simplest and most self-evident proofs of the roundness of the earth, and one which everybody can get at, consists in the fact that whenever an eclipse of the moon takes place, which is caused by the earth getting between the sun and the moon, the shadow of the earth is thrown right upon the moon's face. There it is to be seen by everybody, a clear round shadow. Now, as square objects have never been known to throw round shadows,—not even in the memory of the "oldest inhabitant," we need search but little further for proof that we live on an enormous round ball, walking all over it like flies on the surface of a ceiling.

Another thing very hard for our ancestors to imagine, was, that, whereas the sun and the stars were seen visibly to rise above our horizon and go right over it, descending on the opposite side, that, in fact, they really did no such thing, but that it was themselves that did the rolling, while the sun and stars stood still. Just as the youth who, for the first time, starts on a railway car, or a steamboat, finds it hard to imagine that the trees and the houses are not all in motion and flying past him; while in reality they are stationary and he is speeding along.

A very simple argument, but one which is not original here, will show anyone what a grand piece of absurdity the rolling of the mighty universe of worlds around this earth to warm and illuminate it would be, when the same object could be gained by letting them rest and turning around the surface of this little fraction of a globe instead. It would be about as sensible as for a man who wanted to roast a chicken, who should at an enormous expense contrive a kitchen and fire-place which should revolve around the chicken in order to cook it, instead of keeping kitchen and fire-place in their places and turning around the chicken itself.

As soon as mankind began to discover a few little facts like these respecting the earth they lived on, their thoughts naturally turned to the great universe of which they had every reason to believe our earth was but a shining point.

No sooner did they discover that this earth was but a satellite of the great sun, than they discovered that we were only one of a number of similar globes, which, like a family of sons and daughters, revolved around the sun as a central grandpapa. Some of these globes, they discovered, circled around the old gentleman, closer home and nearer to him than ourselves, while others performed their journeys around his presence, away out in space and much further off.

Such of these globes as belong to our family, or to our solar system, as it is called, can be distinguished from others in the heavens by the fact that they burn with a dead flat light, while the stars, which are supposed to be all grandfathers of systems in their own right—each with their own retinue of worlds to do them homage, shine with a brilliant twinkling and more lustrous light, as such venerable head centers very properly should.

In process of time, from these ideas, men's minds went out to the thought, that if this world and a number of others revolved around the sun, in all probability the sun itself with the whole of his family revolved around a still larger center, while that in turn with its suns and worlds revolved around a greater centre still, and so on, worlds without end.

And thus, in this way, if in no other, men's minds began to open to the glory, beauty and order of the vast universe of which we form a part.

"MORMONISM" AND THE QUESTION OF MAN'S DIVINITY.

As the faith of the people of Utah is considered by many to be an unintellectual scheme, appealing only to the sensual and material instincts of mankind, we have concluded to present occasionally a few thoughts showing wherein it not only finds its corroborations in science, but appeals to the noblest instincts of our nature.

It will yet be found that the greatest evidence that can be given of the divinity of any principle, is that it finds its response in the highest instincts of the human breast. There is greater evidence to the truly cultivated mind in corroboration of this kind, than in all the Bibles that were ever written or all the miracles that were ever wrought.

There is an inward testimony written within us by a divine hand, of what we are and of what we are destined to be, to which all outward creeds must conform, or they are false. Take, for instance, this very question concerning our origin and destiny. What kind of a creed do we need on this subject, to be in harmony with the inward testimony of our own beings; what kind of a faith to be as grand as our own souls?

On this subject we assert that, to truly feed such a great and unbounded nature as man's, a religion is required whose views of the origin and destiny of his spirit shall be as exalted and unbounded as the immensity of his desires. Man needs a religion capable of explaining the affinity of his soul with the majestic and the eternal,—one that can also explain why a type of the attributes of Deity is found within him, and tell how it is that such restless and insatiable ambitions are implanted within his nature.

Now, "Mormonism" meets this demand in the great principle which first and foremost it has taught to the world of the divine origin and eternal character of the powers of man.

From the teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith we learn the great and glorious fact that all men and women, without exception, are sons and daughters begotten unto the living God, from whom these high attributes have been derived: hence their wide and insatiable character.

Thus we learn the simplifying fact that all the creative, acquisitive, and governing powers with which we operate continually on a small scale, are but counterparts of powers which the Creator, in the vast range of his almighty movements, calls into action above, and that they are germs and buddings of his Divinity seeking to unfold itself: hence the wonderful variety and scope of such powers. Thus we learn that every true affection of the heart, every natural ambition every yearning or striving of the spirit is an impulse of that lofty nature we have received from Him, and that all are eternal and inseparable attributes of our endless being, capable of being, and intended to be, infinitely and boundlessly expanded and developed, under the guidance of the Almighty, until the Great Father is glorified and reproduced in the perfections of the hearts, minds, and persons of His children; and, consequently, the reason why, wherever human foot has trod, these impulses and ambitions are found expanding their force within the human breast.

Here, then, are principles that present us with views concerning man's origin and destiny in harmony with the utmost soarings or strides of his being after knowledge or power—principles worthy of that which he feels and knows himself to be; here, the key to the mystery of man's endowment with the varied powers that make him so great a type of Deity.

Looking around upon this world—looking back upon man's history, scriptural or "profane," how simplified and intelligible, in this light, does all appear!

Because man has had infused into him the germ of His qualities who is above all, therefore he is independent in his character. He laughs at prison walls, and dares the martyr's flame to rob him of his will, and, therefore, he soars ever after the beautiful, the holy and the true.

Because man is divine in his origin, and has come forth from the Author of creative power, and is necessarily imbued with a love for the mighty and the supreme, his soul is stirred by any of the great manifestations of his Father's hand in the natural world.

Gloriously does the doctrine of the divine origin of man lift the barriers of darkness from around about our path and destiny, while together to its proof comes rushing from manifold points a scattered mass of testimony. It is seen in the sublime conceptions, the huge efforts, and the glories of six thousand years. It is heard also in the responses of the human soul, and found corroborated in the divine teachings of remote and separate ages.

Yes, the divine origin of man is written in every breast—is seen in the untiring qualities of the mind, ever crying, "On, on to new conquests, new honors, new discoveries, and new means for gratification." It was heard in the declaration by man of his own immortality ere the voice of Jesus was heard upon the earth, and it was corroborated, carried on, and glorified in his principles and promises when he appeared.

This principle, then, is our natural food. It alone of all creeds concerning our origin, is in full harmony with the vastness and sweep of our powers and aspirations: hence it alone is worthy of us. So natural, so sweet, so good, so true does it come to us, that we feel it belongs to us as light belongs to our eyes, and was meant for us as much as the juice of the grape for our lips.

In other words, this grand principle meets our proposition; it is calculated to satisfy, develop, brighten, and make glorious the powers of man's spirit, and thus produces proof that it was, and is, a heaven-born truth, sent for man by the same God, who made the earth for our feet, and light for our grateful eyes.

Correspondence, Etc.

Thomas Bradshaw, Wellsville.—We have received some patriotic verses from our old friend, the most of which will, perhaps, better suit a future occasion. The following verse is a very correct picture of the future of our Zion:—

"The blending of hearts and affections in one,
Our interest in common, our selfishness gone;
Each trying in good his brother to vie;—
Can anything equal it under the sky?
'Tis God in each movement, each thought and each plan;
'Tis Deity shining refulgent in man.

Anon.—There are several good points in your little piece, but the lines are very unequal, and some of the expressions unpoetical. It would be much improved with a little care.

William Tell and the Arrow.—In reference to the story of William Tell and Swiss liberty, we copy the following fragment from a note by our friend, Jabez Woodard, whose Swiss antecedents are pretty well known.

"William Tell is said to have shot the first arrow for Swiss liberty. It is, however, more certain that Gertrude, the wife of a farmer, gave the first impulse to union against the Austrian oppressor. When her husband and others shrunk from the dangers of the enterprise and the power of the foe. She forgot the timidity of her sex, and exclaimed—'Be men and trust in heaven.' And it is remarkable that as long as the Swiss knelt in their ranks and prayed before the battle, they were uniformly victorious."

The story of the apple and the arrow, has, of late, been consigned to rest with a number of other delightful fables. It is like the story of the words—'Up, guards, and at them,' and the field of Waterloo, for so many years so popularly ascribed to the Duke of Wellington, but which the old duke denied ever having used in his life. After any remarkable event is over, there are always imaginative minds which delight to clothe it with an air of romance and heroism. We should not be surprised, if, at the great day, when shall be revealed to mankind the true history of their race, all histories—even to that of Jesus himself—be found to be touched up a little for purposes of effect by over-zealous friends. It will probably not be a hundred years before scenes which never occurred in this world, will be ascribed to leading men who have been and are figuring among ourselves. It s human nature.

Received.—Four pieces: "Why," and "Welcome to Summer," by Jno. Burrows: "Sweet Home," by A. Dalrymple. Music, "Wait, my Darling, Wait," by Professor Thomas. Correspondence, Geo. Halliday. Etc.

TRIUMPHANT DEATH OF MOHAMMED.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

The career of Mohammed was thenceforth one of conquest. The pagan tribes, who would not peacefully be converted from their idolatry, he subdued with the sword, and they in their turn became valiant in the "cause of the Lord," proving that the military gospel was the one most adapted to the character of the children of Ishmael, and even consonant with the patriarchal blessing and covenant pertaining to Abraham's firstborn.

In the seventh year of the Hegira, Mohammed assumed the state of a sovereign, and sent embassies to the monarchs around. The emperor of Persia treated the embassy sent to him with supreme contempt, for which the Prophet launched against him the divine wrath, predicting the overthrow of the haughty Persian empire by the conquering arms of the faithful. In the next year, Mohammed appeared suddenly at the gates of Mecca with 10,000 men, before the troops of that city had even been apprised of his departure from Medina. They had no choice left but immediate surrender or destruction; and thus at length was humbled the powerful race from whence the Prophet himself had sprung, and the city of his nativity, which had rejected his message and cast him out. The capture of Mecca, and the submission of the great tribe of the Koreish, was rapidly followed by the conversion to Islamism of most of the remote tribes, until he became master of all Arabia. Having brought all the tribes into one powerful union, and given birth to an Arabian empire, he made gigantic preparations for the conquest of Syria and Persia; but his vast purposes were destined to be fulfilled by his successors, for his own life was now drawing to a close.

In the tenth year of the Hegira, Mohammed set forth on a solemn pilgrimage to Mecca, as the last act of his life and ministry upon earth. He was accompanied by all his wives, and 90,000 pilgrims. With his own hands he sacrificed sixty-three victims, and liberated sixty-three slaves, in thanksgiving for each year of his life. He also shaved his head and scattered the hair among the multitude, which they piously gathered up, to the smallest hair, and treasured as holy relics. He closed the solemnity with his last revelation, pronounced by the "Spirit of the Lord" through the medium of his prophet. Henceforth, "wretched and miserable shall they be who deny your religion. Fear not them, but fear me; this day I have perfected your religion, and completed my grace toward you. I have willed that Islamism be your religion." Finally, as supreme pontiff or Imam, Mohammed dismissed the people with a farewell, the last, as he declared, that he should give them; whence this pilgrimage is called "The Farewell."

Mohammed returned to Medina, and died, in the eleventh year of the Hegira, and in the sixty-third year of his age, having accomplished during his lifetime, in the work of religious empire-founding, more than any before him; and in less than ten years after his death, under Omar, his second successor, was completed the conquest of Egypt, Syria, and Persia, the vast Mohammedan empire established, and Islamism dominant over nearly all the Eastern Hemisphere.

It has been the habit of Christian writers to stigmatize Mohammed as "the great false prophet" and as an anti-Christ; but in this age of liberal views, even sound believers in the divine mission of the Christ, from chosen Isaac's seed, can afford to do justice to the great prophet who sprang from the loins of his brother Ishmael. Heterodox philosophers, on their side, will class the whole race of prophets and apostles together, and view them simply as marvelous psychological and sociological problems. They will treat the genuine of this peculiar order as rare types of beings whose visionary and inspirative natures saw empires in their own fervid minds. Out of such as these new civilizations and empires have grown; and it has ever been found in the course of nations that when the old empires have been rapidly passing through their states of decay, and the world needed a new impulse, then human giants have risen with their peculiar dispensations.

What shall we say of this wonderful man and his mission? This: if there be a God, then must that God, of necessity, be in all the world's great issues. Surely, then, into the hands of Mohammed, Providence committed one of the greatest of those issues.

In Mohammed and his mission, there is a genuine assumption of the Abrahamic covenant claimed by a descendant of the eldest son of the "Father of the Faithful;" and unless we give due weight to this fact and its workings in the mind of this great representative of the line of Abraham's firstborn, we shall make discordant that which is in itself grandly harmonious. "In thee, and in thy seed, shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed," was the covenant made to the "Father of the Faithful;" and Mohammed claimed his portion thereof. Yet did the Arabian prophet magnanimously give unto the seed of Isaac the principal succession in the sacred prophetic line, affirming that, though it was latent in the race of Ishmael, the gift of prophecy, with the holy apostleship, was not vouchsafed to any of his seed until he (Mohammed), the last of the Prophets, came, while from Isaac had sprung a long succession of prophets to carry on the Abrahamic dispensations.

Mr. Carlyle's philosophy of the life of the man utterly rejects the popular notions of Mohammed. He believes that "the rude message he delivered was a real one withal—an earnest, confused voice from the unknown deep. The man's words were not false, nor his workings here below; no inanity and simulacrum; a fiery mass of life cast up from the great bosom of nature herself." He discerns in him a rugged, deep-hearted son of the wilderness—"one of those who can not but be in earnest—whom nature herself has appointed to be sincere." "From of old a thousand thoughts, in his pilgrimings and wanderings, had been in this man: What am I? What is this unfathomable thing I live in, which men name universe? What is life—what is death? What am I to believe? What am I to do? The grim rocks of Mount Hara, of Mount Sinai, the stern, sandy solitudes answered not. The great heaven, rolling silent overhead, with its blue, glancing stars, answered not. There was no answer. The man's soul, and what of God's inspiration dwelt there, had to answer." At length, Carlyle thinks, the answer came in his own grand conception, that "there is one God in and over all."

With this annunciation, made by his own soul, he became possessed with the spirit of a mission to establish in Arabia the truth that there is but one God. That there was a deity in Mohammed's life working out one of the world-issues seems to be Mr. Carlyle's opinion. "Are we to suppose," he asks, "that it was a miserable piece of spiritual legerdemain, this, which so many creatures of the Almighty have lived by and died? I, for my part, can not form any such supposition. I will believe most things sooner than that. One would be entirely at a loss what to think of this great world at all, if quackery so grew and were sanctioned here." Accordingly, he holds that Mohammed's dispensation was legitimate and successful, advancing the nations which received it from their state of idolatry to a higher stage of civilization, and to the faith of One God.

We will close our article with a description of the Prophet, from Washington Irving:

"Mohammed, according to accounts handed down by tradition from his cotemporaries, was of middle stature, square built, and sinewy, with large hands and feet. In his youth, he was uncommonly strong and vigorous: in the latter part of his life he inclined to corpulency. His head was capacious, well shaped, and well set on a neck which rose like a pillar from his ample chest. His forehead was high, broad at the temples, and crossed by veins extending down to the eyebrows, which swelled whenever he was angry or excited. He had an oval face, marked and expressive features, an aquiline nose, black eyes, arched eyebrows which nearly met, a mouth large and flexible, indicating eloquence; very white teeth, somewhat parted and irregular; black hair, which waved without a curl on his shoulders, and a long and very full beard.

"His deportment in general was calm and equable; he sometimes indulged in pleasantry, but more commonly was grave and dignified, though he is said to have possessed a smile of captivating sweetness. His complexion was more ruddy than is usual with Arabs, and in his excited and enthusiastic moments there was a glow and radiance in his countenance which his disciples magnified into the supernatural light of prophecy.

"His intellectual qualities were undoubtedly of an extraordinary kind. He had a quick apprehension, a retentive memory, a vivid imagination, and an inventive genius. Owing but little to education, he had quickened and informed his mind by close observation, and stored it with a great variety of knowledge concerning the systems of religion current in his day or handed down by tradition from antiquity. His ordinary discourse was grave and sententious, abounding with those aphorisms and apologues so popular among the Arabs; at times he was excited and eloquent, and his eloquence was aided by a voice musical and sonorous. He was sober and abstemious in his diet, and a rigorous observer of fasts. He indulged in no magnificence of apparel—the ostentation of a petty mind; neither was his simplicity affected, but the result of a real disregard to distinction from so trivial a source. His garments were sometimes of wool, sometimes of the striped cotton of Yemen, and were often patched. He wore a turban, for he said turbans were worn by the angels, and in arranging it he let one end hang down his shoulders, which he said was the way they wore it. * * He wore a seal ring of silver, the engraved part under his finger close to the palm of his hand, bearing the inscription, 'Mohammed the messenger of God.' He was scrupulous as to personal cleanliness, and observed frequent ablutions. * * 'There are two things in this world,' he would say, 'which delight me, women and perfumes. These two things delight my eyes and render me more fervent in devotion.' It is said that when in the presence of a beautiful female, he was continually smoothing his brow and adjusting his hair as if anxious to appear to advantage. In his private dealings he was just. He treated friends and strangers, the rich and the poor, the powerful and the weak with equity, and was beloved by the common people."

A DISCOURSE ON PEOPLE'S NAMES.

Surnames were first introduced into England by the Normans, and were adopted by the English nobility soon after the Conquest. Centuries passed, however, before the use of them became general. The surnames of the gentry can hardly be traced further back than the middle of the twelfth century, about which time, according to Camden, it began to be thought essential that persons of rank should bear some designation in addition to their baptismal names. Among the homelier classes this necessity was felt much later, and the process was much slower, and with them hereditary surnames were not permanently adopted before the era of the Reformation; indeed, in the more retired parts of the country, and notably among the wealthy families of Yorkshire, hereditary names were unknown as late as the seventeenth century.

The first form of the supra nomen, or added name, seems to have been surnames for son—among the Normans; Fitz, as Fit Herbert, the son of Herbert; among the Scotch, Mac, as Macdonald, the son of Donald. The Irish chose the grandson, for which the Irish equivalent is O, as O'Neal, Neal's grandson, O'Brien, Brien's grandson. It was quite natural, as it was inevitable, that the example set by the lordly Normans, and their congeners Irish and Scotch, should find imitators. The Welsh followed suit (unless, indeed, as they pretend, they originated the practice), and carried out the principle still further, bearing in their surnames something like a complete table of descent—as, for instance, in the name Griffith-ap-Evan—ap-Morgan—ap-Fluellen—ap-Shenkin—ap-Shone—(ap, signifying son,) Griffith, son of Evan, son of Morgan, son of Fluellen, son of Jenkins, son of Jones. The Russians follow a like practice at the present day—as Petro Ivanovitz, Peter, son of John. Modern English names ending in son, generally denote a middle or plebeian class; and such seems too have been the opinion of Beau Brummel, who having accepted an invitation to dine with a Mr. Jackson, while apologising to the hostess for coming late, called her Mrs. Thomson. When informed of his mistake, he coolly replied, "Oh, it's all the same, you know—Jackson, Johnson, Thomson, Dickson, and that sort of thing!"

At the introduction of Christianity among the northerns, the Christian names were sometimes conferred in a rather summary manner. Persons of note—leaders, captains, chiefs, and men or woman of local celebrity or consideration, had each his own name given to him at baptism; but, on the other hand, the rank-and-file soldiers and the common people were often baptised in squads or battalions, all the subjects of one baptismal ceremony taking the same name. Thus there would be, among the converts of a single day, one squad of Peters, another of Thomases, a third of Johns, and so on. This must have led to no small confusion, as the new converts would naturally pride themselves on their new names, and it must have tended to the more general adoption of surnames for the sake of distinction. Although the rich often derived their surnames from the property or estates they possessed—as Clifford, Pevensey, Hastings—or from some chivalric or heraldic insignia, or some renowned exploit—it is plain the mass of the people could not do so. A vast number of the first surnames common in Britain were, it is evident, taken from the trades or callings of those who bore them—a fact which explains the prevalence of such names at the present time as Smith, Baker, Carpenter, Carter, etc. At a later period, when surnames were becoming hereditary, these designations no longer described the callings of their owners. Other surnames were derived from some personal peculiarity, as Gaunt, Barebones, Longshanks, Crookshanks; and others again from some personal quality, as Swift, Strong, Bold, etc.; while not a few, it would appear originated in character and habits, as Craven, Coward, Stalker, Slasher, Blower.

But whatever may have been the origin of the numerous surnames to which a special significance can be attached, it is pretty clear that such quasi distinctive appellations were all too few as the population went on increasing, and the fashion for hereditary names extended, and when in course of time, others of an arbitrary character had to be adopted, to which no sort of significance could be attached, but which yet served perfectly well every purpose for which distinctive names are required. Very many English names at the present day are of this latter class, having no imaginable reference to any property or peculiarity of the persons to whom, for generations past, they have appertained. Many of them are the names of colors, as Black, Brown, Green, etc.; many are the names of plants, many more of animals, others of minerals, and others again are adjectives expressive of some quality by no means applicable to the owners of them, or even to human beings at all. There are a crowd of common names, moreover, which suggest no idea to the mind, apart from the idea of Mr. Cox, or Mr. Sims, or Mr. Sykes, or Mr. Anybody, whose special property they are. It is possible, however, to make a grand mistake in considering this subject too hastily, seeing that there are a good number of names common enough, and at first blush having no apparent significance, which are yet mere corruptions of old names full of meaning: such are Sandys, from Alexander; Clowes, from Clovis; Snooks, from Sevenoaks, and a multitude of others whose derivation is more or less obvious. The corruption of names, from whatever causes, seems destined to go on, and many causes may be cited as tending in this direction—not the least being the preference for brevity and a sarcastic kind of raciness which is a characteristic of the lower and industrial classes. Names which retain their integrity so long as those who bear them are well to do in the world, are very apt to become clipped, transformed, and even travestied, when their owners have got down in the world. We may quote some examples of names thus transformed; for instance, the honorable name of Bethune, has degenerated to Beeton; De Vere; has become Weir; De Ballassize, has passed into Belshes; D'Aeth, is changed to Death; De Comyn, to Cumming. Old Welsh names have to do duty as modern English ones; thus Price comes from Ap-Rice, Prichard from Ap-Richard, Pugh from Ap-Hugh, Bowen from Ap-Owen.

In the selection of Christian names there has been quite a revolution within the memory of middle-aged persons. A generation back the habit of English parents was to call their children by the names they bore themselves, or which were born by relatives or sponsors, which were generally simple names familiar to every one, and mostly taken from the Old or New Testament worthies. At the present time that practice seems to be rather the exception, the rising generation bearing a new class of patronymics consisting of the surnames of celebrated persons who have shone as authors, statesmen, philanthropists, patriots, or who in some other respects have been men of mark. We have not yet got to the length of bestowing half-a-dozen or more Christian names on a child, as is the fashion in Spain and other southern countries; nor do we much delight in classical additions to vulgar surnames. We should not think the homeliness of Blogg compensated by a conjunction with Mithridates, or that Grubb would be rendered illustrious if coupled with Sardanapalus; nor are we as yet charmed with the euphony of Hannibal Chollop or Apollonius Rhodius Weggs.

Everybody familiar with the interior of working establishments must have noticed the almost universal practice in such places of using sobriquets or nicknames. In such resorts long names get wonderfully abbreviated; names hard to pronounce have others substituted for them; and any workman with any personal peculiarity will be dubbed with a new name derived from it. The strangest liberties in nomenclature are sometimes taken through ignorance. The books of a bankrupt beerhouse-keeper having to pass under examination, presented a series of entries utterly bewildering to the accountant. Not only were the names of the debtors variously transformed, but not a few of them were inventions —a kind of shorthand intelligible only to the writer. Accounts had to be made out against Stumpy, Dot-and-go, Jaws, Nosey, Dirty Mug, One-eyed Man, and a number of others characteristically designated, but whose real names were evidently unknown to the creditor.

In some places where the population is limited the hereditary surnames will be very few, owing to the fact that a few families have gone on multiplying from generation to generation, and have admitted no strangers to their community—a state of things, however, which was more common a century back than it is now or is ever likely to be again. In Wales, for instance, small towns and villages were found in which, among a population of hundreds, the only families would be the Morgans, Williamses, and Evanses; while others boasted only of the names of Griffiths, Rice, and Jenkins. The same thing is recorded of Scotland at an earlier period, when, it is said, two or three names sufficed for a whole township of fisher-folk. A writer in "Blackwood" gives the following anecdote. In one of the Buchan fishing villages a stranger had occasion to call on a fisherman of the name of Alexander White. Meeting a girl, he asked, "Could you tell me f'ar Sanny Fite lives?"

"Filk Sanny Fite?"

"Muckle Sanny Fite."

"Filk Muckle Sanny Fite?"

"Muckle Lang Sanny Fite."

"Filk Muckle Lang Sanny Fite?"

"Muckle lang-gleyed Sanny Fite," shouted the stranger.

"Oh! it's Goup the lift ye're seekin'," cried the girl, "and fat for no dinna ye speer for the man by his richet name at ance?"

But even at the present day, though surnames are various and abundant, it does not follow that they will be in use among the owners of them. The fact seems to be that in some places they are so little used as to be at times forgotten by those to whom they belong. It is said that in Staffordshire, in our own times, clergymen have been known to send home a wedding party in despair after a vain attempt to get from bride or bridegroom a sound by way of a name. In the English Colliery districts every man has a nickname by which he is known, and to which he readily responds, while it may be that no one knows his real name. A story is related of a lawyer's clerk who had to serve process on a collier, and whose real name was duly entered in the document. After a good deal of inquiry, being unable to find the man, the clerk was about to abandon the search, when a young lass, compassionating his anxiety, offered to assist him. "Oy say, Bullyed," she called to the first person they met, "does thee know a mon neamed Adam Green?" The bullhead was shaken in token of ignorance. They then came to another man. "Loo-a-bed, does thee?" Lie-a-bed could not answer either. Stumpy (a man with a wooden leg), Cowskin, Spindleshanks, Cockeye, and Pigtail were successively consulted, but to no purpose. At length, however, having had conversation with several friends, the damsel's eyes suddenly brightened, and slapping one of her neighbors on the shoulder, she exclaimed, "Hoot! whoy he means moy feyther!" Then turning to the astonished clerk, she cried, "You shouldn axed for Ode Blackbird!"

The question has been often mooted, has a man the right to abandon his family and hereditary name, and take another? though that question, it is plain, does not much trouble the laboring classes. There may be sufficient reason why a man should wish to change his name—not the least of which is the fact that some names still in use have a repulsive or offensive significance—so that words are constantly pronounced as surnames which otherwise would never be suffered to pass the lips. The law does not often give its sanction to a change of name unless the applicant can show that such change is necessary to his inheriting property, or can prove that he is descended from a family of the name he wishes to assume. On the other hand, any man may change his name, if he likes, without troubling the law at all; the law having no power to prevent it, still, if a man who has changed his name has to take action in a suit at law he might perhaps find it necessary to resume his discarded designation.

Music.

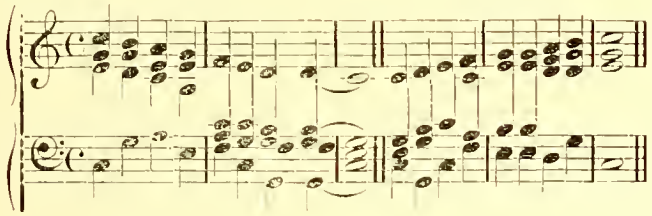
ANCIENT AND MODERN HARMONIES.

In composing music suitable to the requirements of the people we must consider their knowledge in the art, and their wants, rather than attend to our own peculiar views, or self-conceit. Should the people be learned in the profound depths of musical science, let them have classical music, if we are competent to produce such compositions as the grand and sublime Oratorio, or other great works of a similar character. But if they are not skilled in the intricacies of the science, let them have what they can understand and appreciate, and by a consistent progression we shall eventually lead them to the point we so much desire.

We will repeat what we have before observed, that the best music suited to our present wants is the quartetto, glee, trio, duetto, and ballad for our practiced vocalists for concerts. The pieces for the piano, organ and orchestra, can be of a more classical character. For the choristers, anthems and four-part songs, for entertainments, and for public worship, psalmody and anthems also. But by-and-by with patience and perseverance our principal singers and choral body, will be enabled by study, to luxuriate in the charms of the Oratorio and the Opera. For the present we want to encourage our home composers to the study of musical science; and the simple forms and simple harmonies are the best to start with. With this view we intend to assist them all we can to study compositions scientifically, that they may be enabled to throw away ear harmonizations and arrangeaccording to rule.

In composing anthems, or psalmody—it the words are grand and sublime—the most appropriate harmonies would be the ancient forms. We will give a notation example of the scale of descending and ascending with combinations of this character. In the two following examples the student will find no other harmonies in the ascending or descending scale but the major and minor triads, excepting on the close of example one, where the dominant seventh is used at the end.

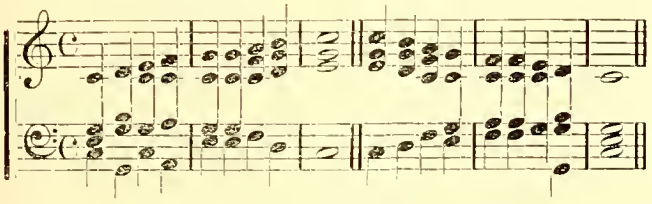
EXAMPLE 1. EXAMPLE 2.



These harmonies are well adapted for sublime psalmody, and for solid anthems more especially when we select ancient poetry; the psalms of David, for instance. We often meet with such combinations in the writings of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. These are dates when some of the best anthems and psalms were composed.

However, the above combinations are somewhat too strict and formal for light music; moreover it would not agree with the popular method adopted by modern authors to employ the fundamental note in the bass in every chord of the scale; but, for the style of music we have named, much effect is produced by admitting such harmonies. In music of a light character the repetition of triads would be much relieved by the inversions of those harmonies, especially in accompanying the fourth and fifth degrees ascending; and in the descending scale, the third, fifth and seventh may be harmorized with inverted chords also.

4th. 5th. 6th. 7th. 7th. 6th. 5th. 3d.



The student will here observe that the fourth is used at the endings of the first example without preparation, which is allowed, but in starting the second, it is prepared by entering as the fifth in the first harmony of that example.

There are many other methods of employing the triads, and their inversions besides those named in the above examples—and effectually too—without appealing to so many compound harmonies now in use by modern composers; notwithstanding, some of the music of the present day would not be so effective without their introduction; but the styles we have endeavored to explain do not require that strain for startling effect, therefore it is unwise to admit such harmonies into simply constructed compositions. We have been led to this opinion by the study of similar music created by the brains, and written by the pens of great authors.

We have said enough on harmonies for the student's first lesson, but on some future occasion we will again take up the subject and go farther into the science. We must, however—before closing the third and last article of this series—point out one or two rules to guide the student from errors so prevalent to young composers when progressing with what is termed common chords or harmonious triads.

Scientific authors have strictly forbidden the use of consecutive perfect fifths and octaves in similar motion, and without doubt the rule has originated from the laws of euphony. The most uncultivated ear can discover there is something wrong, although the ear cannot define the cause.

Dramatic.—Those who have read Dickens' inimitable portraiture of sweet little Nell, the elfish Quilp and romantic and effulgent Dick Swiveler, had a treat in the portraiture of the unapproachable Lotta, and her valuable aids, Messrs. Chaplin and Saville, on Monday evening last. Of Lotta it may be truly said that the words versatility of talent convey no adequate idea to the mind of the almost incomprehensible skill with which she alternately renders the childish grace of Little Nell, side by side with the uncouth gestures and antics of the half-starved little "marchioness." So extreme is this transition that, we believe, few in the theater realized, for a time, that these strangely contrastive characters were being rendered by one and the same actress.

Of Mr. Chaplin's Quilp, it is but justice to say that so graphic was the impersonation that nothing but its fidelity to the revolting conception of the author and dramatist, prevented its being received with tumultuous applause. Mr. Saville's Swiveler was the spontaneous, airy and imaginative Dick, we have known ever since, in our childhood, we first took little Nell and her associates to our heart.

Mrs. De Bar—no mean actress in her line,—as well as the rest of the company, rendered effective aid.

SWITZERLAND.

Tune:—"Think not when you gather to Zion."

O land of the lake and the mountain,
Thou land of the Rhine and the Rhone!
And many a clear gushing fountain,
That springs from the Alps of thy throne!
There's nought 'mid the earth like thy story,
Where children of freedom have fought!
Thou canst boast of thine ages of glory,
The work that thy chieftains have wrought.

The blood of thy bravest is flowing,
'Mid forms of the manly around,
Where vineyards and gardens are growing
Or hills, with the Ice-lake are crown'd.
And noble are Liberty's daughters,
Though rocked 'mid the pines by the storm;
While pure as the springs of thy waters,
Their bosoms with friendship are warm.

They whisper of trusting in heaven;
Their swords they would gird on again,
Like times when the war-cry had riven
The links of the Austrian chain.
O Race of the Mighty be fearless,
When Zion's blest trumpet shall call;
Though homes of the despots be cheerless,
Thy covenant children ne'er fall.

Who shielded thee oft in the ages,
When darkness hung over the world,
Will blazon thy name on its pages
When truth has its banner unfurled;—
Who made thee a beacon to nations,
Will make thee so thousand times more,
A gem of His wondrous creations,
Till sorrow and sighing are o'er.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

FAMILY LINKS.

Terese pillowed her head for the space of a few minutes on her Uncle Judah's breast and wept. He was the first of her family that she had ever met, for, as our readers have learned, her mother Rachel died in giving her birth, and her father Benjamin preceded her to the grave. The orphan daughter of Israel had often felt the yearning of nature for that mother whom she had never known—often wept over the cruel torture of her youthful father, whose history she dwelt upon as that of a martyr of her race. She had gathered the history of her parents from her foster-mother, and it was cherished as a sacred subject. It was so much in keeping with the painful record of her tribe, in their dispersion among the gentiles, that she viewed it in the light of an episode thereof. The curse of the house of Judah, her parents had borne;—the calamities of her people touched her own heart. Yet she looked upon the experience of her race as an inheritance in which her father's family had but shared with the rest of his brethren. It was heaven's justice, to be reverently received as a mixture in the cup with its abundant mercy. She kissed the rod of Israel's God, who had only beaten his children to bring them unto Christ: for thus she had been taught by the good Catholic priest who had educated her. Before Walter Templar came, as the ruler of her life and thoughts, this had been the subject upon which she had dwelt; since her love for him grew up in her heart, a new phase had come over her life. Woman's fate—for love is the woman's fate—and the artist's career superseded the old themes; but now as she hung around her uncle's neck, nestled to the heart of the first of her family, whom she had ever met, the old subject of her race, and her parents' history, came back in that brief five minutes in lightning thoughts—a volume of memories opened afresh. The departure of her lover and her distress for her foster-brother, all tended to increase the intensities of those moments in which the orphan Hebrew Maiden was pillowed on her uncle's heart.

And of Judah Nathans? Was not that emotional five minutes also an epoch in his life? Aye, that cynic—that intellectual sensualist—that man of an evil nature—evil because that nature had not received the germinations of good, he was in that five minutes "born again;" not that he was spiritually a "new creature"—not that he was recreated in the image of a divine goodness, but he was "born again" more than at first the type of "Not All Dross!" The old love of his boyhood for his little sister Rachel, and the new love of his mature manhood, now germinating in his nature for that sister's orphan child, wrought this transformation in Judah Nathans, alias Snap, alias Sir Herbert Blakely's mentor. But our readers must not expect to find him in future what is denominated in sectarian parlance, the "converted man." He is still the cynic—still the intellectual devotee—still what would be considered impious in his intellectuality; but human affections now possess his heart while an evil spirit rules his mind.

"Enough, enough! Rachel my child," said Judah, placing his niece on her elegant lounge, and seating himself by her side.

"Dry those beautiful eyes, Rachel, my gentle one, and let your mother's brother talk to you awhile, and then we will hasten to the side of your foster-brother. I see Spontini has left us to order your carriage."

"Yes, Uncle Judah, we will converse as long as you desire. But my name is not Rachel. Terese is my name."

"I know, child, you are so called at Rome: but to me, you are Rachel. I know of one—a venerable patriarch—were he with us now, who would name you as I do—Rachel."

"It is of my grandfather you speak, Uncle Judah, is it not?" inquired the maiden. "But my grandfather, he is dead long ago; that is, I have deemed him long since dead."

"But you know not, Rachel, that he is dead?" observed her uncle.

"No!" she answered musingly; "I know not that my grandfather is dead, but for years, I have thus concluded."

"Perhaps he may be still among the living."

"True, Uncle, he may be."

"And we yet may find him, Rachel."

"I think not. I dare not hope as much as that my grandfather still lives."

"But there is one subject upon which you can inform me, Rachel," observed her uncle.

"I anticipate—oh, I anticipate it."

"Your mother?"

"Alas, alas, Uncle Judah, she is not of earth, now."

"I feared as much," he said with emotion.

"My poor mother died in giving birth to me."

"And your father—Rachel?"

"He was a martyr. He died one month before my mother's gentle spirit fled to heaven to met him. Oh, my father—oh my angel mother!" and the orphan wept again.

"Here is Spontini, Rachel. Dry your tears, my child."

"The carriage is waiting at the door, Terese," observed Spontini, as he entered the room.

"We will now to your foster-brother. Rachel, you have something more to learn, to-day, which will please you much," said Judah, persisting in calling our heroine by the Jewish name of her mother.

"I will not be more than two or three minutes dressing, Uncle Judah. I suppose it is of my other uncles and aunts you have to tell me. I would that dear Grandfather Isaac were among them. 'Twould be such a joyful day, would it not? Maestro," she continued to Spontini, "you will accompany us, will you not?"

"I will, Terese."

The maiden hastened to dress, and then her uncle, directing the coachman, took the Jewess to the house of Isaac Ben Ammon, where she found a still greater surprise.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE RIVALS AND THE FOSTER-BROTHER.

"Rachel, this is the house of the venerable Hebrew," observed Judah Nathans, as the carriage stopped at Isaac Ben Ammon's door.

"'Tis a dismal abode," answered his niece.

"Yet, Rachel, its owner is a good old man. He is very wealthy too, notwithstanding there is no magnificence displayed to sight. But within, child, you shall see a palace. 'Tis the habits of our people to make no display. Hard experience has taught them prudence. Ha! I see the good old man at the window watching us."

By this time, they had alighted from the carriage, and they entered the seemingly humble dwelling of Isaac Ben Ammon. But we will go before them to the sick-chamber of the singer Farinelli.

The room was darkened, yet there was enough light to give a mellow vision of the scene within.

A picture of the personages, for there was a subject for the painter's brush. A woman and a man—a love and a love unreturned! It was the scene of that sick-chamber that day. And more than one such subject was to appear in the drama of life to be presented in that sick-chamber. And more than a love and a love requited. A jealousy and a rival—a hope and the vision of a hope;—a new awakened dream and the dark shadows of a dream, Yet there was also a brighter scene—the meeting of the Patriarch and his grandchild; but there were shadows even in that; they pointed to the future between Walter Templar and Terese.

In that darkened sick-roon, in the house of Isaac Ben Ammon, there were two women, at the moment when Terese and her uncle Judah alighted from the carriage and entered the house. One was an old woman—the Jewess Rebecca, who had been attending Farinelli as his nurse; the other was Donna Clara Garcia, the re-instated prima donna, whom we have already met in the Green Room of the Opera House. She was a daughter of Spain. Her person revealed more of majesty than that of her rival, the Jewess, who, for a period had made Rome forget its former favorite. She was also beautiful, passionate, jealous. Her age was twenty-seven. At twenty-seven a woman reaches the very ripeness of her maturity. Her passions are intense, her yearning for love impatient, yet in character, she has become much a "woman of the world." There is no longer the artlessness and reserve of maidenhood, nor the lightness of the girl, that trifles with her own affections and the affections of others, without designing wrong. At twenty-seven, she is a woman of purpose; her love means mating; her jealousy is that of the tigress; her revenge is deadly to her rival and scarcely less deadly to the object of her love. Take this as a sketch of Donna Clara Garcia.

Donna Garcia was a superb singer. Her voice was a contra-alto. For years she had charmed the musical world, and, until the advent of Terese, no rival artiste had taken the scepter from her hand as the queen of song. She was also gifted with great tragic powers, and her impersonations were such manifestations of passion, as often to move an audience into a temporary delirium through their sympathies with the actress.

When Terese burst upon the musical world at Rome, Donna Clara Garcia was absolutely astounded to see her triumphantly take the scepter, which she herself had held, and her old admirers worshiping at her rival's feet. At first, she treated the Hebrew Maiden with contempt, and deemed it but a passing caprice, which carried her votaries from her to worship at another shrine. But this she soon discovered was not the case; and she was, moreover, brought to confess to herself that in richness Terese's voice rivaled hers, though it did not in magnificence and compass. There too was a beautiful charm of naturalness about Terese, and a purity and innocence which captivated the heart. The Jewess was not so great an actress as the Spanish lady, nor did she manifest her tragic powers. But the tragic impersonation, and display of passions were no novelty, while the touches of nature and the purity of tone of the our heroine afforded a new charm to the musical world at Rome.

Under ordinary circumstances, Donna Clara Garcia would have taken but little notice of the singer Farinelli; but as she soon discovered his love for Terese, her own passions became kindled for the primo tenore, and she looked upon our heroine as her rival in love and art. Thus it is with woman; she desires that which another possesses, while she passes by that which is within her reach. So also it is with man; but woman is more the child of feeling than man; her affections overrule her reason and make her the victim of her own heart. In her love woman is supremely unselfish, and even the "woman of the world" is a sacrifice upon the altar. So was it in the case of Donna Clara Garcia in that sick chamber that afternoon.

Donna Clara was on her knees beside the bed of Farinelli. She had forcibly taken his hand; she was weeping; the hot tears burnt that hand which reluctantly allowed itself to be taken by force. Farinelli was pillowed up in his bed; he looked weary of the scene; he seemed anxious for the coming of some one whom he expected; he was eager to end a painful interview which oppressed him. The old Jewess sat in her chair and looked on demurely. As a woman she sympathized in the case, for she understood it; but she heartily wished the prima donna gone. She knew the granddaughter of her master was coming, and the expected meeting was too sacred for strange eyes.

"Farinelli, tell me who wounded you? I will hunt him to the death," said Donna Clara fiercely between her sobs.

"My hurt is not serious, signorina," he answered. "Distress not yourself in the affair. 'Twas but a personal quarel in which I was worsted."

"But you are hurt seriously," said the lady. "See how pale and haggard you are."

"My friends distress themselves unnecessarily," he observed.

"Oh Farinelli, think you that it is friendship alone which brings me to your bedside? I heard that you were wounded. I feared you were dying. I threw aside all reserve and came. Oh Farinelli, pity me! The woman who would die for you implores your pity."

"Signorina, you have it But I am not deserving so much concern."

"Farinelli, you do not misunderstand me."

"Donna Clara, I do understand you. I am grateful. But this interview is distressing to us both. I cannot but feel deeply for you: I too have been wounded, tortured to agony—despair. Curse him! Pardon me signorina, I know not what I say. I have been delirious, and my wild dreams haunt me."

"And curse her!" muttered the prima donna to herself; and then she observed, passionately:

"Despair not, Farinelli. Cast her from your heart. Ah! I know too well to whom you refer; but she cannot—never will love you as I love you!"

"My God—my God! How the thought that Terese will never love me tortures me. It burns into my heart. But I will follow him to the ends of the earth, and kill him yet, ere she shall become his mistress."

"Whose mistress shall my master's grandchild be?' broke in old Rebecca. "Rachel will be no man's mistress. She will marry one of her own tribe."

"Good nurse, I spoke not of any grandchild of your master. I know not Rachel. See you not, Donna Clara, that in our ravings we are imprudent?"

"Heaven preserve me, I was all unconscious of any presence but our own," and the prima donna again burst into tears.

Donna Clara had been betrayed that afternoon, by the state of the man whom she secretly loved, her previous fears that he was wounded to the death; and her pent up feelings of love and jealousy carried her away to an avowal which, on the stage, would have been in perfect keeping with her character of prima donna. In the torrent of her emotions she had confessed what she had not designed; and now she wept in shame not alone over the avowal, but also over her unrequited affections, and the witness of it by another.

"Lady, some one approaches!" said Rebecca, rising.

Donna Clara in a moment was upon her feet, her eyes were dried, and she drew herself up as a tragic queen.

Her rival entered!

"Signorina Terese," said Donna Clara, with assumed calmness, though there was a fire in her heart—"Signorina Terese, your foster-brother has been wounded. I called to see if he was dangerously hurt. They said he was nigh unto death. But be not alarmed. The nurse informs me that his hurt is but slight. I cannot stay longer, for there is a rehearsal this afternoon. I sing to-night. You will be in your box of course, to witness my triumph."

And the prima donna swept from the room haughtily, with a look of hate at her rival, and a glance of ineffable love and yearning towards Farinelli, as she passed out of the chamber, leaving Terese with her foster-brother, who sank, exhausted with his emotions, back upon his pillow.

Terese now also knelt by the bed-side of the singer, but her place there seemed more becoming, for she was his foster-sister. He had nursed her in his arms a thousand times, and she had slept upon his bosom in her infancy; for, until the time she had grown to be quite a girl, day and night they had been inseparable. As we have seen in her history, after she had passed into maidenhood, more than the companionship of brother and sister existed between them. As a beloved sister, then, she entered the chamber and knelt at the bedside of the singer. It was very natural, now that Walter Templar was gone, to make a transition back to the days of her girlhood, and the dear companionship with brother Beppo. This, very likely, would not have been the case, in such a decided manner, had not the mysterious circumstances of Farinelli's absence and the news of his wounded state so soon have followed the departure of Walter; but the excitement of the circumstances altogether threw her back to the companionship of her foster-brother, as though it had never been broken.

"Beppo, dear Beppo," she said, "are you hurt much? Tell me, are you hurt much, dear Beppo? My uncle Judah says your wounds are not serious. Are you in much pain, dear Beppo?"

The singer noticed not that Terese had named an uncle. Another fact covered all the rest. He thought not of his hurt, of his pain, of his jealousy, nor of Donna Clara. Terese had called him by the old, familiar name of Beppo. How pleasant it sounded to his ear,—how much of charm in the voice that uttered it!

"Ha! Call me Beppo—call me Beppo, dear Terese. 'Tis so long since you called me your own Beppo, I thought I should never hear that name from your lips again. Yes, call me Beppo, as you did before he came!"

"Beppo—brother Beppo," said Terese, somewhat reproachfully.

"Forgive me, dear Terese. But he robbed me of the companionship of my sister. You know that we were always together until he came. 'Twas hard to lose you altogether. I have been so unhappy," said the poor fellow, with that pathetic lament which strong men give way to in a weakened state of body and mind. The strong are more readily brought down than the fragile sex. Woman suffers long, and bears sickness with the patience of a martyr; but a few days of physical prostration will reduce robust men to the state of children.

"I have been so unhappy, Terese, since Walter Templar came, and took my pet sister from me," continued the poor fellow, as he smoothed the jet locks of his foster-sister.

"Naughty Beppo," she returned, just as she would have done in by-gone days.

"But I am happy now, for you call me Beppo again."

"I will always call you Beppo, if you wish it."

"Yes, always call me so;—always call me Beppo—your Beppo, as you did long, long ago. Oh, it seems so long, so very long ago,—an age. It is an age since you called me your Beppo, till now."

"Why, brother Beppo, it is but four years ago. It has been very short to me."

"Ha! that is because you loved Walter Templar," said her foster-brother, with a burst of jealousy.

The maiden blushed, but did not chide.

"But to me, Terese, it has been an age—an age of torture."

"You must not talk so, and then I will be your pet sister again, and you shall be my dear brother Beppo," observed the maiden, with woman's tact, designing to draw him back to their old relations of brother and sister; for, as we have said, she had found out the secret of Farinelli's heart, since she had discovered the secret of her own. Love is a great revelator!

But this sudden return of familiar tenderness of Terese to her foster-brother had an effect not desired by the maiden. It was not oil upon the fire, as jealousy would have been: it was balm to a wound which she could never heal, without a broken heart from her own disappointment. But it soothed the pain of another heart, and deceived with the feeling that this heart was healed—quite healed. Terese was to "Beppo" as of old; and hope sprung up in his breast, which it had been well for all had it not germinated. How much of unhappiness in the future that hope which had sprung up in Farinelli's breast brought to Terese.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE MEETING WITH THE GRANDFATHER.

Judah Nathans entered the room and found his neice still by the bedside of Farinelli. The old woman had gone to attend her master and to learn from him concerning his granddaughter. She was eager for the revelation, which she saw had not yet been made.

"Ha, uncle Judah!" Terese exclaimed, and then to Farinelli, "Brother Beppo, what a glad surprise I have for you! This is my uncle, Judah, my dear mother's eldest brother."

"Signor, this is impossible!" said Farinelli, somewhat suspiciously.

"Indeed, my friend, it is not," Judah returned, noticing the suspicion, but not offended thereat. "I am her mother's brother."

"But how made you the discovery? 'Tis very recent, Signor."

"Yet not the less a bona fide discovery. You yourself was the cause of it."

"I?" replied the singer, incredulously.

"Even you, Farinelli. You supplied me with the evidence."

"When and how, Signor? I do not understand."

"When I dressed your wounds, my friend."

"You speak in riddles, Signor."

"You wear a locket in your bosom, my good Farinelli."

"Well?" said the other, with a blush on his pale countenance, and a frown, for he liked not the discovery of his secret by prying eyes.

"It bears the face of a little girl."

"It does, Signor."

"That child face is that of my sister Rachel."

"'Tis false!" replied the singer, passionately, his jealousy aroused again, with a startled fear that some other claimant was come to steal Terese from him, just as he had won her back again. "'Tis false. It is the picture of my foster-sister!"

"Yet, my good Farinelli, not less the picture of her mother, my sister Rachel."

"Yes, Terese is like her mother,—so my mother has often said. And her name was Rachel." The singer was half convinced, but not fully, for his jealousy was on the alert.

"It is true Brother Beppo," said Terese. "This is, indeed, my uncle Judah."

"It is true!" responded old Rebecca, who had been at the door eagerly listening for the revelation, which she knew was directly to be followed by another, even to the surprise of the maiden, as well as her foster-brother. "It is true, young man, that the locket round your neck bears the likeness of Rachel Ben Ammon."

"That was her mother's name." he replied.

"When Rachel Ben Ammon was a child, I nursed her, young man. You wear her image around your neck. And there stands Rachel Ben Ammon herself in her child."

"You my mother's nurse?" exclaimed the maiden, throwing her arms around the old woman's neck.

"It is true!" said Levi, who had entered behind his mother; "Rachel was my playmate."

"It is true!" responded an aged man, who now came in with Spontini, for they had been anxiously waiting without. "It is true, child. My arms, even before her own father's, held your mother Rachel, the wife of Isaac Ben Ammon's son."

As the last speaker entered and addressed her, Terese became agitated, and she fixed her eyes upon him in appeal, for she felt all had not been told her. Here was something more than her uncle Judah had told her, and the venerable appearance of the Jew made a startling impression upon her. The emotion that the patriarch manifested—the deep love and yearning with which he gazed upon her, with the reverent manner of Spontini towards the aged Hebrew whom he supported, overwhelmed the maiden, and had it not been for the arm of her uncle at that moment, she would have staggered and fallen; for the distress and emotions of the last few days had exhausted her. She felt her relation with that venerable man before her.

"Rachel, my child, do you not feel who it is that speaks to you?"

"Grandfather Isaac! Oh it is. I feel it is my grandfather Isaac," and she sprang into the old man's arms and fainted on his bosom.

We will pass over the scene in Isaac Ben Ammon's house, after Terese threw herself into the arms of her grandfather. The saddened joy of that meeting, we will leave the imagination of our readers to appreciate. The old Jew had found his granddaughter; but he learned at the same time that his children, Benjamin and Rachel, had long been numbered with the inhabitants of a better world. It was a heavy stroke to the old man's heart. In a brief hour, the realities had dispersed the hopeful dreams of twenty-one years, of meeting again in this life the dear ones who had been so cruelly separated from him. But he was not left disconsolate, for he had found his granddaughter. A new love sprang up in his heart; the venerable Hebrew had still something to live for; the care of his interesting grandchild now devolved upon him, for Spontini resigned Terese to Isaac Ben Ammon's charge.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE ALLIANCE.

It is the morning after the events related in the last chapter and again we invite our readers to the chamber of Farinelli. The singer has been blessed with a refreshing night's sleep, and hopeful dreams have visited him during nature's repose of body and mind. The maiden's uncle had manifested marked good will towards him and the aged Hebrew had said to him, "My son, you shall be to me as Rachel's brother," for the grandfather persisted in calling our heroine by the beloved name of her mother.

The uncle, Judah Nathans, entered Farinelli's room.

"Ha! my good friend," he said, "so you dressed this morning. Still feeble, I see, yet much improved. That arm of yours will need some care. You should not have been up to-day."

"I was disgusted with the bed, Signor, and impatient to be in action, but the nurse has so pillowed me in your uncle's huge arm chair that I seem as much in bed as yesterday."

"And much more comfortable, eh? Am I not right, Farinelli?"

"To confess the truth, I am, for I had a good night's sleep."

"And pleasing dreams? So, so. My niece, I see, is a better doctor than her uncle, in your case," observed Judah, pleasantly.

"Yes, Signor Nathans, for I am glad that my foster-sister has found her family."

"And that they are disposed to consider you as one of themselves?" added Judah.

Farinelli bent his head in reply, and became all attention to be the listener, for he had already learned enough of Sir Herbert's mentor to know that there was always purpose in the man.

"My good friend," said Judah Nathans, whom we shall no longer call Snap, though Sir Herbert will be allowed to name him thus.

"My good friend," he repeated as he ensconsed himself in old Rebecca's chair. "I told you last night that I should invite your ear to a conversation, to-day, that would interest you."

"You did, Signor Nathans; and I am prepared to listen."

"'Tis well, my good Farinelli. Now answer me truthfully."

"Go on, Signor."

"You love my niece."

"Signor Nathans!"

"Always speaks the truth, my good Farinelli;—always speak also to the point."

"Well, Signor?"

"Answer me truthfully, my friend," said Judah, kindly; "'twill be wise;—'tis always wise to speak the truth. Now, I am not good, but I have found it always wise to be truthful. Answer me upon your soul's honor;—do you love my niece."

"As my own life—a thousand times more than my own life. I would give that life a thousand times for my foster-sister's sake."

"There, that is enough, my good Farinelli," interrupted the uncle. "Your simple word was enough. I do not like protestations, but I have some little evidence that yours are genuine. In fact I had solved that problem before asking the question, I only needed your admission that we might talk from that point to the purpose. You love my niece?"

"I do."

"There is my hand, Farinelli, as a pledge of alliance between her mother's brother and yourself. It has never failed, those who have trusted in me.

The foster-brother took the proffered hand with an impulse of pleasure, for Terese seemed nearer to him in her uncle's alliance.

"And now, let me discourse to you upon this subject methodically," continued the mentor, "and, in my own peculiar style—that of truth. I say not that it is always that of good, nor always of good intentions, but it is of truth, when the truth is the wisdom.

The style pleases me, for it is so uncommon. Men generally lie both in their evil and their good intentions. I have reversed the method, finding truth as potent for evil as for good."

"Well, Signor," observed his listener.

"You think I am not to the point, Farinelli. You err. When I first sought you, it was with evil design. Do you see a method? I now seek you with good design. Do you not know that I am telling you the truth."

"I do."

"So you see I was to the point, for you do not doubt me, you trust me."

"I do not doubt you; I trust you," was the reply.

"Be it always thus, and I could not have an evil intent against you."

"I believe you, for you are a strange man, and your intentions now are evidently good to me."

"Yes, Farinelli; they are and ever shall be as long as your fidelity and devotion to my sister Rachel's child equals that of the past. She has told her grandfather and myself all about you from your boyhood—how you nursed her, how you protected her, how you loved her."

"Bless her—bless her!" said the poor fellow, as a tear stole down his cheek for he was weak from bodily and mental suffering.

"Farinelli," Judah continued, "the Hebrew race are not ungrateful. Ingratitude is not their sin. True, their instincts of humanity have been reversed by generations of sufferings and the fierce scorn of the Christian nations. The hate of the Gentiles have generated hate in us. Our affections have grown inward—our sympathies become exclusive We love not, because we have not been loved; trust not, because we have not been trusted; overreach and are merciless, because we have been overreached and have found no mercy. But the Hebrews have been true to themselves, true to their God and the ancient covenants. Ingratitude, say, is not the sin of my race."

"Your remarks, Signor, point to the fostering care and love of my mother and myself for Terese. She was no burden to us, Signor, but a blessing."

"Your love and care for my sister Rachel's child pays not my debt. I am grateful to you. She shall pay the debt herself, if her uncle Judah can so arrange it for her good.

"God bless you, Signor."

"Oh, never mind that, my dear Farinelli," observed the cynic, and then he continued.

"When I sought you first, it was because my master's interests required the removal of your rival, Sir Walter Templar, from his path."

"Curse him!" said Farinelli, with something of his old jealousy.

"Nay, that is not wise; solve him, my good friend; solve him."

"But how? I listen, Signor."

"Sir Herbert's interests, as I observed, required that Sir Walter Templar should be removed. I pledged his father, on his death-bed, that I would stand by his son and work out a certain purpose. General Blakely took me when a boy from a miserly uncle of mine. The General was kind to me and trusted me. Some day I will tell you my history. Well, I have kept my word to my old master, because he trusted me, and I resolved to remove Sir Walter Templar from necessity."

"And you found me a ready instrument for your purpose."

"Right, Farinelli. You also desired Sir Walter Templar's removal. I discovered the secret of love for Rachel's child, though I knew not then her relationship to me. You had long brooded over the probability of her becoming the victim of her love for him. Now, I confess I have confidence in your rival's honor. I do not think he would do my niece a wrong."

"What, would you give her to him?" broke in the jealous foster-brother.

"Have I, then, not given my pledge to you?"

"Pardon me, Signor," returned the singer, and Judah continued—

"Farinelli, I see no happy solution for her on that side. Moreover, Sir Herbert's business will not allow me to become Sir Walter Templar's ally."

"Do you really think that Walter Templar would make Terese his bride. Had I not forboded wrong intended to her I would not have attempted to take his life. I would not have my foster-sister unhappy, much less would I be the cause thereof. Holy Mother, I would not have her sacrificed. Better, a thousand times better that my heart should be tortured for ever than hers know a pang of my causing. Terese loves him. O God, Terese loves him I know, and if it is to be a choice between her becoming the honored bride of Sir Walter Templar, a happy mother; or broken-hearted that she might be mine, let her be his, Signor Nathans, let her be his though it should break my own heart!"

The devoted foster-brother had again relapsed into his old mood of despair. His passion was mixed with "dross" or it would not have been human; but as touching a desire for the happiness of Terese his love was supremely unselfish. Its depth and intensity overcame even the desire of possession.

"By my patron, St. Lucifer, I honor you, Farinelli," observed the uncle, with evident satisfaction.

"I would give my soul for her, Signor Nathans," the singer returned mournfully. And he would have done it willingly.

"Pooh! pooh! my good friend we don't barter our souls to any fiend to purchase another's happiness. Indeed, I know not if we have anything of the kind for traffic. I have not solved this problem of soul yet. At any rate, my friend, keep your soul for a gift to my niece, for upon my honor, were I the fiend I would not purchase the part of it which is not hers."

"There is no such part, Signor Nathans, that is not hers."

"By all means, Farinelli, let her keep thy soul. The child will make a good guardian angel to thee."

"Such she has ever been."

"You asked me just now, if I thought Sir Walter Templar would make my niece his wife. Of that I am not certain, though I am persuaded of his desire to do so."

"Thank God! then, I am not his assassin!"

"But my good friend, though your rival would, if it depended on him alone, make my niece his wife, there is a betrothal with his cousin Eleanor in the way."

"I am aware of the fact signor, as you know, for you urged that upon me to show the danger of my foster-sister falling a victim to her love."

"Which I should not have done had I known that she was Isaac Ben Ammon's granddaughter."

"Is the danger less on that account?"

"Am I not her uncle? Is she not my sister Rachel's child?" interrogated Judah with a certain quiet fierceness which made Farinelli shudder. As we have before observed, the Mentor's speech was in his non-emphasis. It told how terrible a man Judah Nathans was when his god, Necessity, prompted him. This peculiarity is noticable, more or less in all scientific men. For instance, how coolly your true surgeon dissects a body,—how pitlessly he amputates a limb.

"There is no fear now," continued Judah, "of Rachel's child becoming Sir Walter Templar's mistress, for I am her uncle. If I but touched the hem of his garment with that intent, Sir Walter Templar would die. Science kills as the lightning kills."

Again Farinelli shuddered.

"But my friend the case stands as before. I know what these family bonds of England's proud aristocracy are. They will not be broken. Signor Spontini tells me that both my niece and Sir Walter will sacrifice themselves, rather than violate the family compact. Their hope is that Sir Richard Courtney and his daughter will themselves revoke the engagement."

"Think you they will?" inquired the foster-brother anxiously.

"There is another barrier now," said Judah."

"Another barrier?"

"Rachel's child has found her grandfather. The Jews are more exclusive in marriage than even the English aristocracy. My uncle will not give his grandchild to a Chistian nobleman."

AN AFRICAN LOVE SONG.

Oh, Ebony Queen of my bosom arise,
And lighten the gloom with the whites of your eyes;
Oh, come to your lover—but light as you pass
Be your foot on the ground as the dew on the grass,
For rouse Gogo your brother, or father Nongpaw,
And they'd certainly kill me, and eat me up raw.

Wah, boori cio!
Wooria bangaree bo!

If you will not consent to take me for a hub
I must tenderly strike on your head with a club,
Till your scruples give way, and your bashfulness ends,
And I carry you senseless away to my friends,
Who—supposing by chance that too hard I have struck—
Will dine of you, deeply lamenting my luck.

Wah, boori cio!
Wooria bangaree bo! [Fun.

MUSICAL DODGES.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

PATENT

ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7¼ OCTAVES

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements: which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leavenworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

REASONS FOR RISIBILITIES.

By Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Sweet coz, I'm happy when I can,
I'm merry while I may—
For life's at most a narrow span,
At best a winter's day.
If care could make the sunbeams wear
A brighter, warmer hue,
The evening star shine out more fair,
The blue sky look more blue—
Then should I be a graver man:
But since 'tis not the way,
Sweet coz, I'm happy when I can
And merry while I may.

If sighs could make us sin the less,
Perchance I were not glad—
If mourning were the sage's dress,
My garb should then be sad;
But since the angels' wings are white,
And e'en the young saints smile—
Since virtue wears a brow of light,
And vice a robe of guile—
Since laughter is not under ban,
Nor gladness clad in gray—
Sweet coz, I'm happy when I can,
And merry while I may.

I've seen a bishop dance and reel,
And a sinner fast and pray—
A knave at top of fortune's wheel,
And a good man cast away.
Wine I have seen your grave ones quaff,
Might set our fleet afloat:
But I have never heard a hearty laugh
From out a villain's throat;
And I never knew a mirthful man
Make sad a young maid's day—
So, coz, I'm happy when I can,
I'm merry while I may.

MY SON'S WIFE AN ACTRESS!

OR;

FACTS AND PREJUDICES.

Hannah and I had a great deal to do, for it was baking day, and in those days you couldn't buy what you needed, were you ever so lazy, but must make it all with your own hands and your mind; and say what you like, it isn't only needful for folks that write and speak and preach to have brains, for a cake that's made without thinking won't be apt to rise light; and what looking bosoms would there be to shirts if the ironer was wool-gathering? The more brains both mistress and maid have, the better goes the house-keeping.

That day we were at it hard, and I was just putting my gingerbread into the oven, when the door opened and in walked my son Daniel, giving me a start, for he never came home at that hour. Steady he, like his father before him, who good man was at his work with sunrise, and never left it till sundown.

Hannah gave such a jump that she overset the cup of beaten eggs that she had in her hands, and I burnt my knuckles against the oven door as I turned.

"What brings you home, Dan?" asked I. "You're well I hope?"

"Never better," says he.

"What?" says I.

"I've begged a holiday," says he.

"To idle in?" asked I, a little cross.

He laughed a little silly laugh, like a shamed child, and blushed red as he said:

"No mother, to be married in."

I thought it was a pure joke.

"Now who will you have?" said I.

"I've chosen her," said he.

And his face looked earnest.

Hannah sat down flat on the floor.

"He means it mother," said she. "Sure as I live, he means it."

"I've meant it a good while," says Dan, and there wasn't another word said for ten minutes. I think we were listening to the clock—for one, I never heard it tick so loud—and it seemed to say, like some old woman in trouble, going over the same thing again and again:

"Dan's going to marry. Dan's going to marry."

"Well," says I, after a while, with a great sigh, "you must expect your grandfathers to die and your boys to marry. Both of 'em are blows, but they must be submitted to. But dear me; to think how I've cared for you, and kept you; never a button gone, or a hole in heel or toe. I hope 'twill be so always; but I don't know. The time will come, perhaps, when you'll miss your mammy."

"Miss you, mother," says Dan. "I hope I'll never do that. Tiny wants a mother as well as I."

"What's her name?" says I.

"Christine," says he.

"Let's call her that," says I. "No good in baby names. I never was called aught but Margaret."

He laughed. Then says he.

"Come, Hannah, dress in your best. You and mother must see us married."

"Baking day!" says I.

"But think of Dan, with no one near him, so lonesome," says Hannah.

"Well," says I, "let's hear who you are going to marry, that will make some difference." Somehow I never felt so stern to my boy.

Says he turning the color of my double pinks, on the window sill:

"She's beautiful. Her eyes are blue and her hair pure gold."

"Beauty is only skin deep," says I, "what kind of a girl is she? Good?"

"Good as an angel." said he.

I couldn't help making a face.

"Who is she?" said I.

"A girl—young lady," says he.

Says I, "Stick to the girl until you are a gentleman."

"We're all alike in this country," says he.

"My English ideas can't understand it so," says I. "You're a tradesman."

"Well, well," says he, "let that drop. My wife will be suited."

"What do her folks say?" asked I.

"She has none," said he.

"Is she rich?"

"No."

"Then she earns her living?"

"Yes."

"How?"

"Honestly," he said at last.

"How? is she out at service? I don't say I'd be angry at that."

"At service!" cried Dan, "with her lily-white hands and lady like look. No, mother, she——"

He stopped again and swallowed the word.

"What?" asked I, in a kind of shriek.

"Well, she's an actress."

I wonder I did not die. I gave a groan and Hannah ran for the camphor.

"You've killed your mother, Dan," says she. "She'll never get over it! I don't think I shall myself. An Actress!"

Between the grief and the camphor I came near suffocating, but found breath at last.

"Dan," says I, "was it for this I whipped you till you knew the Shorter Catechism by heart? Was it for this I've prayed for you and took you to meeting, and kept you like wax. 'Train up a child in the way he should go,' is out of the Bible, but it hasn't proved true this time. I must have gone wrong somehow. I let you read the Shepherd of Salisbury Plain on a Sunday, and let you off the tenth chapter of Genesis when you couldn't learn it. I don't know what else I've done that you should marry an actress."

"She'll not play after she is my wife," said he.

But that made no difference. I felt that I would die of shame.

"Go to your wedding?" says I; "not I nor your decent sister. Just keep your wife a day or two, until I get a place as housekeeper somewhere, and Hannah goes to her aunt to learn dress-making, and you'll be rid of us; for if you marry her, neither of us will live with you if we starved for going."

And Hannah said the same, though she cried heartily over it. And so, in the end, we went, and Daniel and I had quarreled woefully; and there were all my things—the tins I had kept so bright, and the wooden-ware I'd scoured, and the furniture I'd rubbed until it was like a looking-glass, left for an actress to do what she chose with. I used to lie awake o'nights thinking of my lovely tea set, and wondering whether the bold thing had cracked the milk jug yet, and how many of the plates were gone.

I hadn't seen her—I didn't want to; I knew what she was: a painted thing with a pinched waist, and no good in her face or heart. And to think that my Dan should get such a one!—my Dan!

The place I got was with a widower out of town. A young man with a troop of noisy children. Always making a muss and never quiet, and I was wild with them. Then it was damp as well, and a lonesome place—enough to give you the blues. And Hannah wrote that she hated dress-making and could never earn her salt, and wished we had stayed with Dan, and I was worried and chilled and heated, and finally taken down with the rheumatism. I hid it as long as I could, but my pains grew bad, and my limbs were swollen and red as beets, and at last, I gave up and went to bed. And my master, a little weak-chested gentleman, with a kind of helpless look in his eyes, came to talk with me.

"You're very ill, Mrs. Munday," says he.

"I'm afraid I am, sir," says I.

Then he rubbed his hands and coughed.

"If Mrs. Chester were living," said he, "you should stay here until you were well—but you know how it is. There is no one to do anything. The children will kill themselves, I expect, and Bridget has set fire to the house and put whiting in the biscuit instead of saleratus. Where shall I address—to whom shall I write? Your friends must come for you."

"Send me to the hospital," says I, "and I'm sorry to have troubled you so. You're none too comfortable, at best."

"Thank you," said he, with tears in his eyes. "Mrs. Chester was such a manager, it does seem hard."

And then he went and did just what I'd rather have died than done—sent for Daniel, quite unknown to me."

That night he came into the room with his wife. She was pretty—no denying that—and then I cried out:

"No; go away Dan; I want nothing to do with you nor that bold actress wife of yours. Send me to a hospital."

And he flushed red, and looked at me as if he might take me at my word. But she put her hand—a kid glove on it, the extravagance—and, says she, whispering, but I heard her:

"She's your mother, Dan. Do your duty."

"I'll not have you insulted," said he.

"I don't mind a hasty word," said she, "and from an old woman."

"I was angry, but I couldn't say much, and they took me home."

I was glad I was in the bed-room so I couldn't see how the kitchen had got. I'd rather been taken to my grave, and so I made no secret of my hate for her, but (as I thought then) she was a sly one to keep her feelings to herself. The doctor came and I was well nursed and grew better. Not a kind word had I said to them, and I'd forbid Hannah to come into the house unless to my dead bed.

As soon as I was well, Mr. Chester would have me back, and I said I'd go a dozen times a day. I meant it too, but before the time came, a great hogshead had rolled down a hatchway upon Dan, and there he lay between life and death, with this wife of his bending over him like a crushed lily. Oh, she was pretty—like a doll—flesh and blood were never so like wax. Don't think I liked her better for that.

So, now, all my anger was gone toward Dan, and I must nurse him instead of going to Mr. Chester's again; and my money was gone, and there was very little in Dan's purse. She knew nothing of economy, that actress wife of his, and what could we do but go to the poorhouse I couldn't tell. I was fit for no hard work yet.

"She came to me one day, with her bonnet on, says she:

"Will you watch Dan awhile? I am going out."

"Go where you like," says I. "I'll care for my son; I always have."

She gave me a look, but never a word, and went.

After that I saw her studying hard on bits of paper, like a girl at her lesson, and she went out almost every day. I used to hate her for it and wouldn't keep a cup of tea warm for her even. I guessed she was going back to her old ways, and one night she told me so.

Dan had been getting worse and worse all the time up to now, and we had to sit up with him at nights and watch him. First one and then the other took their turns at sitting up with him, giving him one kind of medicine and then another, rubbing him with all kinds of ointments and salves, and poulticing the place where the hogshead first struck him when it rolled down the hatchway. He was very feverish sometimes, and his mind wandered a little bit very often, and when thus wandering, he was bent upon reconciling me to his "actress wife." But I paid no more attention to that, so hardened was my heart against her, than I would to the ravings of a madman. Wasn't it cruel of me? But I couldn't help it, I was so prejudiced.

One night when I was going to sit up with Dan, she came to me all dressed up, as if she was going out somewhere, and motioned for me to come to her from the bedside where I was sitting. I went to her and she put her head down to mine and her mouth close to my ear, so as not to let Dan hear her.

"Please leave the door unlatched," she said, "I'm going to play to-night, and don't tell Dan, mother."

She never called me mother before, and I looked at her.

"Is this a time to play?" says I, "your husband at death's door."

"No," said she, and broke down like a child. "No," but I've done it before when I've suffered as much, and he must have medicines and food, and there's the rent—"

"You mean to work for that," says I.

"What else?" asked she, and she went.

It was like seeing one go into a pit of fire, for somehow I began to think there was a bit of good in her.

It was weak of me to pity her.

No doubt she enjoyed herself, and I did. And she thanked me, too; and took my place with Dan until daylight came. He thought she'd been asleep, and she never told him.

From that night it began—my liking of her, I mean. I saw her at her study. Hard at work over words longer than those in the catechism. I saw her slaving over dresses which she altered to save expense. I saw her go out "to rehearsal," she called it, rain or shine. I saw her come home from the play, looking like a ghost, when she had washed the rouge away; I heard her praying for Dan better prayers than I could have made myself. I knew, actress or not, that she was working herself to death, and I grew tender of her. Tender as if she'd been a girl of my own.

At last, when my poor boy was well enough to sit up, though it would be weeks before he could walk yet, if he ever did, and knew what she had done,—and oh, it was wonderful—the rent paid and the doctor, and none of us starved, all by her work it was—I'd come to know, instead of an idle life, that acting was just about the hardest any one could live.

Would you believe, I used to go after her, I, a Baptist, from the time I felt concerned, and then I wasn't sixteen, to the day when I was sixty, I, going to a playhouse to fetch home an actress! It was like going to a place I'll give no name to, lest I should be taken for one that uses bad language, but the girl I took under my arm was, as Dan had said long ago, as much like an angel as could be.

When it rained I took my umbrella, and one day an honest man, a carpenter, I think, seeing me early and in a damp place said:

"That's not good for your rheumatiz, old lady."

"Come," said he, "I'll show you where you can see the play while you wait."

"I see a play!" I screamed. "Why I'd think myself too wicked to live."

He laughed.

"Your daughter-in law acts," said he.

"Not my fault," said I, old feeling creeping back.

"Well," said he, "now you see her, there is no great harm, as well wait in as outside."

"Perhaps," said I, and somehow he got me in, and I saw the end of the play; for the matter of that they had on bonnets, the ladies in the boxes, and acted respectable as they might act in meeting, and on the stage there was a house, and a woods and a sky; painted he said, the carpenter, but I thought them real, and she, Christine, opened a door and came out. She was saying something as if she meant it, and the words were good, and she was sweet and beautiful as anything I ever saw, in her pretty white dress, and I forgot the whole, but I was in a flutter between laughing and crying before it was over. And I heard a stamping like thunder.

"What is it?" I asked. "The house ain't on fire?"

"It's applause," said he, "they like her and her playing. Well they may."

"Old lady," said he, "Whatever bad you've been used to think of actresses, don't think it of your daughter-in-law. Nobody else ever did. Since she came a little lonesome orphan to play small parts, there hasn't been one wicked enough to say a wicked thing in her hearing. She's as pure and true as she looks, and don't be prejudiced against her, old lady."

"I'm not," I said with a sob.

"Good for you," said he.

And as I looked, there she stood courtesying to the people who applauded her; and I—a Baptist. Well, no matter, I up with my umbrella and pegged away applauding her, the loudest and hardest of 'em. And the pretty thing looked and caught my eye, and smiled as bright as a sunbeam, and it was at me—her husband's old mother and not at the whiskerando in yellow kids and eye-glass, though he thought so, that my dear girl smiled as I pegged away with my umbrella, the tears pouring down my cheeks like rain. And, look ye, 'twant the actress I applauded so much as the dear good woman I'd seen study to learn her part when she needed sleep, stitch so over her handsome-looking dress to save a little, the good true woman working her young life away almost for her husband and the cross old thing who had insulted her so often; the woman that, actress or not, was honest, and earnest, and pure, as I knew now from my inmost soul. And I was a deal more of a Christian as I sat there than I'd often been in church, not to compare the places, and I trust to be forgiven.

I tucked her under my own arm with a kiss that night, and took her home to Dan, and I sat down with his hand in one of mine and Tiny's in the other, and emptied my heart. If I couldn't, I think it would have burst.

My dear girl understood me, and we were mother and daughter from that day. And she set me, that thought so much of myself, an example, that girl did. Trusting more, and no matter how dark the cloud looked, seeing God's sunlight behind them, and working, and praying, until the struggle was over and Dan well again, hearty as ever, thank heaven. The doctor called it a miracle. Perhaps it was, for isn't it a miracle that He should answer our poor prayer—as I knew he answered ours—for Tiny's sake.

Dan is a rich man now, and his wife never acts, and though Hannah is well married, I shall end my days with my daughter Tiny. She was so glad to get rid of her acting business; because she hated the spirit of the play-house; and the rest of the folks were a drinking set; and the theater used to seem to her like a whited sepulcher. But it was play or starve with the poor orphan child; and luckily she was so good that even the theater could not spoil her for which I thank an overruling Providence.

A MEMORABLE RIDE.

BY A CANADIAN FARMER'S WIFE.

"Hadn't you better leave the door unfastened, Ellen?" said my husband, as I turned the key in the lock, then dropped it into my pocket.

"I don't know," I said, doubtfully; then, after a moment's hesitation, "No, I think it had better be fastened. The children might get out and run down to the gate at the foot of the meadow to play, and it is but a step from there to the creek, you know."

He made no reply, but stooped down and looked at some part of the harness with a slightly perplexed air.

"What is the matter now?" I said, with some asperity.

The truth is, my husband belonged to that numerous class of individuals whose motto is, never to do to-day what they can put off until to-morrow; while I, on the contrary, was prompt and decided. With me to will and to do were synonymous, and I had little mercy for such a failing.

"I fancy this little piece of twine will bring us through this time, but I will certainly mend it to-morrow," he replied, as I climbed into the clumsy, old-fashioned phaeton.

The harness being adjusted to his satisfaction, if not to mine, he seated himself beside me; and nodding a last good-bye to the little faces pressed against the window-pane, we drove off.

Our cottage was situated in the little valley lying to the south-west of what was at that time the village of Lanoy, in Canada. A hill of considerable height stood between us and the village, on our side a verdure-crowned, gently rising slope, on the other a more abrupt descent, with a rather circuitous road winding past little cottages and farm-houses of more or less pretension.

Our present errand was to the shop, to which we carried our produce as it accumulated from time to time, and received in exchange groceries, clothes, etc. Our present load consisted in part of a basket of eggs; consequently we were obliged to drive rather more slowly than usual. I left, as I had often done before, the younger children to the care of Grace, who, though but eight years old, had a mind far in advance of her years, and who was never more pleased than when entrusted with some similar duty or responsibility. I charged her not to take the baby from the cradle, but to rock him gently to sleep if he wakened, or, if he would not sleep, to amuse him with his playthings until our return.

It was a lovely day in the latter part of September, copious showers of rain had alternated with mid-summer's suns, and the freshness of the verdure was still undimmed. It was scarcely yet time for the "sere and yellow leaf," though the maples had hung out their golden banners, as if to try the effect of contrast with the living green of the other forest trees. The birds still sang cheerily as they fluttered to and fro in the hedgerows; and numerous little ground squirrels skimmed along the fence-rails, dropped suddenly, and disappeared mysteriously.

Old Whitey ambled along after his usual monotonous fashion; and we soon reached our destination. I had a number of articles to purchase and examine, as well as the merits of a new churn to discuss; and, just as we had settled all to our satisfaction, a neighbor whom we had not seen for some time came in, which detained us still longer, so that when we turned our horse's head homeward, I saw with some surprise, as well as a slight feeling of alarm, that the sun had already set, and the soft gray of twilight was stealing up the valley. Our load was a pretty heavy one, my husband having purchased several agricultural implements, of no great weight individually, but collectively making no small load for one horse; so that though we were necessarily anxious to get home, we were obliged still to drive moderately, particularly as the road was not only hilly, but rough.

Chatting upon the various little items of gossip which we had heard, we drove on till we had nearly reached the top of the hill, when, turning to make some remark to my husband, I saw a change come over his face, which struck me with a sudden terror. He was pale as a corpse.

"Look!" he said, in a voice hoarse with emotion, pointing in the direction of our home.

My heart gave a sudden bound, then fell, like a lump of lead, in my bosom. A cloud of thick, dense smoke, distinctly defined against the clear sky beyond, rose above the tree-tops. I tried to speak, but I could not utter a word. At last I said, steadying my voice, "I think it must be Morrison's. Isn't it to the left of our house?"

"No!" he said, quickly, as he seized his whip, and urged old Whitey to his utmost speed. "Don't you remember that when we are at the top of the hill the smoke from our chimney rises just over the centre of that little group of cedars?"

Alas! I did remember; and as he spoke we reached the summit, and saw enough to change our fears to certainty. Neither spoke; but each turned and looked at the other with quivering lips and dilating eyes.

"My heavens! and I had locked them in." I was fairly beside myself, frantic with terror. I felt as if I must leap from the vehicle and fly to their rescue. Old Whitey seemed to understand that life or death depended upon his efforts, and he exerted himself nobly. On we flew, down the hill, dashing through the stony little brook that crossed the road, over the tumble-down bridge, whose rotten boards rattled and started up from their places, past the hedgerows, that looked like one continuous mass of flying green; past the little cottages, with the startled children staring from the doors, thinking of nothing, caring for nothing, but to rescue our darlings. I buried my face in my hands, and rocked to and fro in my seat almost bereft of reason, as I thought of the scene which might be awaiting us. Imagination conjured up all the dreadful tales I had heard or read, to add to my horror. Once only I raised my head, and saw, or fancied I saw, slender tongues of flame cleaving the mass of smoke, which had by this time increased fearfully in volume and density.

At last, after what seemed an age, but was in reality only a few minutes, we reached the bottom of the lane which led to our cottage. The angle was a sharp one, and we turned with such speed as to send the hind wheels of the old phaeton spinning high in the air. How I got out I never knew. I am sure I did not wait for the horse to be stopped. Rushing to the door, I threw myself against it with such force as to break it in. The room was full of smoke; but as the opening door dissipated it a little, I saw that it was empty. Then, suffocated by the smoke, and overpowered by excitement, I fell fainting to the floor.

When consciousness returned, I found myself in the house of a neighbor, with the children all about me, pretty well frightened, of course, but entirely unhurt. How the fire originated was a mystery which we never could unravel. Grace, sitting with her back to the stove, and with her attention entirely absorbed by the pictures in the family Bible, did not see it until Rover, the Newfoundland dog, who had been before quietly dozing by her side, attracted her notice by his evident uneasiness; after which he sprang through the window, fortunately taking the whole sash bodily with him, and, running at full speed to the nearest house, soon returned with some of its inmates. Grace, in the meantime, after letting down the two elder children through the window, which was only about four feet from the ground, took the baby from the cradle, and was preparing to follow when the neighbors arrived. The house being old, and built, as such houses usually are, of the most combustible materials, notwithstanding all efforts, soon became a smoking ruin.

Rover and Old Whitey lived to a good old age, and were ever afterwards held in affectionate remembrance for their services on that occasion.

One evening, about a year afterwards, as we sat in our new house, built on the site of the old one, but more commodious and comfortable in every respect, I remarked "that the fire had benefitted us in at least one way, for unless the old house had been actually consumed, we should never have had the new one."

"I have felt the benefit of it in another way," said my husband, gravely; "it has taught me never to put off doing anything which should be done at once until a 'more convenient season.' If the harness had given way on that day, where I mended it so slightly before we started, though it would not have interfered with the safety of the children, it would have added tenfold to our anxiety, because it would have delayed our reaching them. I made a vow then that if we were permitted to reach home without accident, I would use my utmost endeavors to overcome the habit of procrastination; and I think you will allow that I have been pretty successful, so that, in more than one respect, we have reason to regard that as a 'memorable ride.'"

EDUCATION.

Whatever may be your habits of industry—whatever may be your desire to obtain property—whatever you may do to render your circumstances easy and independent, unless some portion of your time is appropriated to the acquisition of knowledge, your castle of happiness must fall to the ground. Even the desire of obtaining it discovers a liberal mind, as it is connected with many accomplishments and virtues. Though your course of life should not lead you to study, yet the cause of education always promotes proper employment to a well disposed mind.

Virtue itself is only fostered by an improvement of the sensibilities, and in the absence of this ineffable trait, all the riches of this world are incompetent to render any one happy. Therefore, considering these circumstances, would it not be well to incorporate in your system of business the appropriation of a small part of your time to the useful improvement of the mind? Would you not thereby be duly enabled to appreciate the sources of happiness which a beneficent Creator has conferred?

The object and end of our existence is happiness, and it cannot be accelerated unless we call to our aid the assistance of our education.

TO EVANGELINE.

BY EMILY G. TEASDALE.

The winds blow freely from their secret home,
And whisperings soft and low unto me come:
The blooming summer now is gone, and fast
The leaves are falling by the Northern blast.
They image sorrow to the care-worn soul:
They fall, and fade, and die, but not the whole:
There is a life in their decay, and soon
With rolling months will smile again like noon,
As if they did delight to gladden man,
And whisper to his weary heart again.

Hope! mortal hope! shake off thy doubt and fear,
An hour of life and joy will come to cheer:
A germ of life immortal is at thy heart,
And into immortality 'twill start,
Though it may droop, and fade, and die, yet still
The spirit of eternal power will fill
The heart with energy again, and time
Shall see thy spirit risen from pale decay,
In fragrance blooming in a better clime:
A glorious hope in that ne'er-setting day.

And like this hope, and like those stars which shed
Light, peace and joy upon the sailor's head,
Who wayward driven by unpitying winds,
His hope at last in some safe harbor finds,
Rise! loved one, rise! and to my heart reply,
Bringing sweet hope and joy as light on high:
Bearing the beauty and the love most dear
To my sad heart, and dry the falling tear:
Since all that hope or dreams can tell,
Within thy being, I have found to dwell.

Or glows in summer skies, above, beneath,
Or goes into the heart with music's softest breath,
Or dwells in heaven's own climes of grand or fair,
Whate'er the spirit yearns for tenderest there,
Which by a thought, or tone, or look that steals
Within the heart, and there its love reveals:
Draws out the soul in feeling so divine,
That truth, and heaven declare that thou art mine.

There is a heart within this bosom beating,
A spirit yearning for our spirits meeting,
A power of which who knows the charm to me!
Its thrilling memory when I think of thee!
And even now the heart in tears will melt,
The more 'twas silent—then the deeper felt!

Where is that hand I've held within my own?
The heart I loved, and it was mine alone;
Where is that brow I've pressed with many a kiss?
And eye that spoke to me such untold bliss?
That, while my spirit gazed and tongue was still,
My heart drank joy and rapture to the fill,—
Joy that a God would not disdain to feel,
For, coupled with this mortal heart, 'twas real.

Rise! Eva, rise! appear unto my heart,
The sweetest vision life can e'er impart,
Flower of immortal love! hope of my soul,
While time and ages shall incessant roll.
'Round thee my fancy shapes a dream of love,
And weaves for thee all which my heart will prove,
And soaring ever, while all virtues live,
Shall seek for thee the riches heaven can give.

And whether in the sunny noon of time,
Or twilight of my life in any clime:
Or happier far when this fair world of ours
Hath numbered out its full of trying hours,
And beams like heaven with happy myriads here,
For high, bright beauty, gloriously clear,
I would be near thee, all thy soul could need
And love thee with heart-feeling none exceed,
In glowing visions in the earth or air,
Where'er my footsteps roam, where'er I see,
The first, the last, the dearest and most fair,
Into my heart and soul, my Eva, thee!

A NEW KIND OF CALVINISM;

OR,

HOW FAR ARE MEN FREE AGENTS?

We have been requested by a valued correspondent to write on the subject of "man's free agency," as he says that himself and a number of others are interested in the question. It appears to him that a man's decision to accept the Gospel, or do any kind of good, instead of rejecting it and doing evil, is the result of forces and influences existing within the man, which control the will. As we have, at various times, thought out what might be said on our correspondent's view of the question, we will, without attempting to dictate any doctrine, state some of the evidences which lie on that side of the question of free agency, and leave such as are interested in the matter to judge for themselves.

Before doing this we will say that we have arrived at an age of the world when old creeds are passing away, and men dare to think and speak on every subject. We have reached a period when the human mind is seeking for a sure foothold on every great question. To get at this, there is no frame of mind so safe and proper as that which questions everything but that which it has sounded to the bottom. On this principle of man's free agency many new conceptions and thoughts may be presented.

As disputed by our grandfathers, the question of man's free agency simply amounted to this,—are mankind forced to go to heaven or hell unless they choose? Of course, when this question was put everybody had in their minds the supposition of some arbitrary personal God who had sufficient power to send mankind to either locality, and consequently all independent souls came quickly to the conclusion that as the idea of specially creating some people for damnation and making favorites of the rest was too repulsive to think of, man must be a free agent to choose his own future—especially as there could be no justice in a God who rewarded people who did not deserve it, nor any real happiness in being rewarded unless one knew he had merited it.

The above arguments, it is clear, are very sound so far as they go. It is evident that no one can successfully defend the idea of mankind being decreed to a fixed fate at the will of some arbitrary being who assigns His creatures to happiness or misery just because He chooses to do so. But there is no necessity when combating free agency to suppose any arbitrary God acting in this horrible way. Mankind may not be free agents—not because any great Being wishes it to be so,—but because according to the eternal laws of nature it cannot be otherwise. It is easy enough to suppose that nature, acting according to her own unalterable principles of wisdom and of love, may have brought all beings into existence with equal capacities for perfection, but at the time of their birth with greater or less tendencies to good, according to the conditions under which they are produced; just as trees, fruits and flowers, differ in their size, flavor and beauty according to their parentage, their cultivation, or the soil out of which they are obtained. This view of the case shows, indeed, that some men, owing to circumstances, may possess greater tendencies to good than their fellows, and to that extent be good without their free agency, but it assigns to all men a blissful future in due time; and does away with the idea of some monstrous Personage who creates men for good or ill according to His caprice and will. It takes for granted—that under the influence of irresistible forces which control the universe—all men, no matter how good or evil they may be at present, owing to the experiences through which they are passing, are coming out of the darkness into the light with greater or less rapidity. If one man, owing to the influence of more happy surroundings exerted upon him before or since his birth, be more filled with tendencies to good than his fellows, there is no injustice in this, because there is no favoritism in the matter—it is the result of laws which nature herself cannot control. Besides, if one man be influenced by higher impulses than his fellows, it is for their good as well as his own; for no man can possess more of God in his soul than his fellows without their being benefited by contact with him. God, like the sun, cannot shine through any individual, without he shines for all.

One thing, at least, may be said in favor of these views, and that is, that if it be true that mankind are dependent on their birth and surroundings for so much of love and desire for good as they may possess, our "Mormon" doctrine of the utility of a superior parentage, and the necessity of a better regulation of the marriage relations amongst mankind is brought into grand relief; for it shows that, of necessity, heavenly marriages produce heavenly children, and, therefore, that the marriage relations must lay at the root of all the misery and degradation or the happiness and progress of mankind.

In order to place our readers in a position to see the whole of this view of free agency, what human experience itself says on the subject, has also to be stated. It is in the experience of many that long before they were capable of deciding for good or evil on their own agency—long before they had any clear conception of the difference between one and the other, they can remember that they found themselves instinctively seeking after God without knowing why. Going into corners and praying to Him—not because they had any reason for doing so, because their reason was not exercised in the matter at that time, but just because they loved to do it—because they had a desire to do so—much on the same principle that young ducks go straight to the water. Again, many who have examined their own natures, hold that they possess strong impulses which incline them to good, which impulses, they assert, are the result of no agency of theirs; especially as they could not get rid of them if they wanted to, and could only suppress them with pain and violation of their whole nature.

As to what would be the results to the world, supposing this view was generally adopted, it is but just to say, that it would naturally incline mankind to a loving consideration for the weaknesses and follies of each other. Of necessity, it would make every believer in it feel that if they possess any good, they are what they are, through the tender mercies of a loving God, and all the rest of mankind are the same. All are where the wisdom of Omnipotence has brought them. All are marching up the ladder of life as fast as their condition will permit. So far as this idea goes, we will say that it would at least be a very pleasant doctrine to have true if we could make it so, for it would kill bigotry and fanaticism with one blow. It would enable us to love all men just where they are, because we should feel that although they are not half as loveable as they will be, they are where nature in her eternal movements has brought them.

It will, perhaps, be very sagely asserted on this subject, that the above is a very beautiful doctrine, except in one point, and that is, that it is not true. This, of course, is likely enough, and will be equally clear to us all when the reasons are given.

As far as the usual arguments for free agency are concerned, they are before our correspondent; we need not recapitulate them here, he is familiar with them already. To meet his inquiries, as well as those of his friends, and the public at large, we have stated part of what may be said on the other side. We make no decision on the matter. It is one of those questions which every man must decide by the light within him, and by his own experience. Such ideas will meet all thinking people, sooner or later, anyway, if they only think far enough; and they may just as well think about them to-day, and put them to flight if false, as at any other period. On the other hand, if there is a grain of truth in them, that grain belongs to our "Mormonism," for which cause we present them for examination.

In closing, we will say to all persons, on this and all other subjects: dare to think, and think freely. Never be afraid of the foolish saying that, perhaps you "will think so far that you may not be able to think your way back again." It is only those who think but seldom who are in danger of not finding their way back; just as little boys who seldom go from home are in danger of being lost on the very next street. Do not be afraid, either, that the truth will be endangered by your thinking. Depend upon it, the truth can take care of itself. It can stand inspection, and rough handling, if necessary. If not, it is not that glorious thing we have taken it to be, and we may as well be without it as with it.

BIG MOONS AND LITTLE ONES.

OR PLAIN TALK ON THE SCIENCES.

No. 11.

One of the delusions that a great many people labor under, is that there is but one globe in the universe that goes through such changes as our moon does. It would very much surprise such people could they watch some of the planets through a telescope, and discover that they go through all the phases of the moon from new to full. This is a fact that can be easily demonstrated. Even our earth does the same. To other worlds she looks at one time like a small new moon, appearing only as a faint streak of light; from this she increases gradually till she shines like a full round face, after which she again wanes till she disappears.

Living in a dark world like this, it will be a great comfort to many of our readers when we tell them that things are not half as black as they look, for there has been a new moon every night since the moon was made. "How," says one, "can that be? We only see a full moon every twenty-eight days!" It will perhaps only increase the puzzle when we assert, that it can be for the same reason that there has been a new moon, a half moon and a three-quarter moon all shining at once, every night since the moon began its career.

Suppose that a great ball, say twenty feet in diameter, was hung up in our streets opposite the City Hall, on a dark night; and suppose that a great mass of light was turned on to its southern side, from the windows of the Hall. To all persons on the south of the city it would look like a round full moon. Persons standing west of it near the Theatre would only see a thin edge of the illuminated side, and they would say that it resembled a new moon. Again, people north of the ball—or those living on the bench—being unable to see any of the illuminated side would say that was all nonsense, for to them it looked like no moon at all.

Just in this way our moon is hung up in the heavens, and being shone upon, only it has the sun to illuminate it instead of the City Hall window. Except when the earth gets exactly between the sun and the moon and cuts off the light, one side of the moon is always illuminated—always shining like a full moon. All that is necessary to have a full moon any night is simply to get opposite to it so that you can see it. As the moon passes round and round our globe, about once every month we get squarely opposite her illuminated face, when, as we can then see the whole of the side that is lighted up, we say that it is full moon. By-and-by passing on her great journey the moon gets a little on one side of us, and as we can't see quite so much of her bright side as we did we say "the moon is waning." It is nothing of the kind. It is still shining with a full round face of light, only we have passed a little to the right or left and cannot see the whole of it. Again the moon passes on around us, her illuminated face getting further and further out of sight, until, finally, it has disappeared from our view altogether; and we say, "there is no moon to-night;" simply because the dark side is turned towards us while its glorified face is shining away bright as ever, only looking in another direction. Could we at such times take a flight of a few hundred thousand miles till we stood just in a line between the moon and the sun we should discover our delusion at once. Could we still further follow the moon in its wanderings so as always to occupy the same kind of a position we could have full moon all the time. On the other hand, could we fly fast enough to go entirely round the moon in one night, we could have every change of the moon from new to full between the setting and the rising of the sun.

If this is true of one globe like the moon, it must, of course, be true of all bodies like our earth, that get their light from a central luminary by revolving around it. No body of this kind can be illuminated except on one of its sides at one time. To all intelligences who are opposite these illuminated sides they will, of course, look like full moons. To those who are sideways to the illuminated face they will look like new moons; while to those who are entirely behind the bright side they will be totally invisible, and seem to have disappeared.

As many of the planets are attended upon by a variety of moons to illuminate their nights, each of which, of course, go through all the changes we have referred to, as well as going through all these phases themselves, our solar system must be full of "Little moons and big ones," shining away every night visible to somebody, and which would be visible to us did we only go where we could see them.

FRANCE AND ITS FOUNDERS.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

France next comes in to play her part in the great drama of empires, Charlemagne was, in the world's history, what Julius Cæsar or Constantine was before him. An epic is in the very name of each, and they are also as historical links in the grand series. But, before taking up the biography of the family of Charlemagne, let us briefly sketch the founding of the French Nation.

Among the barbarians, who poured into Europe early in the Christian era, breaking up the Roman empire and changing the face of the world, were a people known by the name of Franks. They were of the great Teutonic family, and originally settled on the Lower Rhine and Weser. In their resistance to the Roman power they acquired their name (free-men). They were a confederation rather than a people. Under the name of Franks, Germans of every race composed the best troops of the Roman armies. They invaded Gaul as early as the year 254, during the reign of the Roman emperor Gallienus. They arose to importance in the empire and resisted the irruptions of others of the barbarians into Gaul, and, in 406, they opposed, though unsuccessfully, the great invasion of the Burgundians, Suevi, and Vandals. Of this invasion Gibbon says, "This memorable passage of the Suevi, the Vandals, the Alani and the Burgundians, who never afterwards retreated, may be considered as the fall of the Roman empire in the countries beyond the Alps; and the barriers, which had so long separated the savage and the civilized nations of the earth, were from that fatal moment levelled with the ground."

But, in our views of the Providence revealed in history, we have not dated this great remodeling of the world as from a "fatal moment."

About the year 486, a tribe of the Franks, under Clovis, invaded Gaul and defeated the Roman governor. This Clovis became the founder of the first French dynasty. At this time, however, he was only chief of a petty tribe of the Franks of Tournai, but numerous bands of Suevi, under the designation of All-men (Alemanni), threatening to pass the Rhine, the various tribes of the Franks flew to arms to oppose their passage, and, as usual, they united under their bravest chieftain, who happened at the time to be Clovis, During the battle which followed, this famous founder of the French nation vowed to worship the god of his wife Clotilda if he gained the victory. This Clotilda was a Christian and the niece of the king of the Burgundians. Clovis, her pagan husband, did gain the day, embraced Christianity according to his vow, and three thousand of his warriors followed his example.

This important conversion of the warlike pagans caused great joy among the clergy of Gaul, and from that time the Christian hierarchy began to look upon the Franks as the germ of a new empire to give to Christ the dominion. St. Avitus, bishop of Vienne. wrote to Clovis—"When thou fightest it is to us that victory is due." And St. Remigius in commenting upon his baptism said, "Sicamber, bow meekly thy head; adore what thou hast burnt, burn what thou hast adored."

In the case of the founder of the French nation we have a striking parallel with that of Constantine, the first Christian emperor. The cross gave to each empire, and they were raised up to give the Church dominion. The Roman empire had once fitted the providence of the world, but Constantine and his successors had, by removing the seat of government to Constantinople, turned the grand problem back upon the East, when destiny had designed its march upon the West. The sequel showed the dominion was ordained to pass from the emperors of the East, and the representation of the future Christendom from the hands of the successors of Constantine. But the French nation was to arise at this juncture to take the place of the Roman empire, and Charlemagne was brought up in his order in the divine drama, to consolidate a christendom which has stood till the present day. But when he came, Constantinople and Rome were divorced, and out of this division between the Popes and the eastern emperors, which we shall notice hereafter, grew the Greek and Latin churches. And thus we see, at every step, even when in the very chaos of the world, the harmonies of God's movements and the opportune comings of the great characters and revolutions of history.

In the rising of the French nation as a christian power, the unity of the church was brought down and society moulded into more modern states of civilization. The bishops of the Church, filled with the idea of that unity, sanctioned the acts of Clovis when he cut off the lines of the other petty kings of the Franks to establish the general supremacy of his own dynasty over his rising nation. Says Gregory of Tours: "He succeeded in everything, because he walked with his heart upright before God." We mark these treacheries of kings—we note these pious sophistries of priests, but we also reverently say that out of evil the Great God brings forth good to mankind—out of barbaric chaos He moulds better civilizations.

The dynasty of Clovis continued for several centuries, building up the French nation and the barbarians who overran Europe were leavened by the rude mission of Christianity, for rude it was in those fierce days. The Saxons were among the most stubborn of the Pagans, whom the French, ("the first sons of the Church") for generations, sought to subdue; but Charlemagne ultimately completed their conversion with his mighty sword. Of the great drama performed in Christendom in the sixth and seventh centuries a historian thus writes:—

"The priest, in fact, was now king. The Church had silently made her way in the midst of the tumult of barbaric invasions, which had threatened universal destruction; and strong, patient and industrious, she had so grasped the new body politic as thoroughly to interfuse herself with it. Early abandoning speculation for action, she had rejected the bold theories of Pelagianism, and adjourned the great question of human liberty. The savage conquerors of the empire required to have not liberty but submission preached to them, to induce them to bow their necks to the yoke of civilization and the Church. The Church, coming in the place of the municipal government, left the city at the approach of the barbarians, and issued forth as arbiter betwixt them and the conquered. Once beyond the walls, she took up her abode in the country. Daughter of the city, she yet perceived that the city was not all in all. She created rural bishops, extended her saving protection to all, and shielded even those she did not command with the protecting sign of the tonsure. She became one immense asylum: an asylum for the conquered, for the Romans, for the serfs of the Romans. The latter rushed by crowds into the Church, which, more than once, was obliged to close her doors upon them—there would have been none left to till the land. No less was she an asylum for the conquerors; who sought in her bosom a retreat from the disorders of barbarian life, and from their own passions and violence, from which they suffered equally with the conquered. Thus serfs rose to the priesthood, the sons of kings and dukes sank to be bishops, and great and little met in Jesus Christ. At the same time the land was diverted from profane uses by the vast endowments which were showered on the men of peace, on the poor, on the slave. What they had taken, that the barbarians gave. They found that they had conquered for the Church. So was a right destiny fulfilled."

This passage from the French historian (M. Michelet), is a graphic picture of the great remodeling of Europe, during the periods from Constantine to Charlemagne. And just here, in our historical encyclopædia, let us indulge in a thought on the "great apostacy of the Christian church" from that standard of excellence and divinity, represented in Jesus and his spiritual mission.

In opening the Latter Day dispensation, we elders of Zion have made this "great apostacy" one of our most important subjects of discourse. Upon no subject, perhaps, have we exhausted so much eloquence. We have been right; the Church did apostatize from its spirituality, and the kingdom of Heaven became very much the kingdoms of this world, even as the kingdoms of this world are, in turn, destined to become the kingdoms of our God and His Christ. In those ages there was a night of civilization. They were indeed the dark ages. Arabia, not Christendom, represented civilization then; Mohammed, not Christ, was the light of the world. Even writers who attempt to deny this yet confess it. Say the famous Chambers Brothers, in their "Information for the People:"—

"Perhaps the obligations of modern Europe to Arabia at this time have been overstated; but it is not to be denied that learning, almost totally excluded and extinct in Europe during the eighth and ninth centuries, found an asylum here. It has been a matter of dispute how the tastes of these fierce Arabians became thus first directed. They probably owed it to the Greeks: but it is certain that what they got they returned with interest. We are said to derive our present arithmetical figures from this strange people; and geometry, astronomy, and alchemy were their favorite pursuits. The graces of light literature were not neglected, as is shown by the 'One Thousand and One Nights' Entertainments,' a production of this period, which still continues to solace the hours of childhood and old age among ourselves, and attest the extent of fancy and the variety of genius of those that gave it birth. Haroun al Raschid, who flourished in the beginning of the ninth century, is celebrated as a second Augustus. He was contemporary with Charlemagne, and communications of a friendly nature are said to have passed between them."

Thus we see not only an apostasy in Christianity, but also a departure from the comparatively high state of civilization, represented in the polished Greek and the imperial Roman. From Europe civilization fled to take refuge in Arabia, and not until the rise of the new Western empire from Charlemagne, did Europe begin again to take lead in the world's destiny. After him came the Saxon Alfred, and then England, as well as France, Italy and Germany, bounded into the new phases of civilization. But, while we note these ages of apostasy and night, let us philosophically consider the pit of races from which Christendom has been taken, and we shall find that those who to-day represent the Christian nations, have not gone back, but have advanced—not apostatized but have rather put on the beautiful garments of civilized man. Historical examples are better than theological views. Let our readers call to mind the play of Ingomar and his tribe of barbarians, which they have seen represented on the Salt Lake City stage. They were the Alemanni, a type of the people who overran Europe, breaking up the Roman empire. Now, let it be remembered, that from such races and out of such barbaric states, as the play of Ingomar presents, civilized Europe and America of to-day have sprung. Is it not wonderful that, from such a wilderness of humanity, Christianity has built up nationalities rivaling those of Greece and Rome—erecting a glorious fabric of civilization that culminates all which have gone before? A new world has been literally created out of the barbaric chaos of Europe that succeeded the fall of the Roman empire. Has not Christ then performed well his work of empire-founding, from our barbarian forefathers, who almost, to the very days of Charlemagne, emperor of the Franks, much resembled our American Indians? His work has always been "a marvellous work and a wonder" and now when his national superstructures are built up he has given a new dispensation through Joseph Smith to prepare the way for the establishment of Zion in all the earth! But first, like as our Apostles, High Priests and Seventies in Utah have gone into the adobie yards and kanyons to build up this Zion, so the Church of old went into the adobie yards of the human race to build up Christendom. All things considered is not the work passably fair?

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

GREECE.

Greek historians in the compilation of the traditions of their progenitors, have pretty well succeeded in impressing upon the world, as facts, the conceptions of their own fervid imaginations. To establish Greece as the "hub" of the universe, and her leading men as the heroes of the world, appears to have been the chief aim of the older Greek historians.

LYCURGUS AND HIS LAWS.

Whom they have endeavored to immortalize as the great law-giver of Sparta, is a very mythical personage. Some historians contend that he was contemporary with "Iphitus, the King of the Elis," who is supposed to have established the Olympic games," as early as six hundred and sixty years before Christ. Other historians assert that he was contemporary with Homer. Another rises up and says that there were two personages of that name—ages intervening between the birth and death of the one and the other. Even the parentage of one or both of them is a matter of contest. All admit that no record was ever made of his laws until five hundred years after they were ordained—oral tradition being the only method of transmission in use in those early days.

Troubadors, minstrels and poets, were the first compilers of tradition in every land. What would the world have ever known of Troy and her sad history, had it not been for Homer and his Iliad. The ideal world is the home of the facts. How often has the artful minstrel fed the vanity of a powerful chief by making, in his song, a hero of some chuckleheaded progenitor, whose only excellence, perhaps, was founded upon an irresistible self-will, with brute force enough to make it effective, by moving everything upon the principles of Dutch navigation—"main strength and awkwardness."

The fertility of the Greek mind is finely illustrated in Xenophon's biography of Cyrus, the Persian hero. Rasselas was not more successful in his discovery of the happy valley than was Xenophon in his conceptions of a perfect man. Who, that has once witnessed the growth of a rumor in its journey from Salt Lake City to Ogden, would place implicit faith in the compilation of oral traditions that had been handed down from father to son, or from mother to daughter, for over five hundred years?

A man named Lycurgus, or a genius of his order with some other name, undoubtedly once flourished in Sparta. He was unquestionably a man far in advance of the age in which he lived; great in mental endowments, and gifted with a masterful spirit. One who left the impress of his genius on society, through a rude social code that was well suited to the needs of a rude and warlike people. But who is so simple as to believe that the laws forming the social code of Sparta at the time when authentic history began to be recorded, were the laws ordained by Lycurgus five hundred years before, and handed down by oral tradition intact? How much more reasonable to suppose that the prevailing social code of Sparta at the time when authentic history records and immortalizes them, was the result of the experience of ages; and that the old code had been vamped, revamped and changed, to meet new circumstances in later times; that the laws of Sparta at the date of authentic history were ordained by the Spartans of that age, and based only on the rude customs and habits of their progenitors. The fact is, the social code of Sparta in force at the time Greek historians recorded them, was an established reflex of the character, the manners and customs of the Spartans of that age.

Now, let us examine into the character of that famous code, and see if we can determine as to the extent to which the Spartans had advanced in the refinements of civilized life.

A vigorous young Spartan in search of a wife seized upon the damsel of his choice by night, and carried her off with violence. His interviews with her for months after this rude introduction were conducted with the utmost secrecy. Cunning and stealth characterized all their intercourse, until the wife was near her confinement. Should the wife at any time prefer the secret embraces of a favorite lover, the husband was subject to ridicule if he made a fuss about it. Upon the birth of a child it was immediately taken from the arms of its mother and carried before the judges and wiseacres of the tribe for examination. If it was strong, healthful and endowed with symmetry of form, it was preserved and adopted by the tribe, but if it proved to be a weakly specimen of humanity it was thrown into a deep pit as worthless carrion—it was deemed unfit to live. Girls were left to the care of their mothers. The boys were entrusted to maternal control for the first few years of their life, after which they ate at the public tables, and lived in the society of the men, almost exclusively. To prevent the men becoming too much attached to home and its pleasures, and to place a barrier to the increase of the influence of the wife, it was ordained that the men should eat at public tables, and at night retire to their homes without lights. King Agis upon his return from one of his warlike expeditions, upon which he was eminently successful, had a desire to dine in company with his wife at home, and besought the "Polemarchs," or masters of the public tables, for the privilege of doing so, and was refused. The highest excellence in a youth was to be able to steal without discovery, and to hide successfully. That no young damsel should ever be able by the character of her dress to hide any personal defect or deformity, it was required of them that they should attend the public amusements from time to time in a state of perfect nudity, and dance before the public; that the youths, their future husbands, might be able to judge of their comparative excellence of form, and athletic proportions. The art of padding was evidently not developed in those days.

The checks upon the intercourse of the sexes were so few, that a renowned Spartan warrior, when questioned by a serious inquirer, declared it to be impossible to commit adultery in Sparta,—there were no laws defining what adultery consisted of. The slave market of Sparta was always kept well supplied by captives taken in their warlike expeditions.

No Spartan ever toiled with his hands—labor was degrading. The products of the labor of their women and slaves supported them. Men of Spartan blood were trained to endure the fatigues and hardships of war by a frugal diet and athletic sports. A dogged resolution, and a total absence of the sense of fear, were considered to be the noblest characteristics in a man born to be a soldier. To turn one's back upon enemies, however numerous, was not permitted by the Spartan military law. A man must die in his tracks—with his face to his enemy, rather than yield or run away.

The power of their kings was merely nominal, the Senate shared in all the powers of government, and both king and parliament were held in check by the "Ephori" anindividual elected by the suffrage of the people. Every man of Spartan blood was a freeman.

The Spartan civil polity, as well as that of all the estate of Greece, was essentially democratic in character. Rude and undeveloped as it was, it was the first step in advance toward the dethronement of kings, who ruled by divine right without the will of the governed. To go over the whole ground of Grecian history is not our purpose. Nor is it necessary to do so to carry out our design in showing "How the world has grown." Sparta was the chief for a time of the many petty governments that divided and segregated the Grecian nationality, and prevented her from conquering the world, and leaving her impress, in indelible characters upon its future history.

Progress is written by the Divine hand on the front of the history of the human race. As soon as old nationalities settle down, become fixed, and run in grooves, younger and more vigorous nationalities spring up, overturn the old and engraft upon their roots new and more advanced forms of political and social life.

Thus has it ever been and thus must it ever be until "that which is perfect has come," and the world, not as nationalities, but as a whole, shall move onward and upward through unending ages.

The Drama.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE.

MACBETH MEDIUMISTIC.

Pass now to the type and character of Macbeth, and see the essence and theme of this epic drama unfolded in his action and person. He is born of the subject, and is not the parent to it. He is the chief instrument in the hands of the superhuman powers. He is a medium—a clairvoyant in his metaphysics; and from the time that he makes his entree to the close of his action, he is under the influence, and a son of supernatural solicitude. The potent managers of the play bring him on by their charms.

[Enter Macbeth and Banquo.]

Macb.—So foul and fair a day I have not seen.
Banq.—How far is't call'd to Forres?—What are these,
So wither'd and so wild in their attire;
That look not like the inhabitants o' the earth,
And yet are on't?

Then follow the predictions of the witches concerning Macbeth's advancement:

1 Witch.—All hail, Macbeth! all hail to thee, thane of Glamis!
2 Witch.—All hail, Macbeth, hail to thee, thane of Cawdor!
3 Witch.—All hail, Macbeth, that shall be king hereafter.

It is temptation, not ambition.

Banq.—Good sir, why do you start, and seem to fear
Things that do sound so fair?

Macbeth did not fear to be ambitious; did not fear to challenge immortal powers; did not fear to call them "black and midnight hags;" but he feared himself—feared the whirlpool of temptation into which he was hurled, like the archangel cast down from heaven upon the burning lake, lost and confounded by the fall; feared the direful warfare of the mighty elements of good and evil opening now their storm upon his soul. A moment, and the fiend need stay no longer to pursue their theme. Temptation has the mastery. More eager than they is he to open the matter farther.

Macb.—Stay, you imperfect speakers; tell me more.

Follow the subtle working of temptation in the mind of our hero.

Macb.—Your children shall be kings.
Banq.—You shall be king.

Then the arrival of the king's messengers, who hail Macbeth "thane of Cawdor."

Banq.—What, can the devil speak true?

But in Macbeth it has not this direct working; it takes the subtler method of doubt to reach the ecstasy of conviction. Banquo doubts not the strange greeting from the king, but is directly on his guard with, "What, can the devil speak true?"

Macbeth challenges the truth, to be more fully convinced.

The thane of Cawdor lives? Why do you dress me in borrow'd robes?

The fact confirmed by circumstance, the theme of temptation continues.

Mach.—Glamis, and thane of Cawdor!
The greatest is behind. * * *
Do you not hope your children shall be kings,
When those that gave the thane of Cawdor to me,
Promised no less to them?

See how much better Banquo understood the subject than did Dr. Johnson:

Banq.—That, trusted home,
Might yet, enkindle you unto the crown,
Besides the thane of Cawdor. But 'tis strange:
And oftentimes, to win us to our harm,
The instruments of darkness tell us truths;
Win us with honest trifles, to betray us
In deepest consequence.

Is this a commentary on ambition or on the great subject of human temptation? It is Shakspeare that thus interprets himself. He knew his theme. Out of this subject our immortal poet has worked more sermons for the pulpit than from any other of his plays, not excepting Hamlet. It also gave him the opportunity for some of his finest metaphysical touches, and in no play have we nobler passages than in that of Macbeth. He is more of the divine and moralist even than the dreamy, philosophical Dane, for he has more of the subject to be illustrated in his life. He holds their best argument—the warfare of the good and the evil—the great play of man's soul passing through the fire of life's temptation. Here is a fine characteristic passage, which we beg to quote, to follow our dramatic master's great moral strain:

Mach.— Two truths are told,
As happy prologues to the swelling act
Of the imperial theme. * * * *
This supernatural soliciting
Can not be ill; can not be good;—if ill
Why hath it given me earnest of success,
Commencing in a truth? I am thane of Cawdor:
If good, why do I yield to that suggestion
Whose horrid image doth unfix my hair,
And make my seated heart knock at my ribs,
Against the use of nature? Present fears
Are less than horrible imaginings;
My thought, whose murder yet is but fantastical,
Shakes so my single state of man, that function
Is smothered in surmise; and nothing is
But what is not.

Here is murder already conceived, and the ecstasy of fear, that makes his "seated heart knock at his ribs against the use of nature," is the fear lest Macbeth will vanquish Macbeth and lose his own soul in his victory.

Music.

MADAME ALBONI.

When Madame Alboni was in Berlin, the director of the theater "Della Scala," in Mailand, resolved to engage her for a week or two. He accordingly set out post-haste for Berlin. In a village near Innsbruck, some part of the carriage was broken, and our "Impressario" was obliged, much against his will, to halt. In a very ill humor, he set out for a promenade through the village, while the smith was repairing the coach. Sauntering listlessly along, he suddenly heard singing—and such singing! Never had he heard so sweet, so clear, so heavenly a voice. For a while transfixed with astonishment, he at length approached the house, and soon found himself in the presence of the songstress. She was a handsome Tyrolese maiden of uncommon grace and dignity, and was entertaining three children who were intently listening to her.

He apologised for his intrusion, and begged to know if the Fraulein understood music, or if what he had just heard was mere natural talent. She replied that she understood music. The director immediately drew from his pocket some sheets of "La fille du Regiment," which he chanced to have with him, and requested her to sing a few passages.

The Tyrolienne smiled and complied, with as much good nature as talent and ability. The director was enraptured.

"Mademoiselle!" he exclaimed, "I was on my way to Berlin to make an engagement with Mme. Alboni, the great European celebrity; but I have found you, and I will go no farther. Alboni could suit me no better than you do. I offer you two thousand francs per night, and engage you for twelve representations."

"And how much had you offered Mademoiselle Alboni?"

"Madame Alboni! Oh, that is different; I should have given her at least five thousand francs. But Mademoiselle, bethink you, she has an unrivaled name and fame, while you are yet wholly unknown."

"Yet you told me a moment ago that Mme. Alboni could suit you no better than I. I am then entitled to the same salary that you intended for her."

"That is impossible, Mademoiselle. Will you accept three thousand francs?"

"No."

"Four thousand?"

"No."

"Then, Mademoiselle, adieu. I can give no more; for as you are entirely unknown, I risk everything—you nothing. You might make your fortune and that of your family. You refuse to do so. Adieu."

The director reached Berlin and inquired for Madame Alboni. He was told that she was still in the country, where she had been spending the summer with her foster-sister.

"Where?"

"In Tyrol."

"In Tyrol! At what place?"

"In N——, two hours' ride from Innsbruck."

"I am ruined?"

Returning, he sought his peasant maiden. "Madame!" he cried, "you are no longer unknown. You have played me a fine trick!"

"I! Listen, Monsieur director; you now know me; but as you were this morning so unwise as to resign me for the peasant maiden, I now decline entering into any engagement with you."

The director was in despair. He fell at her feet, but Alboni did not relent until after the most earnest solicitation and the promise of six thousand francs per night.

She accompanied him to Mailand, and after two weeks' labor, the children of her foster-sister received from her a gift of twelve thousand francs.

BENEVOLENT HUMBUGS.

ODDITIES AND HUMBUGS OF LIFE.—NO. 3.

THE BODGERS FAMILY.

With a "bird's eye view" we have scanned some of the public characters and institutions of society, and found them distressingly anxious in some form or other, to be offered up for public good. In confirmation of this view—so cheering to philanthropists generally—Quiz hastens to present a few personal illustrations. The classes he wishes now to present are, however, those who exert their benevolent propensities, not so much in the meeting of "public wants," as in yielding to the irrepressible tendency of their natures to hunt up worthy objects for their distinguished patronage and care, whom it is the special business of their lives to "bring out;" alongside of which delightful peculiarity, they generally possess a fertile genius, the strength of which is generally devoted to the search for objects on which to use the unemployed labor and talent they find wasting around them. This they persist in doing regardless of the loss they must personally sustain in the neglect of their own more precious abilities. They sweetly pass along, simply devoted to the "bringing out" of other people. What if they generally discover that the best way to develop talent is to employ it on some trifling necessities of their own? It is simply an illustration of the profusion with which excellencies are crowded into some natures. They possess in graceful union the qualities requisite for developing talent and wisely using it at the same time! For the first illustration of these beneficent specimens of humanity, as in the case of the meeters of "great public wants"—Quiz goes back to his earliest impressions.

He remembers in those distant times, among other abilities—which it is, of course, entirely unnecessary for him to say he possessed in immense variety—the possession of a highly finished taste in carpentery. It may be as well to add here—as the rage for building in these parts is strong—that he don't like the "taste" now, so no one need call on him on that account! But, he remembers when the taste was strong on him, that on sundry occasions and under the impression that he was adding to the splendor of the universe generally, he produced in a style, the beauty of which it is utterly useless for him to attempt to describe, a variety of highly useful articles. Particularly does he remember producing in unimaginable perfection a rain water-butt lid, a stool with three legs and a rolling-pin of unheard-of dimensions. He also remembers, about the same time, rearing in strict architectural proportions, four posts in miscellaneous positions, and then covering the spaces between them with laths placed cross-ways, in a diamond form; the whole being intended to convey to the mind of the spectator the idea of a summer-house of sumptuously beautiful proportion and illimitable decoration.

As might be naturally supposed—in fact precisely as Quiz supposed—the fame of so much genius spread in various directions. So many were the eulogies that were visited on his wonderful ingenuity, that he found it necessary, to seriously contemplate on what terms, when he grew up, the world at large might expect to have the benefit of so much skill and ability.

Doctor David Bodgers was at that time among his admirers. He had a sweet way of sitting down by Quiz's side and patting his head, and saying he was a very smart boy indeed, only he ought to practice further! He would like to see a boy of his abilities try something on a larger scale. He had a garden that he would let him operate upon—and charge him nothing! He might come when he liked; and then he could see his (Bodgers') trees and his books. He had a "splendid new plane" too, he would let him use! (think of that), and he wanted badly to give him a glass of ginger beer.

Invited to so much glory, he went enthusiastically, of course, and found the small job for which he was to receive two pennyworth of beer, a trifling item of about three weeks duration—merely the lining of all Bodgers' garden walks with various-sized strips of wood, designed—to the ignorant and unenlightened mind—to represent borders of various formations. Quiz remembers well how he accomplished this job, how he was sick of it long before he was through—how he wanted to give it up and couldn't—Bodgers kept praising him so much, how he received his glass of ginger beer, and how he left at last, overwhelmed with glory, of course, and the conviction that he was—"sold;" and how he ever after treasured up Doctor David Bodgers in his heart of hearts as humbug No. 1.

The above affecting circumstances were not Quiz's last experience with Dr. Bodgers. He has a painfully clear recollection of a vast number of small jobs into which he was decoyed by the same worthy. Whenever in later years Bodgers grew conversational, or closely confidential, or requested him to help himself to a peppermint drop from one of his glasses, he knew what was coming. As sure as death, if he accepted the peppermint drop, was he "gone under," and could no more refuse Bodgers anything after that, than if Bodgers and interesting family had all died on his account. Hence, when he saw a sweet smile on Bodgers' face, and heard him begin, "my dear boy, I'm sure you must be tired. Do come into my study and sit down," a faintness of spirit always came over him. And furthermore, when Bodgers, with a delicate allusion to his superior judgment, put a pencil into his hand, and asked him to give a mere sketch—any thing would do—of the best possible form for a new room over Bodgers' study—to be approached in some frightfully unnatural manner—through a coal cellar and over a larder, and under a passage—a clean whole day's work at least, like a lamb he went to the slaughter—but unlike a lamb—he vowed to write the natural history of all the Bodgerses before he died. Strong as is his wish to fulfill this singularly pious determination at this present moment, this brief illustration of the Bodger family must suffice for the present. They will be easily recognized when we say that cheap benevolence, in fact—"peppermint-drop benevolence"—is their motto! Getting work for nothing—thoughts for nothing, ideas for nothing, and doing it all, as men that confer a favor, is their specialty. Behold them in their benevolence? They stand ready at a moment's warning to employ all the unused labor or ability of the world in their service, without troubling the owners thereof with the smallest consideration in the way of pay. And mark you, this special beauty of the Bodgers family—you shall never work for them in the least degree, unpaid as of course you will be—but they will convince you that you are most specially and mightily ministering to your own glory and happiness thereby.

ORIGIN OF "BOGUS."—In the year 1837 there appeared in the Western and South-Western States a person calling himself Borghese—pronounced Borgus or Bogus—who drew large numbers of fictitious cheques, notes and bills of exchange upon the principal bankers and traders, and succeeded in swindling the public out of large sums. His operations were so extensive, and the distrust caused in all commercial circles were so great when his forgeries were discovered, that it became a common phrase in the South-West, and from thence spread over the whole Union, to describe any doubtful commercial paper or forged note as bogus. The word took and was speedily applied to distinguish anything of doubtful origin.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE FOSTER-BROTHER SELLS HIS SOUL.

It was three weeks after the interview related in the last chapter, between Farinelli and Judah Nathans. By this time, the singer had become nearly convalescent; but he had not yet left his room. His recovery had not been so rapid as the mentor had at first expected, for the excited state of his mind and his intense musical studies to place himself on an equality with Terese, had much undermined his vigorous constitution, and his wounds brought a re-action. But it was in the course beneficial, for his very sickness repaired his wasted nature, now the fires which had consumed him had gone out and hope had awakened in his heart.

Terese had received a letter from Sir Walter Templar. The intelligence which it brought was as yet unknown to her family. She had gone to visit Spontini. Her love was a matter upon which she had maintained some reserve with her grandfather, because of the uncertainty of the issue of Walter's communications with his family. But, on the receipt of her letter, she had asked permission to spend the day with Spontini. Her grandfather had also been reserved upon the important subject of her alliance with our hero, because he had formed hopes not in accordance with those of his granddaughter. A long consultation had been held between Isaac Ben Ammon and his nephew Judah, after which the latter sought Farinelli.

"My friend," said Judah, as he entered the chamber of the foster-brother, "I have a little matter to arrange with you before my departure for England in the morning."

"Go you to England, Signor Nathans?"

"I do."

"On what business?"

"Partly on my own, partly on the concerns of my niece. She has received this morning a letter from Sir Walter Templar."

"If he designs to make her his wife, then, as I have repeatedly so said, I will not stand in the way of my foster-sister's happiness."

"My dear Farinelli, I have told you that my uncle Isaac never will consent for his grandchild to wed a Christian nobleman and lose in her the caste of his race."

"Never, Judah, never!" observed the venerable Hebrew, who entered at that moment, and heard the last remark of his nephew.

"Never must the descendants of Isaac Ben Ammon be outcast from the God and religion of his forefathers. That would be the curse fallen upon Israel again. It would send my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave."

"Oh, then, where do I stand!" exclaimed Farinelli in despair.

"My son, become a Jew," replied the old man.

"A Jew!" said Farinelli with a start.

"Yes, my son, adopt the religion of the Hebrews. Jehovah is the true God,—the seed of Abraham, the children of the covenant: Moses is the Great Lawgiver, not the Nazarine. The Prophet of the Christians was not the Messiah of Israel. He was not the Shiloh in whose hands was the scepter of Judah. He reigned not upon the throne of David. The Messiah has yet to come to redeem Israel."

"I am sorely tried!" said the singer.

"My good Farinelli, you told me that you would give your soul for my niece."

"True."

"You are asked but to change the form of your religion. A trifle, a trifle, my dear Farinelli," said the sceptic.

"Judah! Treat not thus lightly the subject," observed Isaac Ben Ammon.

"In whom is your religion embodied, my good Farinelli?" continued Judah, not noticing his uncle's remonstrance.

"Too well you know, Signor Nathans!"

"But answer, my friend, direct."

One word answered it. A single name confessed the idolatry! "Terese!"

"It is well. Sir Walter Templar cannot bow to the necessity. You do," said the philosophic Judah.

"Embrace the religion of the Hebrews," added Isaac Ben Ammon, "and my granddaughter shall be your wife. Your children will then be brought up in the Hebrew faith. My race will not then die out of the congregation of Israel."

"Terese!" again responded the foster-brother, as though he would blot out all names with hers. To his imagination, he had, in the response, given his soul for her he loved with such idolatry. What more could a devoted Catholic than to consent to become a Jew?

"My son," said Isaac Ben Ammon, "as the husband of my Rachel's child, you will share with her my vast wealth."

"Right, uncle," observed Judah, "Justice is the best policy, as truth is the highest wisdom. He has loved Rachel's child longest and best, for he gives his soul for her."

"Nay, Judah, he but turns his face to the God of Abraham."

"It is the same to him, Uncle. But our conditions are met. And now let me inform you, my good Farinelli, that I go immediately to England. My uncle, Reuben Nathans is dead, and I am his heir. This, my uncle Isaac has told me. He has left to me half a million of English money. Rachel's child is my heiress. We are not ungrateful, Farinelli. Sir Walter Templar must now learn the will of my family!" This he said with a haughty spirit which would have matched even that of Sir Walter Templar himself.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

SIR RICHARD COURTNEY AND HIS FAMILY.

Sir Richard Courtney, who, with his dying friend De Lacy, opened our story, must be again introduced to our readers. Sir Richard, this afternoon, is surrounded by his entire family, for Walter Templar and Frederick De Lacy are at Courtney House once more. Walter had, this day, received letters from Italy informing him of the discovery of Terese's grandfather and her uncle Judah. The second letter, dated three days after the first, brought the news that her uncle had departed from Italy for England with the intention of calling upon Walter's family. This intelligence had been communicated by Spontini, who wrote in behalf of his beloved pupil. Reference was made to the epistle received the day before the departure of Judah, bearing the first assurance of hopes from Walter, which had been hastily dispatched on his arrival in England. Spontini said that he had himself related to the grandfather and uncle the story of the association and love of our hero and heroine, but that he could not fully understand their views upon the subject. He thought, however, that their reticence was in consequence of the uncertainty touching the views of Sir Walter's family; and as he was answered by the grandfather that Judah intended to communicate personally with the Courtney family upon the matter, he had not pressed for further explanation. The uncle, therefore, Spontini said, might be expected to call at Courtney House, at any moment after the receipt of this news. Accompanying the letters of the illustrious composer, was one of a more personal and tender character from Terese herself. It was upon the subject of these letters that Sir Richard Courtney and his family were in consultation this afternoon; and as we have found them together, we will describe to our readers that family scene and the circumstances of the case in which we hope they are as intensely interested as ourselves.

It is now twenty years since we first introduced Sir Richard Courtney at the bedside of his dying friend, Lord Frederick De Lacy. The baronet is about fifty years of age; and is a type of the "Fine old English Gentleman of the Olden times." His appearance was very stately; and more so this afternoon from the benignant gravity of his countenance.

Sir Walter Templar, on his arrival at Courtney House, had, as soon as propriety would permit, assembled his relatives together in family council, much as we find them this afternoon. He then related to them the entire history of his associations with Terese; and, finally the confession of their mutual love. That afternoon presented a very similar scene and was very much in harmony in its circumstances with that on which we have taken the opportunity of again introducing Sir Richard Courtney and his family. While relating the story of himself and our heroine, and dwelling upon the betrothal of himself and cousin, Walter Templar felt as in a solemn family council of his race, with Eleanor his betrothed present. He protested against nothing, he amend all which his family had done. He simply brought in a new fact. It was the mutual love of Terese and himself. There is a logic of feelings, and the logic of facts; and the logic of feelings ruled Sir Richard's family. Walter won all by his simple conscientiousness and strict honor, which laid the whole case at the feet of his betrothed and her father. They decided not against, but for him and his love.

What had, on the occasion of the first family council, upon the important matter of the love of Terese and Walter versus the betrothal of Walter and Eleanor, made the case so clearly acceptable was the fact that Walter had from the first concealed nothing of the history of his associations with Terese, excepting the sequel of his love which he had hastened from Italy to lay before them. In that non-concealment, his family were committed to the whole.

Sir Richard Courtney, after the death of his young wife and dear friend, Lord Frederick De Lacy, lived the life of a recluse, though not a misanthrope. He was of a poetic mind; he delighted in books and loved the classical dreams of kindred souls. He was pre-eminently an idealist, though by no means an impractical man, which is too generally made identical with the type—idealist. Sir Richard was, by nature, a statesman, but possessing a noble name and fortune, and being highly conscientious, the circumstances of his life had made him a classical dreamer, rather than a politician. But he was not a dried-up book worm—the dreamer expresses his type. He possessed an embalmed youth—embalmed by love and friendship—embalmed by the very death of his wife and friend, in the rosy days of his manhood. He had in consequence of his dreaming, been as blind as Walter and Terese to the real state of their case, until the afternoon when his nephew laid it before his family with a new light. The boylike episode of making a protegé of a gifted orphan Hebrew child, Sir Richard deemed a beautiful romance that touched his own poetic nature, and brought back his own youth when he and his friend, in their tour in Italy, were just as likely as his nephew and his friend's son to have embodied in their lives just such an incident. And then the romance was shared between him and young De Lacy, with Spontini, a prince of art, as the guardian of the gifted child of art.

Lady Templar, who is the next personage to be considered in the scene, was very much like her brother and like him. Also she was married only to the partner of her early love. Since the death of Walter's father, Sir Edmund Templar.

She has shared with his uncle Courtney in all the duties and associations of his life—shared in parental love and guardianship to the offspring of the Courtneys, the Templars, and the De Lacys that nestled in her ancestral home. With these dear links of association to wed her to the recluse life of her brother—a lover of the beautiful, a votary of literature, the tutoress of the artistic instincts of his cousin Eleanor, she had looked upon her son's association with art and genius in Italy—the modern cradle of art—much in the same light as his uncle.

Eleanor Courtney is the next personage in the scene which must command our attention. She was tall and queenly-looking. Her person was of the Norman, not the Saxon type. Her nose was prominent, but finely chiseled, indicating strength and intellect. We name this mark of her face, because it was that which first struck the attention of an observer on an introduction to her, but as you looked into her face for an examination, you saw a clear, noble countenance altogether and a lofty brow, moulded as for a diadem. It was clearly the imperial face; and you was struck not so much by the conception of beauty as you gazed upon her, as of pure, exalted character. She was a woman to be loved—to be worshipped; but you would not have found a crowd of butterflies in her train. She would have been insensible to their butterfly adorations; and, indeed, utterly unconscious thereof, unless brought to her sense in the offensive form. She was therefore altogether the reverse of the coquette, and in nothing that a vain and selfish woman takes delight in, did ever Eleanor Courtney take ought of delight. Yet she was not cold and passionless in her nature, much less heartless. A woman without heart—a woman without deep or tender sensibilities, is more utterly selfish than a man of the same character; but all that a lofty and a supremely unselfish woman could be, was Eleanor Courtney. Yet she possessed not so much the tender sensibilities as the deep and forceful. Like her father and cousin Walter, she was the embodiment of intensity, though exquisite, in her intellectual nature being of the pure poetic type; but there was more of the lofty character and inspiration of a psalmist David than a rich luxuriant, though somewhat weedy Byron. It was this intensity of nature which made Eleanor Courtney the very reverse of the coquette. She did not, from her own nature, comprehend insincerity, which goes so largely into the compound of an artificial woman of the world, and also to constitute the plumaged charmer who delights in vanities and adulations from the very emptiness, not fullness of their natures. There are an imperious class of woman who in the plenitude of youthful powers glory in humbling the lords of creation to the dust at their feet, as though the humiliation of the manly sex gave to them supreme triumph; there are coquettes, because their vanity and sex are largely gratified by the flatteries and homage of the opposite sex. To neither of these classes did Eleanor Courtney belong; but, if there may be said to have been in her a tendency to either side, it was more to the imperious class. This lofty, sincere and intense nature of Eleanor had kept her to this moment not only an excellent example of what a betrothed maiden ought to have been, but also actually "fancy-free." Shakspeare's matchless eulogy would not have been inappropriate to Eleanor Courtney:

> "That very time, I saw (but thou could'st not,
> Flying between the cold moon and the earth,
> Cupid all arm'd: a certain aim he took
> At a fair vestal, throned by the west;
> And loos'd his love-shaft smartly from his bow,
> As it should pierce a hundred thousand hearts!
> But I might see young Cupid's fiery shaft
> Quench'd in the chase beams of the wat'ry moon:
> And the imperial vot'ress passed on
> In maiden meditation fancy-free."

We have been thus particular in describing Eleanor Courtney for though she has not come much personally into the action of our story, so much of its subject is controled by her, and so many of its issues directly or indirectly grow out of her Her cousin Walter, as he had designed in Italy, and, as arranged between him and Terese had first laid before Eleanor the entire case of his love without reserve and submitted it entirely into her hands. To say that the maiden listened to his tale with stoical indifference or without a startled surprise would be incorrect. But she was not pained nor angry, much less offended with her cousin Walter. She was deeply concerned both for him and Terese, while she strongly felt her own responsibility in the case.

"Walter, my brother," she said when he had told her all, "Walter, my brother," she repeated with designed emphasis, "We must immediately inform papa of this."

"But, oh! my sister, my dear considerate sister, I am unspeakably pained when I reflect what a shock my uncle Courtney's family designs will receive by the revelation which I have just made to you. My uncle and mother will feel it in its practical family bearings more than either you or I can, for, with us, it is a matter of sentiment chiefly; with them, both sentiment and family legislation, in which my dead father and the lamented De Lacy took also their part."

"Yes, brother Walter, I know it—feel it all: yet my father and your mother must be immediately informed thereof. The peace of mind of both of us demand this and the arrangements which have already been made for the double union of myself and Alice still render the explanation more imperative."

"Which I am equally as anxious as yourself, dear Eleanor, to make, this very day; but I shrink from paining my revered uncle, and, in a moment, scattering to the winds all his past and long-cherished hopes and dreams."

"Still, dear Walter, it must be done, and done this very day. I, myself, will prepare your mother. And now, brother Walter, let us end the subject between us exclusively; you go and arrange with my father for a family council and I will to your mother for the same purpose. God bless you, dear Walter, and bring to pass all that you and Terese desire. I will be your sister Eleanor and her sister also. There, now, don't look so grave and sad. You remind me too much, just now, of that gloomy ancestor of ours, Sir Godfrey Courtney, whose sad haughty look always gives me a cold shiver, when I visit the picture gallery of our race. You know the tradition that there was some dark, terrible passage in his life, which was all besides very noble and stainless."

"But is there not a resemblance, Eleanor, just now, in reality, between me and him, in my thus betraying my family?"

"Why, how now, Walter? When did you betray us. Have you sinned, then, because you did not fall in love with my poor self? Fie! fie! Walter, you must not so humble me, by the thought that you have betrayed us by your love for Terese, nor so wrong yourself. There, now, away, Walter. But, first, sir, you may kiss me as a brother should his eldest sister and counselor. That is well!" added the maiden, returning his kiss upon his brow, as his sister would have done. "And now, dear Walter, we understand each other."

"God bless and reward you, my noble Eleanor," replied Walter in a voice of deep emotion, and then he hurried from the room.

This touch upon the past will not only illustrate the character of Eleanor Courtney, but also give a view of the canceling of the betrothal, and bring us up to the afternoon on which the family sat in what we will consider their second council, caused by the arrival of letters from Italy, bringing the great news that Terese had found her grandfather and uncle, and that the letter might be expected, to call at Courtney House at any moment.

On this afternoon, in the family scene before us, we have seated near Eleanor Courtney, Frederick De Lacy, and their splendid contrast was as apparent as that which we have noted between Walter and Frederick. They looked a noble pair—a very noble pair, and a very fitting pair to mate. Any thoughtful person present, whose mind had previously been directed to the subject, could not well have helped reflecting that Frederick De Lacy and Eleanor Courtney should have been mated, and not Walter and Eleanor. If with either of the sisters, Walter should have been paired with his younger cousin, Alice Courtney, which brings us to a description of that maiden, who in that scene, that afternoon, is seated near her cousin Walter Templar.

Though she is sitting near her cousin Walter, Alice has timidly placed herself somewhat in the background. Indeed, there is apparent in her much of the timidity of the fawn. She is very unlike her imperial sister Eleanor, but much like her gentle mother who died almost as soon as Alice was born. There is much of the tone spiritual in her which would incline one to believe that, like her mother, she was not long for this world. There seems to be no strong affinity between her and Frederick De Lacy. Indeed this timid hiding near her cousin Walter rather shows that her affinity is towards him, though he is unconscious of any towards her, for Terese now engrosses all his thoughts.

Alice does not, however, experience much concern for her sister Eleanor, whom she has more than once this afternoon confessed to herself ought to have been mated with Frederick De Lacy, and not to her. As for herself, the gentle Alice feels a poor forlorn maiden, whose chief concern is about Walter and Terese, whom she hopes will love him as much as—well she does not quite word that part of the case, for just at such points she feels a fluttering in her heart and her eyes fill with tears.

Our readers must please imagine the conversations this afternoon upon the news from Italy in keeping with what has been said, and start into a new development which just now comes in with Sir Richard's servant entering and announcing—

"Mr. Judah Nathans!"

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE JEWESS AND THE CHRISTIAN MUST NOT MATE.

The announcing of Judah Nathans created quite a sensation in the family circle of Sir Richard Courtney. Walter Templar immediately arose and met his visitor, cordially extending his hand, which Judah as cordially took.

"Terese's uncle, I presume, sir?" observed Walter.

"I am, Sir Walter, the uncle of Terese, the granddaughter of Isaac Ben Ammon."

"You are welcome, Mr. Nathans. This is my uncle, Sir Richard Courtney."

"We are glad to meet you, sir," said the noble baronet, also rising and shaking hands with his visitor.

"This is my sister Lady Templar; these my daughters, Eleanor and Alice; this young gentleman, Lord Frederick De Lacy."

"Sir Richard Courtney, I am gratified in meeting a family whose character is so deserving of respect as your own."

"My dear sir, I fear you flatter us," said the baronet with a smile.

"Nay, Sir Richard, I always speak the truth."

"We cannot dispute such a point, Mr. Nathans. But pray be seated. You are timely arrived. My nephew, Sir Walter Templar, has just been reading letters from Signor Spontini, in which he informs us that his pupil has found her grandfather and uncle. His second letter, received by the same post, brought the news that you had departed from Italy on business to England, a portion of which concerned relations between my nephew Sir Walter and your niece. Your visit, therefore, Mr. Nathans is not altogether a surprise, but none the less welcome."

"I am glad this news has arrived before me, Sir Richard," observed Terese's uncle; "for it relieves me of some embarrassment."

"It will, perhaps, farther help us in our family consultation—for such I consider it—to explain to you that my nephew has informed us fully of his attachment towards your niece, and honorably laid the entire case, with its interesting circumstances, before his family, for our united ajudication."

"'Twas worthy of my own tribe," said Judah, who, sceptic though he was, had a high opinion of his race.

"And of my nephew," observed Sir Richard proudly, for he loved our hero, if possible, more than ever, notwithstanding his severe disappointment.

"Sir Walter, an alliance with you would not have dishonored a daughter of the ancient people."

Our hero bowed his acknowledgment, and Sir Richard continued; for the family case Walter very properly resigned to his uncle to conduct on his behalf, and Judah Nathans on the part of Terese.

"Sir Walter has also told us, Mr. Nathans, that your excellent niece was equally just, touching his betrothal with my daughter Eleanor, and that they parted pledged, upon the stake of their own happiness, to commit their case to the honor and justice of the family. They preferred to sacrifice themselves, rather than dishonor a sacred betrothal or sacrifice another."

At this point Eleanor Courtney blushed, but not in confusion.

"The case, therefore, Mr. Nathans, must be determined by the conscience and honor of the family, and not the interested affections of the young folks."

"I am very glad of this, Sir Richard," observed Judah.

Courtney then concluded his statement by adding:

"This recent discovery, of the grandsire and uncle of Terese Ben Ammon, has extended the subject, and brought into the council your side. You have opportunely arrived as its representative. The case is a family case, and not a personal one; both sides are now in court, and it awaits their mutual adjudication."

Sir Richard Courtney had ended. The uncle of our heroine did clearly understand how the case stood; for he perceived that the baronet, with his nice sense of propriety, had simply stated it without the slightest allusion to any foregone decision, if any such had been made. If previously to the receipt of the late news the matter had been settled by Sir Walter's family either way, it was now evidently regarded by Sir Richard as a suspended case. He had not presumed on the assumption of a decision, until the newly-found relatives had been brought into the family counseling. Judah saw, therefore, that he was expected next to represent his side, that the adjustment might be clearly mutual. The delicate consideration of the baronet pleased him.

"I presume Sir Richard Courtney and his family have resolved to honor the betrothal," observed the uncle of Terese.

"Yes, Mr. Nathans, they have thus resolved, my family never break their engagements."

"I thought so, Sir Richard."

"But they have cancelled that betrothal."

"Indeed," said Judah, for he expected it not.

"That which as a family we did, as a family we have undone. Yet, Mr. Nathans, you are not involved in that part of the case; that is simply our action, and involves you in no obligations."

"And did you, then, Sir Richard, willingly consent to this?"

"Certainly, Mr. Nathans. I own that the love of Walter for your niece broke a dream of years, but I willingly consented under the circumstances to cancel the betrothal."

"Your nobleness makes me more human, Sir Richard, for I perceive that the world 'is not all dross.'"

"I could not be less just than my nephew has been. Had he violated his betrothal, and outraged my daughter's feelings, I would never have forgiven him——"

"Father!" gently remonstrated his daughter. It was not Eleanor the betrothed, but Alice, who spoke.

"Well, well, Alice, I did not exactly mean that I would not have forgiven your cousin. But, Mr. Nathans," he continued to his visitor, "Sir Walter Templar has so long been my pride that had he dishonored his family, he must have fell in my esteem."

"And justly fell," said the man of strange contradictions of good and evil.

"And could I have taken advantage of my nephew's nobleness, I should fall from my own esteem," added Courtney.

"You are a just man, Sir Richard. I am not good, but I love justice." Judah could not allow the truth for himself to pass, without qualifying it with the assertion that he was, nevertheless, not good.

"I say, Sir Richard, you are a just man."

"And being so, or like yourself, loving justice, I have revoked the betrothal and consented to the union between my nephew and your niece. The maiden's grandsire and uncle, however, have since come into the consideration They must speak for her. You have now, sir, the phase of the case, as far as Richard Courtney is concerned."

"And Lady Templar?" queried Judah

"Has decided with her brother," she answered.

"And Eleanor Courtney?"

"Has also decided as her aunt, Walter's mother, would have done, when she bore the name of Eleanor Courtney," said the betrothed with proud satisfaction.

"Right, my dear Eleanor, your aunt would have done as you have." And Walter's mother kissed her niece fondly, as though she had been her mother.

"Mr. Nathans," here observed Sir Richard, "my daughter Eleanor was the first to resign her cousin Walter, and to insist upon his union with Terese. She has proffered to change characters at the altar, and give the bride away."

"I have solved a new problem," mused Judah, falling into one of his usual scientific reflections. "I have found a just family. Our Father Abraham would not have plead in vain had Sir Richard Courtney dwelt of old in Sodom."

"I fear, sir," said the gentle Alice, "that I should not have acted as nobly as my sister Eleanor." A tear stole down the maiden's cheek, she knew not why, a fluttering was in her tender heart, which she could not understand, but she glanced at her cousin Walter. Was love for him germinating in her heart? Cupid is very perverse. He is an unwise deity, and ever falling into trouble.

"Sir Richard Courtney," began Judah Nathans, after a few moments pause, which he had spent in deep but rapid reflections, "I am really embarrassed with this interesting case. I deemed my problem a solved one, but find it otherwise. But for the justice and generosity of your family, the case would have terminated as Terese's grandfather and myself had supposed it would. But now—to confess the truth—I am embarrassed."

"You did not expect, Mr. Nathans, that we would have consented to this union?" inquired Sir Richard, himself now somewhat puzzled, while his family showed signs of deep anxiety, for they saw that some difficulty was in the way still.

"I did not expect your consent to the union of Sir Walter with my niece," was the answer.

"And it is not satisfactory to you, sir?" said the baronet, somewhat offended, for the concession seemed to be all on his side.

"Quite the reverse, Sir Richard Courtney. I am uncommonly satisfied. It is no small matter for a proud family of the ancient nobility of England to forget their exclusive caste, and stoop to an alliance with a daughter of the despised people."

"Mr. Nathans, we shall feel honored, not disgraced by that alliance," observed Eleanor, the betrothed, with a blush. "Pardon a maiden for speaking in the case. But, as I stand in a very peculiar relation, it may not be out of place for me to say that I shall henceforth look upon Terese as a very dear sister."

Alice Courtney wept again, but hid her tears.

"Young lady," replied Judah, "you are a very noble creature. I would that all women were like you, and all men like your father."

"Sir," observed Walter Templar, at this point, with much agitation, there is some important matter which you withhold from us. Terese has not changed by the discovery of her relations? No, that is impossible. Is aught wrong with her? Speak, sir, in mercy, speak; for I forbode some ill."

"My niece is unchanged."

"And our union, you say, is satisfactory to her grandfather and yourself?"

"Sir Walter Templar, the Christian noble and the Jewess cannot mate! Religion is a barrier higher than betrothals. What can cancel its covenants? How can the Jews and the Christians marry and become one people, when they are divided both by the barriers of religion and race?"

Judah spoke with a solemn earnestness; for his heart as well as his philosophy was interested deeply.

"My God, my God, I expected not this!" exclaimed Sir Walter in anguish of soul.

"O Walter, Walter!" said Eleanor the betrothed, in a voice of powerful sympathy.

"My son, my son!" moaned Lady Templar.

"The will of God be done!" reverently added Sir Richard Courtney.

"Amen!" said the infidel, Judah Nathans, much moved by the distress

Alice Courtney was silent, but she wept afresh. A tear stole down the cheek of Frederick De Lacy, but he was also silent.

There was not a person present who did not in a moment realize what an awful barrier a cardinal division of religions, like that of the Jews and Christians, having each their peculiar covenant, and what an awful barrier a radical separation of races, enjoined by those two unreconciled covenants had suddenly come between the Christian noble and the Hebrew Maiden.

"Mr. Nathans," said Sir Richard Courtney, breaking the troubled silence which had succeeded, "I perceive that this matter has assumed a very solemn form, which till now none on the side of my family had considered."

"I hope, Sir Richard, you are not offended with me for presenting it to you."

"No, Mr. Nathans; pained—unspeakably pained, but not offended. The case is now one of conscience, of religion, of race. It is above our reach. You have spoken my own judgment, the Christian noble cannot marry the Jewess!"

"My God, my God!" again burst from the agonized heart of Walter Templar.

"Oh Walter, Walter!" again said Eleanor.

"My son my son!" again moaned Lady Templar.

Alice Courtney still wept.

Sir Richard, like all of the English nobility fifty years ago, was a High Churchman, and though he had, in his justice and generosity, sunk his caste of aristocracy, to admit a Jewess into his family, was now as much overruled by his religion as was Isaac Ben Ammon himself. This Judah readily perceived; and though he himself was not in the abstract influenced by sectarian prejudices, he was by that of race, which has so long kept his people from an alliance in marriage with the Gentiles.

"Sir Richard Courtney," he resumed, "I am myself in much a sceptic, and not governed by the antagonism of creeds. Nature made mankind one great family, but national distinctions have divided them, color marked them into tribes, though of one common species, churches separated them still more, covenants bound them, which must not be broken. I am a philosopher and sweep all this away, but a man of the world, and, therefore, accept the world as it is, for I cannot reconstruct it."

"Sir, the wisdom of experience is on your side, 'The Christian cannot marry the Jewess.'" Courtney dwelt upon that point, as though the impossibility shut out from his mind all other views.

"I grant, were I alone in question," continued Judah, "I should waive all such considerations; but there is a venerable man, who to-day is as much a son of Judah, as was David when he established his throne in Zion. That old man still dreams of the restoration of the covenant and the return of the ancient people.

"I will not bring his gray hairs with sorrow to the grave," observed Sir Walter Templar, mournfully.

"Which, Sir Walter, you would do, were you to take from him his grandchild. Terese is the last branch directly of his race. To break her off from her tribe would, to Isaac Ben Ammon's mind, sever that last branch of his loins from the House of Israel, and leave him in his offspring unnumbered with his people."

"I will not bring his gray hairs with sorrow to the grave!" repeated our hero.

"As your wife, Sir Walter, my niece would become a Christian, in more than name, and your offspring would be brought up in the Christian faith."

"I found her an orphan, and fate made her a Christian, but that is all reversed, for she has met her grandfather. She is indeed a Jewess now," mournfully replied our hero.

"Sir Richard Courtney, I will retire. This interview is painful, but I carry with me a deep reverence for your family." And Judah arose to depart.

"Mr. Nathans, I ask the favor of a visit to-morrow. I will write to Terese and release her from our pledged faith. It is hard, sir, but it is my duty."

"Right, my dear Walter," observed Sir Richard, "and may God in his Providence bring good out of evil."

Judah Nathans departed a better man than he had ever been in his life before; and the family separated, for they were all troubled by the events of that day. Walter Templar stole into the park to find solitude and vent for his thoughts; Alice Courtney sought him to comfort his wounded spirit, but Walter was not to be comforted. Alice still wept: Eleanor the betrothed retired to her chamber to pray for her afflicted cousin; the mother still moaned "My son, my son!"

WE WERE ONLY COUSINS, YOU KNOW.

Nelly and I have laughed and chaffed.
Since childhood, long ago;
Our smiles, our tears, were the same for years:
We were only cousins, you know.

I left her a boy; when I came back a man,
She was lovely, in youth's first glow;
I whispered, she blushed, but the matter was hushed:
We were only cousins, you know.

She wore on her finger one delicate ring,
It was I who placed it so;
Softly and sweetly my song she would sing;
We were only cousins, you know.

We parted, and for a few short years
I begged she would not forego
Her faithful vow; she promised in tears;
We were only cousins, you know.

I returned, but a plain ring of shining gold
Decked her tiny hand of snow,
And she laughed as I spoke of the days of old:
We were only cousins, you know.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Scheent, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says:

"The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says:

"My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony:

"For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.
New York, June 8, 1868.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES
—OF THE—
POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysteries, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

MUSICAL BONDS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal.

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly, The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly, The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly, The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on; that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leaverworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

The Saratoga "A" Spriog Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipatioo, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

MEMORY DEAR.

MUSINGS AT THE DESK.

I sit at my desk in a dream to-day—
  There's nothing to do, for business is slack—
So I think of the days that have passed away,
  And which memory kindly to me brings back.

Memory dear, memory true,
  O what a debt I owe to you!
For recalling thoughts to my fancy clear—
  Thoughts of the days I hold so dear.

How softly you bring to my mind those hours,
  When I watched the hills in the sunshine bright:
And lay on the grass, and plucked the flowers,
  That gladdened the fields with shadow and light.

Shadow and light, shadow and light!
  All of my life you have checkered with change,
Making its pathway sober and bright,
  While I trace it with fancies fantastic and strange.

Checkered with change since the day when I lay
  Dreaming, and plucking the flowers and grass;
As I listened to hear what the breeze would say—
  The soft summer breeze from the mountain pass.

Soft summer breeze, soft summer breeze!
  Sympathy sweet in your touch I feel:
Fanning my brow from the fresh green trees,
  As down from the hill-tops you silently steal.

Down from the hill-tops so hazy you come,
  Bring me perfume of blossoms so sweet;
Odors of harebells, far off from the hum,
  The bustle of men, and the dust of the street.

Thus I sit at my desk, and dream over the past,
  Nor do I repine for the years that are gone;
Though age is advancing, and pleasures fly fast,
  Sweet memory, thou canst renew them like dawn.

Memory dear, memory true,
  O what a debt I owe to you!
For bringing back, to my fancy clear,
  Thoughts of the days I hold so dear.

JANET'S EXPERIENCE.

Janet sat dreaming on the lower step of the broad, low-roofed porch, with her chin resting on one brown little hand, and a misty depth of light in her clear gray eyes—dreaming, as girls of eighteen will dream, of a future, far off and radiant, that somehow never resolves itself into the present—a to-morrow that never becomes to-day!

The old clock on the kitchen shelf had just struck four—the afternoon sunshine was showering down, in a sort of golden spray, through the low boughs of the great old cherry-tree, where the "red ox-hearts" hung like jeweled pendants, and the busy brown robins fluttered in and out, and orange-belted bees kept up a low, murmurous hum, like breakers, far out on the sea of the sunny air.

She was a rosy little lass, this heroine of ours, with round cheeks where the crimson of perfect health glowed through a veil of sunburn, and a dimpled mouth red and fragrant as a clove pink—a genuine country girl, as unconsciously graceful in all her movements as the silver-green wheat now rippling in the summer breeze. Not an orthodox beauty, but a very lovely, loveable little personage as she sat there in her brown gingham dress and ruffled white apron, with her sun-bonnet on the porch-floor beside her.

Of what was she musing? The old, old subject of every reverie—the old refrain to every song—him! For Janet Roydon was in love—or, at all events, she fancied she was, and it is wonderful how completely Fancy will sometimes assume the throne of Reality.

As she sat there smiling to herself, with drooping lashes and fleeting rose-shadows on her cheek, a firm, quick foot-step sounded on the garden path, where long sprays of spicy sweet-brier trailed, and double rows of currant-bushes hung full of ruby-sparkling fringes in the level sunbeams—Thorne Millington's step.

"Janet," he said, pleadingly, "will you walk up Crag Hill with me this afternoon? The young people of the village are all going, and you see how delightful the weather is. Come, Janet, it is so long since you walked with me!"

No—Janet wouldn't. Thorne Millington looked hurt.

"Why not?"

"I don't know that I am obliged to render a reason for every action of my life. It is too warm; besides I am tired."

Thorne looked at her with a mournful, incredulous gravity in his dark eyes.

"You would not have answered me so once, Janet."

Janet tossed her pretty little satin-smooth head until the hair-pins trembled among its braids.

"I suppose I am free to select my own mode of speech, Thorne Millington."

"Free? Yes, Janet, since you wish to be free."

Janet was silent. Apparently she was intently comparing the stripes on two blades of ribbon-grass that hung over the wooden step at her side, but Millington was not so easily repulsed. We cling with wondrous tenacity to life, and to Thorne the love that had grown up in his heart for pretty, willful Janet Roydon was something stronger and better than life.

"Why don't you say at once that you are expecting your fine city lover?" he questioned, somewhat bitterly. Janet lifted her head, blushing and indignant.

"Thorne, you are going too far. You have no right to catechise me so."

"Have I not, Janet?" he questioned in tones when the sharp pain seemed to pierce through the words.

"Certainly you have not."

"Well—I will intrude no longer. I see that your thoughts and mind are elsewhere."

He paused a moment, perhaps hoping that Janet might speak a word to detain him. But she did not; and the next moment she was alone in the yellow glow of the afternoon sunshine.

It might have been five minutes—it might have been ten—that she sat there counting ribbon grass blades, and listening to the drowsy hum of bees and insects; and then there was another click of the little wicket gate—another footstep ringing clearly on the gravel path.

(Ah! if Thorne Millington could have seen the upflushing of her cheek, the brightening sparkle of her eyes now, he would have fallen more hopelessly into the clutches of the "green-eyed monster" than he already was—and that was, to say the least of it, quite unnecessary.)

"Janet! My little wild rose! All alone?"

He was handsome, with his black, flashing eyes, and his silky rings of dark shining hair, and his white, shapely hands, as he came up to her with a caressing familiarity of voice and manner that bespoke no uncertainty as to his reception.

"Oh, Sydney, I'm so glad you happened to come this afternoon! Uncle and aunt are gone out."

"Come, that's lucky," said Mr Sydney Fairfax, establishing himself on the lower step at her feet, and possessing himself of one of her hands with a sort of easy gallantry that "told" fearfully against the respectful reverence in which Thorne Millington was wont to hold the wayward beauty.

"They are so cross," pouted Janet.

"The old Vandals!" interjected Mr Fairfax.

"Because, you know," went on Janet, "they like Thorne Millington—"

"Speaks very badly for their taste," said Fairfax. Janet laughed and colored.

"But, Sydney, it makes it very bad for me. I am very miserable, and when you are gone—"

"Don't fret, mia cara; I shall come back to claim you so soon, and then they may scold the ends of their tongues off! There; smile again, my little Queen of Hearts. I don't like to see the least shadow eclipsing the light of those eyes."

And Janet did "smile again," somehow in the glamour of his presence she forget all the questions she had meant to ask—the explanation that should have been demanded.

At length he rose up to depart.

"I have lingered too long already, Janet; but I could not bear to tell you that I am going back to New York to-morrow morning."

"To-morrow morning?"

Sydney Fairfax would have been more than mortal had he not been gratified with the unconscious flattery conveyed in Janet's paling cheek and dilated eyes! And, striving to sooth her, he almost forgot, for the time being, that he was playing a part.

It was nearly a week afterward, when aunt Thyrza Roydon—the kindest soul in the world, but a little prejudiced and opinionated withal, as your kind souls often are—brought her knitting work into the porch where Janet sat, idly pulling the honey-suckle cups apart.

"Child, what are you dreaming about?"

"Nothing!" answered the girl, a little petulantly.

"You've grown so shiftless of late! Do go up stairs and bring down your new calico; you might just as well run up the breadths as to be doing nothing!"

"I am not in a hurry for the dress, aunt!"

"Then finish altering my brown foulard."

"I don't feel like it, aunt!"

Mrs. Roydon eyed her niece keenly through her silver-rimmed spectacles.

"Janet! what on earth ails you?"

"Nothing, aunt!"

"And what's the reason Thorne Millington don't come here any more?"

"I am not Thorne Millington's keeper, Aunt Thyrza," answered Janet, with spirit.

Mrs. Roydon was about to require an explanation in full from her capricious niece, when her impending torrent of words was checked by the appearance of Uncle Matthew coming up the walk.

"I've been to the post-office," quoth Uncle Matthew, fanning himself with the wide brim of his straw-hat; "and here's a letter for Janet, with the New York post-mark. Who's it from, my girl?" as Janet caught it from his hand, reddening and paling alternately.

"It's—it's from Mr. Fairfax!"

"From Mr. Fairfax, eh?" Uncle Matthew's brows contracted gloomily. "And it's for that good-for-nothing puppy you've thrown Thorne Millington over, eh? Give me back the letter, Janet; let me return it to him. I don't like my girl to be corresponding with such as he!"

But Janet held tightly on to the precious missive.

"It's my letter, Uncle Matthew! and you must not speak so slightingly of Mr. Fairfax. I am engaged to him!"

Aunt Thyrza dropped her knitting-work. Uncle Matthew stared.

"This won't do, Janet; you must give him up! Why, what do we know of him? A mere city adventurer; while Thorne Millington—"

"I'm tired of hearing of Thorne Millington!" interrupted Janet, trying desperately to keep back the indignant tears, "and I will not give Sydney up!"

"Janet!"

"No! I will never give him up!"

"Then you must give us up, child," said the old man, gravely; "I will be obeyed."

Janet ran up to her own room, flushed and sobbing, to read her precious letter. Oh, if Sydney could but know how she was tyrannized over! and in her secret soul Janet resolved to break these bonds.

Presently she came down stairs again, with red eye sand resolutely compressed lips. Uncle Matthew and Aunt Thyrza looked up as she entered; they had evidently been talking about her in her absence.

"You are not going to answer that letter, Janet?" said her uncle; "Milo Fielding tells me that your Mr. Fairfax—"

"I will not listen to a word against him, Uncle Matthew," interposed Janet biting her lip to keep back even more rebellious words. "I shall certainly answer that letter."

"Then you are no niece of mine, Janet!"

"Janet—child—listen to reason," urged Aunt Thyrza, anxiously. But Janet would listen to nothing. She went out into the garden, and so through the rustling corn-fields to the road that led to the village post-office.

And the next morning, when Aunt Thyrza went up stairs to call Janet down to breakfast, her little white-draped room was tenantless—the bird had taken wing!

"My goodness gracious!" ejaculated Aunt Thyrza, with uplifted hands. "Matthew! Matthew! Come up stairs, quick! She's been and gone and eloped."

At the same moment Janet Roydon, in a cozy corner seat in the express train, watched the flying landscape, and wondered, with throbbing heart, what Sydney Fairfax would say to her—how he would receive her! Was it not just possible that she had done an unwise thing in thus resenting a harsh word or two from the kind old uncle who had sheltered and guarded her all her life! But the irrevocable step was taken; it was too late now to return until she returned as Sydney Fairfax's wife! Janet grew rosy beneath her brown veil as she thought of the possibility.

New York! What a very Babel of sounding uproar, of dusty tumult it seemed to our little country-bred damsel, as she emerged from the covered dépôt into the brilliant street.

"Carriage, m'm! carriage!"

"Yes," said Janet, timidly. "I want to go to No. 815 Mayduke Street."

"All right, m'm!" cried the hackman, banging the door of his vehicle upon his half-terrified "fare," and driving recklessly down the street. Janet drew a long breath, partly of apprehension, partly of relief. Yes, it was too late to go back now.

"Here you are, m'm!"

Janet started from her reverie as the John sprang from his seat and opened the door.

"Is this Mayduke street?"

"Yes, m'm—No. 815."

It was no balconied mansion of brown stone, draped with wisteria, as Mr. Fairfax had so often described his home—no wide street, glittering with stately equipages, as she had been led to suppose, but a tall red-brick house, with wide-open door, through which you caught a glimpse of bare floors and carpetless stairs, in a narrow, foul-smelling street, where children played in the gutters, and fifth-rate grocery stores displayed their wares!

She paid the hackman—an exhorbitant price, of course—and dismissed him, entering the house with a sinking heart and hesitating footstep.

A coarse-looking woman met her in the hall.

"Does Mr. Fairfax live here?" asked Janet.

"Mr. Fairfax? Are you one of his friends?" demanded the woman.

Janet colored in spite of herself, but before she could frame an appropriate answer in her confusion; the woman went on.

"Sydney Fairfax—Algernon Ryder—Fitz-Albyn Clare. Call him any name you please, they all belong to him; and a precious scoundrel he is; took up for counterfeiting only last night, and his poor wife—"

"His wife!"

"Yes. If she hadn't been down sick through his neglect and brutality I'd ha' turned her out o' doors; for my house has always been a respectable one, and not a red cent of his board have I ever seen! I knew he was a scamp, mind you, because he—"

"Stop! There must surely be some mistake!"

"If it's Sydney Fairfax you're wanting to see, there's no mistake, more's the pity. Was you wantin' to see his wife? She has been goin' out of one fit and into another ever since six o'clock this morning!"

But Janet turned away with a chill shudder at her heart. How near she had come to the brink of her own ruin! Married—and a counterfeiter at that! She remembered how confidingly she had "lent" him her little savings—only fifty odd dollars—"just for a day or two—an unexpected emergency!" But it was not for the money she cared, only—

With difficulty she repressed her tears of keen mortification in the presence of that hard-faced woman.

"No," she said, abruptly. "My business was with Mr. Fairfax, and since he's not here I will go back!"

The afternoon express was just starting when Janet, pale, weary, and jaded, entered one of the rear cars. She glanced hesitatingly along the rows of seats, there was but one empty, and the other half nearest the window was occupied by a gentleman. There was no help for it, however, and she advanced, timidly.

"Is this seat engaged, Sir?"

As the gentleman, with prompt courtesy, rose to give her the place nearest the open window, Janet started involuntarily; it was Thorne Millington!

In the same instant he recognized her.

"Janet!" His voice altered in its intonation from the first accent of eager interest to a cold, unimpassioned tone, such as he might have addressed to any stranger who had casually crossed his path. It cut Janet to the heart.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Roydon," he said, ceremoniously, lifting his hat. "I will find another seat."

He was turning away when Janet laid her hand tremulously on his arm.

"Please, Thorne, don't go away from me, she faltered. "I am so lonely, and—and—"

Her voice died away into a faint fluttering sort of sob. Thorne Millington turned back again with a strange, but unpleasant tumult at his heart. Somehow, the words seemed to bear a sweet significance far beyond their ordinary import.

"Janet, you know I never should have gone away from you if you yourself had not banished me. But tell me how it happens that you are here and alone."

And Janet told him. All pride, all resentment, all stubborn secretiveness, had died out of her poor wounded heart; and the strength and shelter of Thorne Millington's manly presence seemed the sweetest of all refuges.

He made no comment whatever on her story. There was, in his nature, that loyal instinct of chivalrous nobleness that led him scrupulously to abstain from the very semblance of triumphing over a fallen foe. But when, at length, she concluded by once more exclaiming, "Oh, I am so glad you are here, Thorne!" he said, "Do you really mean it Janet?"

"Oh, Thorne, I do! I do!"

"I will not leave you again, Janet," he said, tenderly, taking her cold hand in his own. "I will stay by your side all my life long now."

And Janet's up-lifted eyes, heavy and dewy, yet full of a sweet wistful light, spoke the ample measure of her repentant gratitude.

Aunt Thyrza and Uncle Matthew received their little truant back again to their hearts without a single word of reproach. A hurried sentence or two of explanation whispered to them by Thorne anticipated all unpleasant question-asking; and Janet's shy, tender manner, was a quite sufficient guarantee of her penitence for the one foolish step of her eighteen-year-old life.

"She's nothing but a child," said good Uncle Matthew Roydon.

"She was a child," said Aunt Thyrza, softly, wiping her spectacle glasses, "but she's a woman now."

And when the frosts of early October turned the upland woods to crimson and russet-brown, and strewed all the glen-paths with pavements of rustling gold, she married Thorne Millington—as loving and true-hearted a little bride as ever wore the coronal of silver-bright orange-blossoms sacred to brides alone.

A BUNCH OF DAISIES.

On a fresh and smiling May morning in the year 1840 the gate of the Château de Breuil was opened for the exit of a postchaise ready to start for Paris.

Ernest de Merieux was taking a turn in the park with his aunt, the Countess de Breuil, the proprietress of the château, before he pursued his journey. The conversation seemed very animated, especially on the part of the good dowager, to whom her nephew listened with the air of one resigned to hear all that she chose to say, but at the same time resolved to take his own way.

"Yes, my handsome nephew," said the countess, "you are, in three letters, mad; and if these three letters are a little less affronting than the four which spell 'fool,' they are nearly as disagreeable."

"But my dear aunt," said Ernest.

"This has nothing to do with your dear aunt," interrupted the countess; "there you stand, eight-and-twenty years old, with a very passable figure, tolerably good manners, wit enough for a man of family; and, to crown all, a very pretty income, which my will will not decrease. And what use do you make of all these advantages, may I ask you?"

"And what use do you wish me to make of them?" he asked,—"that I should become Procureur du Roi, or sous-Préfet?"

"A jest is not an answer," she replied. "What I wish to say, Ernest, is, that it is time for you to become useful to yourself and to others; that you ought to marry, and have children, of whom you should make honest people; and as the world is going on at present, if you succeed, they will be sufficiently remarkable characters in these times."

"Well, I do not ask for a better fate," said Ernest; "but you know me. I have the misfortune to be romantic. I was always that way inclined, and from trying to conceal my malady it has increased upon me; and romance has been so often packed off by marriage, that I think that they have quarreled outright. I confess that I could not bring myself to consent to a marriage of fashion and convenience, and where neither feelings nor characters are considered, to say nothing of those sympathies which draw two hearts together on their first meeting with each other."

"Ah, that is where we are!" said his aunt. "Sympathies—magnetic affinities—two souls who spend their lives in running after each other, and who, by dint of running, at last catch each other. Ernest, Ernest, in what blue volumes have you found these absurdities? Believe in my experience of life, and give up the pursuit of this lady of your day-dreams—this fair ideal, who possesses but one fault, or one merit, whichever you choose to call it,—that of never having existed."

"But she does exist," said the young man. "What you look upon as a chimera is to me a reality."

"What! are you in earnest?" exclaimed the countess. "Have you in truth bestowed your heart on some one? Why not tell me so at once?"

"That I cannot tell you," he replied.

"Is she free?" said his aunt; "a maiden or a widow? In short, what or who is she?"

"I do not know who she is," replied Ernest.

"But where did you meet her?" was the next question. "How shall I know her? What is she like?"

"I have never seen her face," he replied.

"Now this is too bad," said madame, "You are either amusing yourself at my expense, or you are even more mad than I believed you to be."

"Then listen, my dear aunt, and be indulgent, as you always are, to me," said her nephew. "You may perhaps remember that I came to pay you a visit three years ago?"

"Oh yes," she assented; "and that you were so grave, so melancholy, so——"

"Well," continued Ernest, "to come here, I traveled by the diligence. Five-and-twenty rubbers of whist lost in one night, a forged bill given to me at Baden, had condemned me to a temporary but necessary reform, and had obliged me to adopt this economical but inconvenient mode of traveling. I mounted the coupe on a beautiful evening, where I found myself quite alone. Night soon came on—a lovely summer's night,—just such a one as Shakspeare would have chosen to people with the most fantastic of his dreams. The extreme mildness of the weather permitted me to have the coupe open, and I inhaled with pleasure the soft June air, known only to the inhabitants of towns by hearsay. The regular motion of the carriage favored my dreamy state of mind, and though far from being asleep, I indulged in charming visions. I was, in a word, in a state of mind well fitted to receive and preserve sudden and romantic impresions.

"Whilst we were changing horses at a little village not far from Dreux, the door of my carriage was opened, and I perceived that I was to have company. I almost cursed them in my heart for breaking my solitary meditations; and the first individual who presented himself did not incline me to be better pleased with the interruption. He was a gentleman, very fat, very old, with the breast of his coat covered with orders. He climbed in, out of breath, and seated himself grumbling, and obstinately refused my civil offer to give up the coupe seat to him. He turned round to give his hand to a lady, whom he established in a corner, and who, from the vivacity of her movements and the slightness of her figure, I concluded to be very young. Her neck and shoulders were enveloped in a large black silk scarf; a close Leghorn bonnet, covered with a blond veil, would have prevented my distinguishing her features, even if the darkness of the night had not reduced me to the necessity of conjecturing what they might be.

"From some words dropped by my new companions I soon learned that they had been compelled, like myself, to mount into the humble coupe. Their carriage had broken down at the entrance of the village which we had just left. As their arrival at a certain hour had been announced to the relation whom they were going to visit, they knew she would be alarmed if they did not make their appearance; and as it would require two days to repair their carriage, they had left a servant in charge of it and their baggage, and had bravely resolved to proceed in the diligence to their destination. It was to this vulgar incident I owed their presence.

"When we became mutually satisfied that we were in good company, the conversation grew more animated. The gentleman only contributed some commonplace remarks, which had much the same effect (thrown into the midst of poetic and rambling talk), that a shot fired might have had on a flight of sparrows; but his young companion—— No, I never could give you the slightest idea of the effect produced on me in this rolling box, thirty leagues from our salons and our own world, by her irresistible grace, her sympathetic and charming mind—by turns gay, serious, piquante, melancholy, and sentimental. Our conversation touched on all subjects—poetry, fashion, the opera, new books—rapid sketches, but all in good taste; always the most perfect idea, the most delicate apprehension met whatever remark I made.

"Never did people understand each other so quickly and so well as we did; never did ideas and sentiments so entirely coincide.

"You know, dear aunt, that, whether from timidity, indolence, or incapacity, I rarely display any tendency to wit.

"Well, that night I really felt happy at the idea that I did not prove to be quite unworthy of my charming companion. Everything concurred to render the impression which she made upon me deep and lasting; the midnight hour, and charm attached to everything unlooked-for and unknown, and the awkwardness of my situation; I was so near this lady, yet so completely separated from her; she spoke to me almost in a whisper, yet I could not see her; this intimacy of a few hours which the dawn of day would put an end to forever. It was the pleasure one might feel at a masked ball, but without the mask, and without the horrible dread that one always has there, that of giving one's arm to some infamous wretch. Even to our heavy companion my excited imagination gave a romantic part in this drama. He was, doubtless, a husband imposed upon the lady, notwithstanding the difference in their ages; he must separate us for life, as at present he did, in reality, by keeping the seat which I should so gladly have exchanged for mine.

"You may be sure, curious as I was, that I had tact and good manners enough not to ask questions. All that I discovered, all that I guessed, was very hypothetical; they were evidently persons belonging to the highest class—at least so judged by the mention of their friends and relations, and their occasional visits to Paris. The husband (I always settled that he was her husband), might be a general of the emperor, or he might be a large country proprietor, but I soon gave up conjecturing that I might listen and reply. I was intoxicated with delight by the conversation of my adorable unknown; I admired how wit, how sentiment, so often enemies to each other, were so judiciously blended that they did not interfere, but set each other off instead; and from listening to her, and trying to understand and value her as she deserved to be valued, the night was not near spent until your poor nephew, agitated, astonished, alarmed at his own strange feelings, could have said, with a mixture of sorrow, fear, and almost of shame, 'My heart beats!'

"A little before sunrise, my neighbor stretched himself out of the window, and called to the conductor to stop. We had reached a cross-road that branched off from the highway. 'Louise,' said he to the young lady, 'we had better alight here. We will go to a farm-house, not five minutes' walk from this, and send notice to our cousin, and then she will forward her carriage for us.'

"These simple words, this inevitable denouement, appeared to me at the moment a real misfortune; it seemed as if this man had waked me from a delightful dream,—as if he were snatching my treasures from me before I had time to count them. Moreover, this all took place in the twinkling of an eye. The husband got out first, treading heavily on my foot and making many apologies, which I was much tempted to answer by abusing him. Louise followed, stepping lightly. In passing me, she bade me a friendly adieu; to which I did not know what to reply. I gave her my hand for a moment. As she advanced to the step of the carriage I had a glimpse of a small foot, encased in a well-fitting boot, touching the ground. There they set out on the cross-road, which was half hidden by hawthorn hedges. I saw no more, and the diligence set off at full trot. In a quarter of an hour more it was broad daylight. I arrived at your house in the evening, tired and discontented, every now and then asking myself if I had dreamt all this,—if I was awake or asleep,—not being able to account for the tumult of my thoughts, for my heart was full of this ideal who had appeared to me for a moment, and whom I felt I never could forget."

"And you have never since found out anything more about her?" asked the countess.

"It was not possible for me to do so," replied her nephew. "Neither the conductor nor the driver knew anything of my two travelers, who had entered the diligence without giving their names, and without luggage. When I was in the village where we had taken them up, I could learn nothing. They remembered the carriage left to be repaired, but that was all. I could not even find out the place where we had set them down; for in the night especially, all cross-roads resemble each other. So I had to give up my search, having nothing to guide me in it."

"And so, Ernest," said his aunt, "all that remains to you of your beloved is the name—Louise?"

"Another," he replied—"a bunch of daisies, which my heroine held in her hand and dropped as she left the carriage, whether designedly or not I cannot say; but I have treasured it as a relic of her."

"My poor Ernest," said the countess, "there are a good many women called Louise, and there are a great many daisies in our fields in Summer. I just go back to where I began. Is not this folly?—and what can it lead to?"

"To nothing, I know," he replied; but if follies lead to any good end, they cease to be follies. Let me enjoy my ideal a little longer. A name, a bouquet, a remembrance—are not these often all that remain to us of the sweetest moments of our lives? But, farewell, dear aunt, for there is Justin on his box and the postillion in his saddle. In September, I shall return, and you shall preach to me again."

"Alas, my dear child, I am afraid I am too old for my sermons to have the power of converting you," said the old dowager. "My only wish is to see you happy, and for this reason alone, I entreat you to think of what I have said to you."

THE STREAMLET.

BY T. H. DEE.

The streamlet's bubbling accents told
The tale of woe for matron old,
Whose lifeless son lay pale and cold,
On war's red field of glory,
And 'twas its gushing tones that sung
Of many playful gambols flung
By nerves to other music strung,
Than carnage wild and gory.

In language wonderfully strange,
It speaks of many a worldly change,
That has transpired within the range
Of mem'ries truthful pages,
Of some who've left and gone before,
That we commune with, as of yore,
And shall do, aye, forevermore
Where bliss the theme engages.

I love to hear its trickling whiles
So truthful in their varied styles,
That move to sympathy or smiles,
Unconscious o'er me stealing,
I would that I could clear convey,
In language suitable the sway
It exercises on its way—
Immortal thoughts revealing.

NECESSITY OF AN INTELLIGIBLE VIEW OF A FUTURE LIFE.

The mind of man is so organized that it requires an intelligible future upon which it can rest for his present happiness. Man does not need to be possessed of every detail of a future life, but he needs proportionately as definite a notion of the likely character of his movements, and the sources of his pleasures, as he has of his future in this life when at school he studies and prepares himself for life's engagements. Unless man knows what the general character of his future movements may reasonably be expected to be, whether in this life or the next, he cannot work towards them correctly. He cannot turn every power even at the present time to its fullest use, to make the future as glorious as possible. Therefore are we sure that whenever or wherever that scheme of religion is found that was prepared for man's guidance, upon this earth by the Creator, it will necessarily contain among its teachings a clear, intelligible and definite view of a future state,—so definite, at all events, that man will understand enough of the destiny and eternal employment of every power he possesses to enable him day by day to train each capability of his nature so as to enable it to fill in the most splendid manner the destiny intended for it.

It is a fact that man only lives in proportion as the aspirations, yearnings, and capabilities of his nature are called into play. Let any of his powers become totally unused for a long period, and they become stunted and dwarfed, and corrode and disorder the rest of his being. Man therefore continually needs objects for their present employ, and a prospect of an abundant supply of such objects for his powers in the future, ere full satisfaction and pleasure can pervade his being. This kind of a prospect is very essential, for a sense of dread and weakness steals through our whole being at the thought of a total loss or cessation of any one of the present energies, activities or promptings now moving within us.

An immortality, therefore, congenial to our aspirations and the real character of our souls, will necessarily present a boundless prospect for the employment of every power we possess—one that will include and retain all our energies in endless prospect. We cannot imagine a future existence for ourselves without carrying or supposing to be there the whole of the natural impulses and combined abilities we at present possess—our memories, our sympathies, our constructive abilities, our refining, beautifying, and adorning powers,—our judgment, our taste, the humor, or pathos of our souls, our governing and managing qualities, our acquisitive desires, our conversational and argumentative qualities, our inventive, combining, and applying strength, with the yearnings of our souls for kindred ties and the love and esteem of others. Together in that immortality must we suppose our natural necessities for difficulties to engage our energies, and that manifest necessity which exists within us for a constant variety to exist in all objects that engage our attention. We cannot understand a future existence (however much we may unthinkingly subscribe to it), without supposing these powers still in our possession, these feelings still in our bosoms, and these necessities still with us.

To make the kind of immortality we need, still more apparent, we ask, Can the watchmaker, as he bends over the delicate machinery of his trade, fitting the various parts with such exactness and finish, and feeling the glow of his intelligence and comprehension of that art filling his mind,—can he imagine himself in the future destitute of that skill, without associating the idea with idiocy or disease? On the other hand, can he imagine that skill still in his possession, with nothing in existence upon which to expend it, looming endlessly before him, without feeling that that would be an equal death and destruction to his feelings?

Can the gardener, tastefully arranging his grounds—here walks, there plats of green winding round the variegated bed, assorting and matching hues and forms, selecting appropriate soils and positions for warmth or shade,—training now the creeping plant high overhead, now festooning and intertwining roses round, banking up greenness and freshness round the arbour seat, and using the judgment that selects the season, the weather and the mould for bringing out and treating each chosen plant,—can that man, thrilling with satisfaction and conscious power amid the triumphs of his skill, the wonders of his judgment and his taste,—can he believe that there shall come a time when every particle of such judgment and creative skill shall die within him, or be forever useless and inapplicable, if retained, without feeling that such a future is as repulsive as the grave?

Can the artist, feeling his soul enriched by the productions of his designing skill (the love of which is interwoven with his life),—can the architect, glorying in his constructive might, imagine an existence without these capabilities still interlocked within his being?

Can the statesman, comprehending the varied codes of nations, grasping the relationships of states and territories, the usages of courts, the bearing of treaties, balancing statistics one against the other, and measuring in his mind the force and application of proposed laws upon communities and individuals,—can he, rejoicing in the mastery and strength of his governing and comprehending faculties, divide those powers, that inward strength, from himself or his future existence, even in supposition, without feeling that he treads upon ground abhorrent and unnatural?

And let us travel nearer home and think of the flow of fancy, wit, and mirth that rises up within us, ever seeking an outlet in speech or action, and ask, Can these be separated from our immortality?

Then the dear, dear promptings that urge man on to love and seek to be beloved, and make him wish to be the support and stay of some objects of his care,—fond parental impulses, touching the tenderest and inmost chords of the spirit, and filling the soul when aroused with sensations natural and holy,—can these be separated in the future from man or woman's nature, and their identity be still retained? Or can the identical man continue his existence without his hospitable imparting nature—the pleasure found in entertaining guests or friends, or bestowing gifts of affectionate remembrance, be with him still? Will it need any argument to prove that each and every quality we have referred to is as much a part of man as anything that he can call himself—that each faculty is necessary for the pleasure and gratification of the rest—that each stimulates, nourishes, and employs the other as much as the head serves to bless and employ the feet, the feet the hands, the hands the eyes, or the eyes the mouth, that, taken together, they form a beauteous and harmonious union of chords, each vibrating on its associated string—each giving and deriving melody from the combination,—that it takes the whole blended mass of capabilities, delights, perceptions, and impulses we have referred to, to form Man, each being separately and unitedly part and parcel of the very being—the very man that has to be supplied with immortality?

Man, then, we say, standing as it were between eternity past and to come, feeling the wonderful variety and scope of his powers, the glories they have achieved, and their capability for infinite development, and notwithstanding thus endowed like one emerging from the dark and treading into it again, carrying with him a mass of talents, longings, and propensities he does not know properly how to use or what to make their final aim, but conscious that they are infinite in their application, while all in this little life to which he can apply them is broken, interrupted, and quickly ended,—craves to know why he is thus gloriously endowed, whither he is tending, and where and in what beyond the grave's great blank lies the field for the employ of characteristics identified with all the impulses of his life, and forming the great fountain, whose many streams make up the pleasures of his existence,—without which knowledge he cannot be fully happy or content, nor can he possibly fully develop or steer these capabilities to their final goal.

So far, then, we have traced out the knowledge man needs. As to which of the varied religions offered to man most gives this knowledge—as to which most completely offers a prospect of a future life in harmony with the desires and necessities of his whole being for endless employment, we shall see, when we investigate the Two Kinds of Immortality respectively offered to man by Christianity and "Mormonism," in our next

A UTAH WOMAN'S THOUGHTS.

ON WOMANLY EMPLOYMENTS, MARRIAGE ETC.

An article of ours, published in No. 4 of this volume, entitled, "Which is the superior sex?" has drawn forth some thoughts from a lady correspondent, from which we make the following extracts and present some comments thereon.

To say that there are not many women fully capacitated to occupy positions of responsibility, to creditably discharge duties of a public nature, would be admitting that woman is man's inferior, this, of course, no right-thinking man would assert, and no woman, with true womanhood dwelling within her, would admit.

It is true the taste of most women is not for the bustle and confusion attendant upon a public career, it is but the few who would choose this life; then let them have their choice, if they want.

If they prove themselves efficient as senators, legislators, doctors, and lawyers, why should the question of sex prohibit the free exercise of intelligence?

Unmarried women are more eligible for these offices, they can give their undivided time to such pursuits, and may it not be that, although unwedded, many may, in this way, become benefactors to humanity?

"Forbid to any human being a particular course, and he immediately wants to pursue it. Man grows restive beneath strong bands and iron rules, human nature is outraged, and he rebels. God has given to man free agency to think, to speak, to act." So also did he give it to woman, and had she to-day the acknowledged right to vote, her sense of justice would be satisfied, she would then act her pleasure in improving or disregarding the privilege.

The women of Utah cast their votes semi-annually to sustain or reject church officers, the votes of both men and women are usually on one side. Were this not so, the women would have the decided advantage, as they are in the majority in Utah. They bear their honors, however, with becoming humility, and show no spirit of antagonism,—they have the privilege to vote, and are satisfied.

In expressing ourselves on the above, we believe that we shall but give our correspondent's own views, had she but taken time and space to have elaborated them. For ourselves, we hold that women are just as fit for senators and lawyers as men are for dry-nurses or any business of that kind—which is certainly not saying a great deal in favor of the proposition Both sexes can by strain of nature, and sheer force of will, sustain—even in an admirable manner positions for which either sex (speaking of each as a whole) have no natural calling. They can do it, we say, when circumstances are sufficiently pressing. There are women doing it to-day and doing it well; but this is no argument in proof of there being a natural endowment of their sex for such pursuits.

But what our correspondent wants, and what we perfectly agree to, is, we presume, that women and men should have the privilege of doing anything no matter how absurd, for as the writer says, quoting from the MAGAZINE, "forbid to a human being any particular course and he immediately wants to pursue it." Therefore, remove all restrictions, let women be Senators, Lawyers, or Congress*men*, if they want, and let men be dry-nurses and milliners if they desire it. Make no cast iron rules for either sex—nature will settle the whole question.

So far as doctoring is concerned, we readily concede that in midwifery, as in many diseases peculiar to their sex, women are certainly the most appropriate attendants. As to women being Legislators, Barristers or Lecturers, the question—if we may be allowed to use so rough a comparison—is like selling potatoes or merchandise, simply one of demand and supply. If the public want lady Senators or lady Lawyers, the article will sell and nothing can prevent it,—provided there are any ladies with the requisite on hand. All this vociferation and flourish of trumpets about woman's right to be this, or her folly in wanting to be that, will all settle itself. If the great world of humanity wants to be represented in legislative chambers by the softer sex they will elect it. On the other hand if this same humanity in its great heart feels that it does not want a woman's voice there, but would rather have it, where it may sound the sweeter, in the stillness of the home circle, it will not call for women for such positions and not being "called," of course, they cannot be "chosen." And all the fretting and stewing on either side will not avail one hair, nature in the mass will speak and will have its own way.

On the subject of voting, we are clearly with our correspondent of opinion that all that women want is the right to vote; here nature again will settle the question. Practical turmoil will have no charms for the mass of women, and having no charms for them, women will be as safe from its influence, as though they were in heaven.

In our next, we will hear what our correspondent has to say as to marriage, and also as to "which is the Superior Sex."

UTILITY OF OPPOSITION.

A certain amount of opposition is necessary to help a man to climb life's rugged steeps. "Kites rise against and not with the wind." To be opposed raises the active mind within. A disposition to contend and overcome, raises latent ambition to succeed, where, perhaps, before opposition came in, the interest may have flagged, or ceased altogether. "Hardship is the mature soil of manhood and self reliance." Let no man wax pale therefore because of opposition. To develop the energies, make strong, weak resolves, in a word to accomplish anything, a certain amount of opposition is necessary.

SALT LAKE CITY, July 21st 1869.

CHARLES MARTEL AND THE WORLD'S CRISIS.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

It is interesting to note the harmonious coming of these great characters, and how exactly they fit the requirements of the age. Moreover, that fitness is endorsed by our experience centuries afterwards, when humanity has advanced to the very culmination of civilizations of which they were the first capital marks. Is it that the times bring forth the men by grand accidents which overtopping all other surroundings, harmonizes history per force, or is there a divine programme underlining all? The reverent historian will incline to the latter view.

As we have seen in our former articles, the very world in the times just preceding the reign of Charlemagne, was one universal chaos. Fierce, warlike nations needed a fusion into a united Christendom, primitive races who were entering into the first phases of social forms, required a vast consolidation. Without this, the Christian civilization could not have been evolved, humanity would have found a very different shaping, and modern times an entirely different tone.

We have seen the rise of Mohammed in the interval between the conversion of Constantine the Great and the coming of Charlemagne. We have acknowledged the hand of God in the advent of the Arabian Prophet; but it has been sufficiently manifest that his mission was suited to the revival of the East, and not to the creation of new empires and new civilizations in the West. That greater part of the world's mission was given to Jesus Christ.

We have now, in our historical course, reached a period when a name and a power were needed to arise, mighty enough to check the triumphant career of the successors of Mohammed, confine his empire to the East and prevent it from interrupting the Providence of the world in the West among the young vigorous nations who were destined to give to humanity the culmination of ages. Charles Martel gave this check, and his still more illustrious grandson Charlemagne created a Christendom.

Within a hundred years after the death of Mohammed which took place A. D. 632, his successors had subdued not only Persia, Syria, Asia Minor, and Arabia, but also Egypt, North Africa and Spain. While the Christian empire represented by the successors of Constantine, was losing its dominion over the West, the followers of Mohammed went on from conquest to conquest, until, in the eighth century, it seemed that both Asia and Europe would yield to their victorious arms, and the whole world become one vast Mohammedan fabric. But, in the year 732, Charles Martel broke this fierce tide of conquest. In the great battle which then took place between the two powers, no less than 375,000 Saracens were left dead on the battle-field. Thus perished an immense army by the might of Charles Martel, the grandfather of Charlemagne, and, with the loss of that famous battle, departed forever the hopes of the Saracens of subduing Europe. And thus we see Providence again at work in the issues of the world; for we cannot but believe that to Christ, and not to Mohammed, was ordained from the first the dominion of all the earth.

There was also, at this period, another crisis in the world's affairs. It was in the division growing up between the successors of St. Peter at Rome, and the successors of Constantine, emperors of the East, who, until this time, had represented the imperial rule of the Church, destined now to soon pass into the hands of the family of Charlemagne. The emperors Leo the Third and Constantine, called Copronynus, emperors of the East, sought to suppress image worship in the Church, and between them and the popes, there sprang up a fierce theological warfare; but Gregory the Third haughtily replied to the emperors. In one of his letters he said:

"You, however, think to frighten us by your threats, by saying —'I will send my guards to Rome to break the images of the cathedral; I will carry away Pope Gregory laden with chains, and I will chastise him as my predecessor Constantine, chastised the pontiff Martin.'

"Prince, learn that we do not fear your violence; we are in safety in Italy; abase, then, the pride of your wrath before our authority, and learn that the successors of St. Peter are the mediators, the sovereign arbitrators between the East and the West."

The emperor Leo then addressed to the Pope, letters of wisdom, aiming for a reconciliation between the Church and the empire, but the haughty Gregory replied:

"You affirm that you possess the spiritual and temporal power, because your ancestors united in their persons the double authority of the empire and the priesthood. They might thus speak who have founded and enriched churches, and who have protected them; nevertheless, under their reigns, they have always submitted to the authority of the bishops. But you, who have despised them, who have broken their ornaments, how dare you to claim the right of governing them? The devil, who has seized upon your intelligence, obscures all your thoughts and speaks by your mouth."

This is a fine example of the matchless arrogance of Priesthoods that have departed from the spirit of Jesus; yet claiming an absolute authority in his name over mankind. He is absolute; but it is in potency of love which sways its scepter over the affections of the heart, and bows the intellect to reverence, by a beneficent wisdom. The highest intelligence and spirituality can receive the reign of theocracy as represented in Him, but what soul, born into the kingdom of light, can maintain for ever a theocracy as embodied in priestcraft. How different is the absolutism of Christ preserved in the spirit of love, and the absolutism of popes which enslaves mankind in the forms and arrogance of a Christless authority? Yet, to this the Church was now reduced, and in that authority, popes began to set themselves up against the emperors (the successors of Constantine,) who had first given to these successors of St. Peter the opportunity of temporal power. But this was destined to continue for many centuries till every emperor and prince in Christendom was subdued to the supremacy of the Church. The monk Hilderbrand, who was the Charlemagne of popedom, and crowned as Gregory VII, put on the capstone of the mighty fabric of priestcraft. After that, the Reformers began to rise as the world's great characters; and popes found them mightier than emperors and kings. We shall reach them by and by; but we will now return to the beginning of the struggle between the popes and emperors at the world's crisis, when Charles Martel arrested the march of the Mohammedan power upon Europe, and the East and West commenced their separation.

After dispatching his arrogant letters to the Emperor Leo, Pope Gregory called a council and anathematized all the "image-smashers" of the Greek Church, which so enraged the emperor that he armed a numerous flotilla, destined for war upon Italy, but violent storms treated it as they did centuries afterwards the Spanish Armada, and the vessels were obliged to return to Constantine. This was deemed a miracle by the Roman Church, and solemnly celebrated in Italy. The emperor, however, began to re-organize an army and equip a new fleet for the war against the pope, but the revolt of the successor of St. Peter shook Leo upon his throne. By degrees, he lost the most beautiful provinces of his empire, because execrated by his people and stigmatized by the name of anti-Christ. Such has been the examples of the wars between the princes and priests. Religion is the omnipotent. Nothing but a counter-religion can break it down.

Not until the Reformers came were the successors of St. Peter shaken.

But Pope Gregory soon found that the Church could not triumph in the earth, separated from the protecting might of an empire, and this soon brought up Charlemagne with his new empire of the west.

The king of the Lombards finding the popedom no longer protected by the emperor of the East and his Grecian troops, resolved to reduce all Italy to his sway. Gregory, in his strait, now sought the aid of Charles Martel, king of the Franks, but that politic prince was rather lukewarm in the cause of theChurch; but his ambitious descendants at length succored Rome, and thereby established the dominion of France.

Gregory, nothing daunted by the crisis of the times, maintained the supremacy of the Church, and dared to say in full council, "that his see was above all the thrones of the earth, and that the pontiffs might conduct all nations to the prince of darkness, without any man having the right to accuse them of sin, because they were not submitted to the judgment of mortals!"

An extract of the letter of Pope Zachary, soon after this to the primate of the Gauls, will illustrate to our readers the style of the Church towards its intellectual heretics. His Holiness wrote:

"Above all, proscribe the philosopher Virgil, that Scotch priest, who dares maintain that there exists another world, and other men upon that world: other suns and other moons in the heavens: who affirms that to be a Christian, it is enough to follow the morality of the Bible, and to practise its precepts, without even being baptized. Let him be driven from the Church, deprived of his priesthood, and plunged in the darkest dungeons: let him undergo all the tortures invented by man, for we will never find a punishment sufficiently terrible to chastise an infamous wretch, whose sacriligious doctrine has destroyed the holiness of our religion. We have already requested the Duke of Bavaria to deliver up to us this apostate, to be solemnly judged and punished in accordance with the rigor of the canons. The prince having refused our request, we have written to the priest a threatening letter, prohibiting him from raising his abominable voice in the presence of the faithful assembled in the house of God."

How does this style of the successor of St. Peter accord with the revelations and scientific knowledge of the nineteenth century? Has not the world advanced some little since Pope Zachary wrote that letter?

PERPETUAL MOTION.

BY JINGO.

Gentle reader, did you ever try to raise yourself by the seat of your pants? Ah! we thought not. Never having attempted anything of this sort, you of course know nothing of the results. If you ever had tried this experiment, you would have discovered that you could only raise yourself to a certain height, at which point the attraction of gravitation comes in contact with the self-moving forces of the universe, and produces a state of equilibrium. Now this state of equilibrium is what interferes most frequently with all attempts at perpetual motion. This is what must be overcome in order to achieve the desired result. There is also an important principle, or law of nature, which must be taken into consideration in this connection; which is that all powerful forces cause weaker ones to give way. This is very nicely illustrated in animal life. For instance, we will say the dog wags his tail! This is a fact in nature that we hope no one will have the hardihood to dispute. Very well! we will say, for the sake of the argument, that you admit that the dog actually does wag his tail. (It is said Barnum has a wheel in his collection which came off a dog's tail when it was a-waggin.) Now comes the important query to the philosophic reader. Why does the dog wag his tail? Simply because the dog is stronger than the tail, if not, the tail would wag the dog! Now, Jones is working on a perpetual motion, and he has taken these principles into consideration. He admits there are obstacles in the way of its accomplishment, but instead of trying to dodge them, meets them boldly, like a man, and determines to overcome them. Men ridicule the idea of perpetual motion; but other great things have been ridiculed at their inception. We might mention, as an instance, Columbus laying an egg, and tell how he was laughed at for attempting to do it, yet we all know he accomplished it—now, whole families lay their own eggs. Again, there is the man who said he could lift an elephant. No one would believe him until he described how he would do it, i.e., to commence when it was a calf and lift every day until it becomes full grown. This is the principle upon which Jones is going to work on his perpetual motion. He knows that if he can succeed in raising himself by the seat of his pants he can make a successful perpetual motion. He intends to keep trying at this a little every day until he succeeds. As soon as he accomplishes this he feels perfectly satisfied that he can do the other, because, as he very truly remarks, the principle in each case is the same. When Jones gets his motion completed, I will drop you a line.

HOW THE WORLD HAS GROWN.

BY ELI B. KELSEY.

THE SPARTAN AND ATHENIAN CONTRASTED.

The Spartan social code was the opposite, in many respects, to that of Athens, which for ages contended against Sparta, with varying success, for the sovereignty of Greece—although the inhabitants of those two great cities worshipped the same God, consulted the same "Oracles," and contended together for the garland of victory at the Olympic games; they represented the extremes of Greek character. The dark, sombre, staid and practical Spartan looked upon the light-hearted, talkative and bedizened Athenian with the utmost contempt. A distinguished Spartan once inquired, contemptously, of a Greek architect, "if trees grew square in his country." All efforts at the beautiful and chaste being, in his estimation, as so much ginger-bread work, utterly unbecoming a man of sense.

The grim and austere Spartan was the devil with which Athenian mothers frightened their unruly children into obedience. The Athenian, although in no way superior to his Spartan neighbor in mental training, delighted in the pleasures of a home life. He considered his children as his crown, and did not consider that physical excellence alone made the sum of life. In his estimation it was the mind that made the man, and not the body alone. The Athenian delighted in the beautiful and elegant in architecture. He was of a philosophical character and was ideal in his very nature. Oratory was his especial delight, and to talk well himself was his glory.

While the sturdy and hard-headed Spartan went into battle with that determined expression that said, emphatically: "We advance, but recede not," the volatile Athenian would rush into the fray, fight like lions, and, if unsuccessful, run away with equal alacrity, and "live to fight another day."

The mythology of the Greeks, no matter what its origin nor whence it sprang, introduced a higher form of civilization than existed before their day among any of the heathen nations of antiquity. They never worshipped gods of an inferior type to man. The mythology of Greece was infinitely superior to that of Egypt. They worshipped the invisible, while the Egyptians adored the visible. While the Egyptians worshipped a bull, a crocodile, a monkey, dog, or cat, the Grecians adored the mighty but invisible Jove, and his numerous coadjutors, both male and female. In their view, man was in the image of the Gods. In their minds so closely was the divine and the human allied that Achilles, one of their heroes, was supposed to be a son of the great Jove himself. In proportion as the Grecian mythology was superior to that of Egypt, so was her civilization based upon a religious faith superior to that of her dusky contemporary.

Music.

SINGING PRIESTS OF ANCIENT ISRAEL.

In modern times, when we speak of a choir of singers, it is generally understood in reference to a choral body with good voices and some musical training, which executes musical compositions on the Sabbath day, at church or chapel. Religiously, we have but a very loose conception of a choir. In the Christian churches abroad, even the moral character of the performers of the singing service is often very questionable. Seldom is the choir what may be termed a religious corps, though the service of praise is committed to it, and, therefore, congregational singing is almost always more genuine, and, we should think, more acceptable to God. Congregations generally sing with the spirit, because they feel to praise the Lord. The official choir may be supposed to execute their musical parts with professional skill, the singers having fine voices, and the organist being a skillful player. If they do this, our conception of a modern choir is about realized. Indeed, singers are professionally engaged for the church, just as actors are for the stage. Now, although we hold that the musical service of the church, whether that of the Saints or other denominations, should possess all the points and quality of a professional performance, we assign to the part of praise a very high religious function. This brings us to consider the musical worship of ancient Israel, and those who composed the choirs of the congregation.

When David, the Psalmist, waxed old and full of days, he made Solomon king over Israel. And then he gathered together all the princes of Israel, with the priests and the Levites; and the Levites numbered thirty and eight thousand. Of these, "four thousand praised the Lord with the instruments which I made," said David, "to praise therewith." He then divided the sons of Aaron into their courses, twenty-four orders of them, and the singing priests into four and twenty orders. In the xxv of the i Book of Chronicles, we read—

"Moreover, David and the Captains of the hosts separated to the service of the sons of Asaph, and of Heman, and of Jeduthun, who should prophecy with harps, with psalteries and with cymbals."

Then came the ordinations of these singing priests under the hands of their fathers. Of one of these orders it is said:

"All these were the sons of Heman, the king's seer in the words of God to lift up the horn. And God gave to Heman fourteen sons and three daughters.

"All these were under the hands of their father for song in the house of the Lord, with cymbals, psalteries and harps for the service of the house of God, according to the king's order to Asaph, Jeduthun and Heman.

"So the number of them, with their brethren that were instructed in the songs of the Lord, even all that were cunning, was two hundred four score and eight.

"And they cast lot, ward against ward, as well the small as the great, the teacher as the scholar."

We give this, by no means, as examples for modern Israel, but to instance curiosities of musical service among the Hebrew fathers. We see that these choirs, under David and Solomon, were of priestly families, and were ordained for the exalted performance of praise, for they were called to minister in holy places, with others of the orders of the Levites. They, moreover, belonged to the class of the prophets and seers, just as did the Hebrew poets.

Such, then, were the choirs in ancient Israel; and our bringing them up as historical curiosities is not, as we have said, presumingly to suggest examples, but to mark the dignity and divine functions of praise as a service of the Church.

Of preachers, who minister the word of life to the people, there is a common understanding that they should be inspired, for their calling is a sacred one. Of the poet, we say he should be inspired. So also should the musical composer be a prophet in his line, and choirs should certainly bear some resemblance, in their religious fervor and inspirational performance to the singing priests of the Hebrews, who were ordained to sing the praise and glory of God in the temple of Solomon the Wise.

The practical part of this, which we wish to bring out, is that modern choirs, the world over, are too much like mere secular performers, such as might be singing on the stage of a theater, whereas, they should be more duly impressed that they are engaged in the performance of one of the highest religious services. How very seldom a choir of singers enter into their part with a truly religious and strongly devotional spirit. Sometimes they go through their music like well-trained parrots rather than as mortals glorifying God in inspired song. Hence there is generally more of the spirit in congregational singing than in mere choral performance, because in a vast concourse of devotional people, there comes a grand swell of inspiration from religious natures. They are not, it is true, singing priests and priestesses, but they are worshippers.

In a former number of the Magazine, we touched upon the subject that "Praise is Worship." This was the conception of David and Solomon. Christians are everywhere strict concerning their prayers; and against this, of course there can be nothing urged. But we can imagine that, even higher than prayer and petitions for personal favors, must be the exalted character of praise from a thousand united voices ascending to the throne of God, for it is more in harmony with the service of Heaven itself. "The Heavens declared the glory of God." It is their theme. In a sense, we may say that the immortals have risen beyond the sphere of daily prayers, but they never rise above the sphere of daily praise. We think it has been more than once said by Brigham and Heber, that there is no music in hell. It is a very unique, and a very correct idea to confine music to heaven as its proper sphere. And such views bring out the fact how much divinity there is in music, and how inspirational it is in its very character. A people who often praise God could not be bad, while we know that hypocrites, and the scribes and pharisees of society are very potent in long prayers. There is too often a certain hollow respectability in the praying class—too much of the "I thank thee O God that I am not as other men," but praise can only come from childlike humility. Its language is, "We thank thee O Lord for what we have received!" An ounce of praise is worth a pound of begging. God has given to us abundant blessings, and in our songs, we tell Him of our gratitude.

In ancient Israel, we have seen that music, as a branch of temple service, assumed a very high character. The psalmist and the singer were of the same order of the Prophets and

Seers, whose sons and daughters were ordained for the service of praise, and that ordination established in their families for ever, the same as the kingly office was confined to the family of David, who was preëminently the psalmist. We will at some future time devote an article to the musical genius of the Hebrews, who, as illustrated in such cases as that of Mendelssohn Meyerbeer and others, have transmitted that genius to their descendents. But for the present, to show the grandeur of the musical performances in ancient Israel, we will give that of the opening of Solomon's Temple:

"Also the Levites which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals and psalteries and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets.

"It came to pass, as the trumpets and singers were as one, to make one sound in praising and thanking the Lord; and when they lifted up their voices with the cymbals and instruments of music, and praised the Lord, saying, For He is good; for His mercy endureth for ever: that then the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord!

"So that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud: for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God."

This sublime manifestation accompanying the musical service must have made a jubilee in Israel infinitely more telling than any musical jubilee of modern times.

TO OUR ST. GEORGE FRIENDS.

Among the local hits of the Cactus, a lively little paper published in St. George, in our Dixie, we notice the following somewhat incorrect statement:—

Enterprising—(?) We have lately heard that about two weeks ago, an agent of the Utah Magazine was in our city soliciting patronage, but have not heard that he visited a single place of business or any of the leading men, where he would have been likely to have obtained subscriptions, and went, no doubt, telling hard things concerning Dixie. St. George will, no doubt, survive his stories, but we are surprised at the enterprising publishers of the Magazine sending such a "deadhead" to canvass for them.

Sometime ago a young man, wishing to visit St. George on some business, solicited the privilege of canvassing on the road, to assist in defraying his expenses. This wish was complied with, and our friend proceeded on his way, devoting as much time as convenient to the Magazine. We have not heard that he says "hard things concerning Dixie;" but we have heard that he brought us in about one hundred and thirty subscribers' names, which is quite as much as we expected. Our friend of the Cactus will see that he has spoken a little too hastily.

We will take this opportunity to say to our St. George friends, that we will meet them in every way possible, in taking the produce of their country in pay for the Magazine. Let us hear from any who wish to subscribe, and we will make the best possible terms to suit them.

TALK ABOUT WOMEN'S WAGES.

The following, from the Weekly Mirror, edited by a lady, shows how the sisterhood in the States are viewing the above question. We do not, of course, endorse every word, but there is more truth than poetry in some of the lady's points:

"The husband and wife are equal partners. The husband is out-door head of the firm, and the wife in-door member. Her work in the house is of as much importance to the welfare of the family as his work out of doors. No family can be well managed unless the wife and mother faithfully performs her part; and if she does this, the husband and father does no more for the advancement and interest of the family. This being the case, she is entitled to one half of the income—to one half of all that he and she accumulate. This half should be hers if she survive him; and he should divide his half as he pleases; or if he dies intestate, the law should give it to his heirs. If he has children, the widow should get none of it—[that is, of his half, we suppose.—Ed.] If he has no children, she might be one of his heirs. If she dies before him, and has not disposed of her half by will, it should be secured to her heirs, and he should get none of it, if she has children. If not he might be one of her heirs.

"Repeal the slave code for wives—the law which says—'All that she can acquire by her labor, service or acts, during coverture, belongs to her husband.' This law was made for the old Saxon swineherds in the days when Alfred the Great was King. It gives the husband exactly the same power over his wife's earnings that the South Carolina slave code gave to the master over the earnings of the slave. Emancipate wives, make them equal partners with their husbands, and thus give them the same motives for industry and economy that are given to men, and see if you do not, with one stroke of the pen, dash out nine tenths of the extravagance and fashionable folly of women, multiply marriages four-fold, and get rid of the talk about women's wages. There is something wrong when woman is out in the world contending with men for wages. She should find her reward in her own proper work keeping house and raising children; and when the masses of women are emancipated and paid for doing the work that no man can do, the exceptions who teach school, sell dry goods and write for newspapers will find the wages question very easily settled."

Gems from the Poets.

OH! SNATCHED AWAY IN BEAUTY'S BLOOM.

Oh snatched away in beauty's bloom,
On thee shall press no ponderous tomb;
But on thy grave shall roses rear
Their leaves, the earliest of the year,
And the wild cypress wave in tender gloom.

And oft, by yon blue gushing stream,
Shall Sorrow bow her drooping head,
And feed deep thought with many a dream,
And lingering pause, and lightly tread,
Fond wretch! as if her step disturbed the dead!

Away! we know that tears are vain,
That Death nor heeds nor hears distress;
Will this unteach us to complain,
Or make one mourner weep the less?
And thou! who tell'st me to forget,
Thy cheeks are wan, thine eyes are wet. [Byron.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XXXV.

NOT QUITE PARTED.

On the following day Judah Nathans presented himself at the mansion of Sir Richard Courtney. He was shown into the baronet's library, where he found the uncle and our hero in conversation upon the subject which was uppermost.

"You are welcome, Mr. Nathans," said the baronet as his visitor entered.

"I thank you, Sir Richard," replied Judah, taking a seat without ceremony.

"Sir Walter has written to your niece."

"Very wisely done."

"I have read his letter and approve of it."

"Then is it most wisely done."

"The circumstances are affecting, but I see no alternative."

"The problem, Sir Richard, is beyond my solving."

"Will you read the epistle? It has been kept unsealed for that purpose."

"Thank you, Sir Richard. I appreciate your confidence and the very noble conduct of yourself and nephew."

Judah Nathans took the proffered letter and twice read it. Evidently it made a great impression upon him, for the second reading seemed to be a dwelling with satisfaction upon its contents, and a regret at the necessity which prompted the writer.

"Sir Walter Templar, you have acted nobly," he observed as he returned the epistle.

"I have but performed my painful duty to your niece, sir."

"He who does his duty when it is painful deserves admiration. This concerns my sister Rachel's child, and therefore I admire your conduct."

"To resign Terese has stricken my heart, as it has destroyed the dearest hope of my life. I pray Heaven it may not quite break her heart."

"Sir Walter Templar, could I, without blighting Isaac Ben Ammon's declining days, so will it, my niece should be your wife, though when I came yesterday I had willed it otherwise."

"I thank you sir; but even my uncle would not approve of the alliance now."

"No, Mr. Nathans. I conscientiously could not."

"You are right, Sir Richard. I had forgotten. Terese is a Jewess."

"And as you yourself have said, Mr. Nathans, the Jewess and the Christian cannot mate."

"Cannot mate, Sir Richard."

"Six months ago we stood not in that relationship to each other. She was then an orphan," said our hero.

"I would you had been married to her before she had found her grandfather," mused Judah.

"It is in vain for us to regret that which we cannot alter," observed the young man. But he knew not then how difficult it would be for him to school his heart to the necessity of resigning Terese. His sense of honor ruled him now, not the tumults of his love. He lived to see the day when that love grew restive,—when his heart rebelled against the necessity of resigning the maiden forever. He lived to see the day when his strong passions broke down all barriers of opposite religions and separations of races; lived to see the day when his whole soul was one great sense of aching for Terese,—a mighty voice that cried aloud for her, day and night; he lived to see the day when no longer the old authorities were heeded by him, which declared "The Jewess cannot marry the Christian noble."

"Yes," repeated Judah Nathans, "I wish Terese had not found her grandfather until she had first become Sir Walter Templar's wife."

"Mr. Nathans, I beg you, as a special favor, to represent to your niece that I have been faithful to her."

"You have been faithful to her," was the echo.

"I would not have her deem me false to my love for the price of the world. I have lost enough in losing her. The loss of her confidence, too, would be more than I could bear."

"Sir Walter, Terese and her family shall hold you and your family in reverence."

"We thank you, Mr. Nathans," said our hero, scarcely able to command his speech.

"And now, Sir Richard, there is a matter of a different kind, upon which I would speak before my departure."

"If you please, Mr. Nathans."

"It may not be known to you that for over thirty years I have been the companion and, since his father's death, the private adviser of Sir Herbert Blakely."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the baronet, in some surprise.

"That position I have resolved to occupy no longer."

"You interest me, sir."

"My past position placed me in direct antagonism to your family, for I pledged my dead master, the General, that I would never cease to work to his ends until the De Lacy estates were in the entire possession of his son. I have worked, I confess, faithfully, till yesterday, to the accomplishment of this purpose."

"Is this possible?"

"I always speak the truth, even though that truth should be against myself. I tell you this that you might not hereafter, hearing it from other lips, doubt me."

"I reproach you not for fidelity to your trust."

"To accomplish this I have stopped at no considerations. I would even have removed Sir Walter from our path."

"Indeed!"

"Yet in my own intentions I have never designed him hurt."

"We are now open enemies. Am I to so understand you, sir?"

"No, Sir Richard, but rather friends. I cannot in future war against your family. The love of my niece shall henceforth render Sir Walter sacred to me. Of this I shall inform Sir Herbert Blakely; for no one shall have cause to say I betrayed him. I only withdraw from an evil purpose."

"I am glad to hear it, Mr. Nathans; and as you have told me thus much of yourself, and seeing that you must be very intimately informed upon all matters concerning the De Lacy estates, I will return your confidence by a personal explanation, not designed, however, for Sir Herbert Blakely."

"You do me honor, Sir Richard, and you may be assured that any subject committed to me will be preserved sacred."

"Knowing now of your past connection with Sir Herbert, this explanation becomes relative to the case between your family and mine."

"I believe, Sir Richard that I understand how generous your family have been. I anticipate your explanation."

"I perceive you do, sir. Your acuteness has detected that in order to accomplish the union of your niece and Sir Walter Templar, we not only revoked the betrothal with my daughter Eleanor, but for the time renounced the redemption of the De Lacy estates."

"It was very generous and very just in you all. I had concluded that such was the fact, and that this decision was made by your family when you all deemed my niece an orphan and portionless."

"You are right, Mr. Nathans, it was Terese, the orphan, that we considered we knew, not Terese the heiress of the rich Jew Isaac Ben Ammon."

"It was very just and very generous in you, Sir Richard, I repeat: and it is this which led me to resolve to withdraw myself from Sir Herbert Blakely. I cannot war against the family who were willing to sacrifice so much for the child of my sister Rachel."

"I confess, moreover, Mr. Nathans, that these very peculiar circumstances of our family have disarranged the calculations of twenty years, for though this union with your niece is interrupted, the betrothal between my nephew and daughter is also broken off."

"I understand, Sir Richard. The Lady Eleanor could not return to the old relations with her cousin, knowing his love to be another's. A high-spirited woman like her would be very sensitive in the case."

"Right, Mr. Nathans. Sir Walter Templar and Eleanor Courtney can only be in future as a dear brother and sister. Indeed I find that relation most becomes them. Eleanor worships Walter, but it is as a sister for her brother. They grew as brother and sister—they love as such. There ends the matter between them. But in that ending, Mr. Nathans, the De Lacy redemption is also at an end."

"Uncle Richard, I must still urge my protest against your view on that point," broke in our hero.

"At an end for the present, Walter."

"Not so. I will clear off the mortgage independent of any family alliances."

"It is not practical, Walter. The Templar mines are neither as valuable nor as saleable as they were ten years ago. Nor would I allow for Lord Frederick and my daughter Alice the sacrifice you have repeatedly proposed. Moreover, I confess, Walter, that the betrothal between Frederick and Alice seems as much disarranged by recent events as that between yourself and Eleanor."

"We will waive the matter then, uncle, for a time," said our hero in some embarrassment, for he also had misgivings upon the matter. He saw from every appearance that his cousin Alice was not drawn towards Fred, whereas her very life seemed hung upon himself. Already had he been troubled over the matter; already had he asked himself if there were to be in the sequel more love crossings and family crossings. And more than ever, Sir Richard and himself saw how unwise in policy it is to legislate, to a programme, family alliances, when the impulsive affections of the heart have so much to do in the matter, and the circumstances of life in a moment overturn the finest woven plans.

"So you see, Mr. Nathans," continued Sir Richard Courtney, "how the matter stands in relation to the De Lacy estates."

"I do, Sir Richard, and am sorry to perceive all your family problems so disarranged, seeing that the generous devotion of Sir Walter Templar for my sister Rachel's child has been the cause."

"Had our family compacts held good," said the baronet, "my nephew and myself unitedly could have redeemed the estates without materially crippling our own. In that case I should have conferred upon my eldest daughter her sister's portion at my death, giving to the husband of Alice in lieu thereof, the redeemed mortgage of the inheritance of his race, purchased by the wealth of my nephew and Eleanor. This would have been an equivalent, and in time the family balancing would have been just."

"Very wisely arranged, Sir Richard, and had your nephew married my sister's child, her vast wealth would have redeemed the estates, and so far your intentions would have been met."

"It is useless to speculate upon that, Mr. Nathans, yet had my nephew married your niece before she had found her grandfather, I should in such a case as the one you have suggested, at my death, have settled Alice's portion upon my nephew and his heirs, thus balancing the account much in the same way."

"Yes, as you have wisely observed, Sir Richard, it is now useless to speculate upon what might have been had Sir Walter Templar been united to the child of my sister Rachel. Terese will also be my heiress, and I am now, through the recent death of my father's uncle, very nearly as wealthy as Terese's grandfather. But this is mere babbling on my part. As you have observed, Sir Richard, it is useless to speculate upon the union of Sir Walter Templar and my sister's child."

But those who knew Judah Nathans as we know him would have reversed his words just then. His very dwelling upon it was an infallible sign that he did not think it useless to speculate upon that union, or he would not have speculated. He never started after the solution of a problem (as he would himself have worded it) without some latent design of mastering it, and if he afterwards gave it up it was when his law of necessity forced him to, or his conception of wisdom told him that it was the best policy. He dwelt now upon what might have been had Terese and Walter mated. It was a proof, therefore, in his case, that the union of our hero and heroine was the very subject which occupied his mind.

"Sir Richard, I have intruded too long upon your valuable time," observed Judah, rising to depart.

"No, sir; it has been occupied in very necessary communication."

"I feel honored with your confidence, Sir Richard. Sir Walter, I will represent to my niece all you have desired."

"My sincere thanks, Mr. Nathans," replied our hero, and Sir Richard and his nephew, expecting to see their singular visitor no more, deemed the subject of the union of Terese and Walter for ever at an end; but not so deemed Judah Nathans.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WITHIN THE CIRCLE OF GOOD.

Judah Nathans left the house of Sir Richard Courtney an altered man. He had been in the action of his life, not good; for nothing, until very recently, had come in that life to transform him into the image of goodness. That illustrious social philosopher, Robert Owen, has laid it down as a cardinal law of a just moral economy, that men and women are created in their characters by the action and force of circumstances. Orthodox exceptions might be taken to this, but it is as near the universal truth as any one general law can be. The experience of life proves it. Hence the great scientific apostle of modern times believed that, mankind only needs good surroundings for earth to be transformed into a comparative heaven. We are pleased to have met Judah Nathans in his relation with Terese, the Hebrew Maiden, to illustrate the truth of this philosophy and the moral of our story,—"NOT ALL DROSS."

Up to the date of the discovery of his niece, Judah had been in the service of a master whose ends needed an evil agent. His actions, therefore, had not been good, though, as we have seen, he was not evil from malice. Kindness gave him more pleasure than unkindness; truth gratified his intellect as a scientific man, and that intellect admired justice as a wiser policy than injustice. An angel had come in his life now, in the person of our heroine, and in legislating for her happiness he was brought within the circle of good. He had now also been brought into relationship with the family of Sir Richard Courtney, and he had found them just, noble, generous. The influences under which he now acted were germinating in his soul good intentions. In this spirit of better surroundings he had presented himself at the mansion of Sir Richard on the day of his second interview, at the close of which he was still further within the circle of good.

Three days afterwards Judah Nathans was in London, partly there on his own business, touching the wealth of his great-uncle, Reuben Nathans, to which he had just fallen heir. He put up at the Adelphi Hotel in the Strand. He rang the bell of his private apartment, which was answered by one of the servants.

"Wine, Thomas. The very best in the house."

"Champagne, sir?"

"Champagne, Thomas."

Judah was still an epicure. Indeed he was changed in nothing of his essential characteristics. He was simply, as we have said, brought within the circle of good intentions, and was no longer within that of his master's evil necessities. So far as this went, he was entirely a changed man in his life, but not in his nature. He was as capable of good as of evil. As much can be said of Satan himself. The Arch Fiend is classical, not malicious. His evil is the offspring of his own necessities, just as that of Judah Nathans had been from the necessities of Sir Herbert Blakely.

"The wine, sir," said the servant, entering.

"A crown, Thomas."

"For myself, your honor?"

"For yourself, Thomas."

"Can I serve your honor further?"

"Has any one inquired for me since my absence?"

"Yes, your honor. There is the gentleman's card on your table."

"So. Lawyer Wortley."

"He was here to-day. He will call again, he said, to see if you were returned."

"I am at home, Thomas, to the lawyer."

"Very good, your honor. Any further commands?"

"Yes. Take this letter to the post-office. No fail, Thomas. There is another crown."

"Fail, your honor?"

"Stay; take it to Mr. Coutts, my banker. He will forward it with his private matter. There is a half guinea. Use dispatch. I pay for services."

This division of his gifts showed the Jew and also the man of the world, in paying well for fidelity. The letter was from our hero to Terese, and Judah was desirous for its safe and speedy delivery. His uncle Isaac Ben Ammon was well known in his banking transactions to the great firm of Coutts. Hence, upon second thought, he sent Sir Walter's letter through the great English banker, whom he knew was in continual correspondence with his uncle Isaac.

Judah drank several glasses of wine, and then he began to muse upon the matters before him.

"So Richard Courtney thinks the Christian noble must not wed the Jewess; and so my uncle Isaac thinks. Now, wherefore? I must solve that wherefore, and if it will not solve philosophically, then it is not a scientific problem, and therefore not worthy to prevail."

Judah was fairly launched into his sea of problem-solving. If he runs the barque of the lovers aground he will do it philosophically; if not, the barque still swims.

"The affair is very complex. Good. First, we have two different and radical religions. That is bad for an alliance. 'The Jew and the Christian cannot mate!' It is a form of wording with a great noise in it, but I think it is noise chiefly. Now, there is philosophy in religion, but very seldom philosophy in men's methods of it. I am infidel to these methods, not to the religious sentiment. Jesus was equal to Moses, quite his equal, though my uncle Isaac would not like to hear me say so. 'The Jewess cannot marry the Christian.' Now I see not the philosophy of that, when their happiness makes their union necessary. So, uncle Isaac, we have erred. But stop. If the Jews and the Christians had not kept their distinction of races, Judah, to-day, would not have been a people and would not now hold the commerce of the world. This exclusion has preserved Israel and given him the empire of wealth. But then the past necessities no longer exist, and we are mightier in encircling more and in becoming more the soul of nations So uncle Isaac, the Jew and the Christian are already in alliance. Next, we have the love of these two young folks. There they carry the ground altogether. The Jewess and the Christian noble are mated in love. Then let love rule. 'Tis the wisest. The affections so seldom rule that it is well they should rule now. She is my sister's child, therefore she should be happy. I say, therefore, because the child has somehow got into my heart. So let Sir Walter Templar marry her. But then, poor Uncle Isaac! Well, I cannot solve the problem. They shall solve it themselves. That letter, which I have just sent, will rivet the chains—not break them; and Uncle Isaac will be forced to the necessity. Thus let it stand."

And the epicure again drank his wine; and soon afterwards, Lawyer Wortley was announced.

"Ha! Mr. Nathans, I am glad to see you. 'Tis many years since we have met," said Lawyer Wortley, as he entered Judah's room.

"It is many years, Mr. Wortley, since we met," was the answer in Judah's peculiar form of repeating an observation.

"Thomas," he said, addressing the servant, "Did you take my letter to Mr. Coutts?"

"Yes, your honor."

"I am not at home to any one."

"Very good, your honor." And the servant left the gentlemen together.

"You received my letter, Lawyer Wortley?"

"Yes, Mr. Nathans, and I congratulate you."

"On the death of my uncle?"

"Well, not exactly on his death."

"You and I, Lawyer Wortley, can afford a truthful wording. It is the wisest between scientific men."

"Well, then, I congratulate you on your uncle's death for it brings you wealth."

"And you a client. I like that form. The connection is logical."

"You commit your affairs into my hands?"

"Yes, Mr. Wortley, for I can depend on your professional capacity and fidelity."

"I am flattered with your good opinion, Mr. Nathans."

"You need not say as much. I need you to manage my affairs and I can trust you or I should not."

"So that settles our business?"

"That settles our private business, Lawyer Wortley."

"You withdraw from Sir Herbert's service."

"I withdraw."

"Of course a man of you wealth could not consent to occupy the position of Sir Herbert's adviser."

"For many reasons I could not."

"By the way, Mr. Nathans, Sir Richard has written to me, offering an installment of a hundred thousand upon the De Lacy mortgage."

"Which you, of course, will refuse to accept."

"I shall. Indeed, I could not do otherwise, without the sanction of Sir Herbert.

"Which he will not give."

"I know it."

Thus began and ended the business part of the interview between this strange man and the eminent lawyer. It was a striking illustration of Snap's methods and professionally of Lawyer Wortley's style.

The two gentlemen then discussed Sir Herbert Blakeley's affairs the remainder of the afternoon together as old friends; and then they separated.

"So Sir Richard Courtney has offered a hundred thousand pounds as an installment upon the mortgage," observed Judah to himself when Lawyer Wortley had departed.

"Now I have my problem: that would have interfered with it. If Terese and Sir Walter Templar should yet marry, the redeemed mortgage must be her wedding-gift to her husband. The Christian noble must not outdo the Jewess in generosity. I shall present the child of my sister Rachel, with the canceled bond. 'Tis well to do good, when 'tis wise to do good; and when good-doing brings you pleasure, then 'tis wise. I like the problem. I will solve it. Now, that child is an angel in my life. The God of our father Abraham bless her. There now, what a blockhead I am. Abraham has been dead more than three thousand years. But her uncle Judah lives, and so Abraham shall bless her in me. Walter Templar shall marry the Jewess. Yet there are my uncle Isaac, Farinelli, and Sir Richard Courtney. Well, well, I will stand by my sister's child, for she is the angel in my life. The Jewess and the Christian noble shall mate. I have said it!"

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

STRICKEN TO THE HEART.

Since the arrival of the letter from Sir Walter Templar with the joyful news of the revocation of the betrothal, the life of Terese had been like a June day, bright with never a cloud in her sky. Her venerable grandsire, too, seemed to her pious mind like one of the ancient patriarchs of her race come up from the grave to bless the last of his antique line, and to establish its generations anew. A providence appeared in his coming, and the old man's conversations were of that grave, yet tender nature touching the culmination of her family in her, that the maiden grew almost superstitious in the matter. Indeed, Isaac Ben Ammon was full of a beautiful superstition himself upon the subject. He deemed that the hand of Heaven was concerned in the discovery of his beautiful grandchild; the curse was taken from his life; the blessing of Israel again before him in his own experience. There was such a kindred feeling between the two, that it was no wonder they were always together. But Terese was dreaming of the fulfillment in her union with Walter, while the old man was dreaming of her return to the religion of her forefathers through her marriage with Farinelli, who, for her sake, had resolved to become a Jew. But each kept the special hope concealed, and hence the supreme happiness of the hour. Isaac Ben Ammon waited to receive news from his nephew Judah before breaking the matter to his grandchild, while she also waited for the news, expecting that her uncle's mission to her lover's family would bring about the union—not obstruct it. This will account for the happy state in which we now find our heroine and her grandsire. But soon the cup of comfort was destined to be dashed rudely from the lips of both.

The news came. Isaac Ben Ammon was delighted with the result. Judah, in a private letter to him, told him all.

"Rachel, my child," said the old man, for as noted before, he called her by her mother's name,—"I have news from England. Here is a letter for you."

"Oh, I am so glad, Grandfather, that letters have arrived!" she exclaimed, as she took the one addressed to her, and recognized the well-known handwriting of Walter Templar.

A look of sadness and anxiety passed over the patriarch's pale countenance, for he foresaw that his loving grandchild was about to receive a deep heart-wound. For the first time he feared lest all should not be well in the end. Terese noticed not her grandfather's altered manner, but in her joy, flew to her chamber to read the letter.

As soon as she had shut herself in her chamber, she fell upon her knees by the bedside and offered up a fervent thanksgiving to heaven. She then broke the seal of her lover's letter and read.

She read, and again she read each passage of the burning epistle. At first, she knew not what it all meant, for it was to her so strange, so unexpected. Then her head grew dizzy, and a film gathered in her eyes, but tears came not to wash it away. At length, she finished reading the letter and partly understood it. She then arose and bathed her fervered brow. Her brain was on fire, her eyes now like live coals from the altar upon which her own heart was consuming. Again she seated herself, and again she read the passionate epistle:

COURTNEY HOUSE, June 1st, 1823.

MY BELOVED COMPANION:

How shall I communicate the stern realities which have so suddenly broken in upon my dreams of our union and blighted my life; but, oh, how word my message not to send a poisoned arrow to your gentle heart? I cannot. To tell the matter to you in words of calmness, would mock my own agony and insult your grief.

Your uncle Judah has visited my family. He came with a solemn mission from your grandfather, as well as to represent himself. He laid before my family the case of his own. I cannot gainsay the will and conscience of an ancient people whose legacy to their descendants, for ages has been a supreme injunction to preserve the integrity of their religion and their race.

They tell me, Terese, that the Christian noble must not marry the Jewess. (Oh, what shall I do; oh, what shall we do, my beloved?) There is but one thing that we can do, and have the approval of our own hearts. It is our duty to our religion and our families. Neither you, nor I could be happy in a union which brought not these sanctions. We have loved, but we have loved in purity and integrity—we have loved, but we have loved in duty to our God and our family honor.

Oh, Terese, what shall we do? Dear Companion of never-to-be forgotten associations, oh what shall we do?

The betrothal in my own family often frightened us, when we were together, to comfort each other's hearts and point to the dim hope before us, though it was looming in the distance amid dark clouds. But now there have come between us the sacred covenants of your ancient race—covenants handed down for a hundred generations: the voices of the dead and the voices of the living proclaim—The Jewess and the Christian cannot mate! And from either side comes a stern response.

Oh, Terese, Terese, what shall we do?

All my family partake of our afflictions, and partake of them more because the fiat is without a revocation. My uncle Courtney, who so willingly sacrificed all his family designs for our union and happiness is upon this matter sadly afflicted, but matterable, for he is a man who will never compromise his conscience or his honor. As for my dear mother, she weeps at my distress, while my cousin Eleanor retires to her chamber and prays for strength to be sent down to Terese and Walter to bear this heavy stroke of Providence. But oh, how hard it is for us, whose hearts it most strikes to acknowledge, a providence in it yet do I say "Thy will, O God, be done!"

Were the cause any other than it is—the covenants of your forefathers, and the integrity of your race—I confess there would be a fierce warfare in my heart and loud-voiced passions—not this mournful, agonizing resignation,—but as it is, to give away to passion and rebellious feelings would seem impious. I would strike down common barriers with a strong hand, but I could not aim a blow at covenants four thousand years old.

Think not that your uncle Judah has done aught in unkindness. My family respect his consideration in this matter, but they are painfully conscious of the fact which he has urged—that the union of his grandchild with a Christian would bring Isaac Ben Ammon's grey hairs with sorrow to the grave.

I look forward now to no union with woman on earth; but in heaven, we, who still must ever love, shall be united, for surely there no voice will proclaim—The Jewess and Christian must not mate.

In love and in hope for that day of union above,

I am, dearest Terese, your

WALTER.

Terese ceased reading her lover's letter. A while she sat as though life had gone out of her; she seemed as a beautiful marble statue. Not in rapt thought, not overwhelmed by a tumult of agonized feelings, but as a person benumbed and without feeling; her heart for a moment was dead—not breaking. Gradually a revulsion came, and with it, the agony; and then with a dreadful spasm of returning life, she staggered to her feet, and with a piercing cry that rang through Isaac Ben Ammon's dwelling, she fell senseless to the floor.

The first who flew to the senseless maiden was her foster-brother. Kneeling, he took her tenderly in his arms; and then, seeing her pale and apparently lifeless, he alarmed the house with his cries for help. But Isaac Ben Ammon had heard the shriek of his grandchild, and, as fast as his aged limbs could bear him, he hastened to the chamber of Terese, followed by old Rebecca. He found Farinelli in extreme distraction, supporting Terese, venting wild reproaches against himself as the cause of the calamity which had fallen upon his foster-sister.

"See, see, old man, what we have done, exclaimed Farinelli, laying the corse-like form of the maiden upon the floor.

"See, there is our work," he continued, in fierce remorse, pointing to the inanimate Jewess.

"Cease, boy, cease!" returned Isaac Ben Ammon. "Think you, young man, that I am not stricken too. Father Abraham, my granddaughter cannot be dead. She is not dead, Rebecca," he added, addressing the old woman.

"No, Isaac, the child has but swooned. She is recovering."

"The God of Jacob be praised," returned the aged Hebrew with a deep sigh of relief.

"My master," said Rebecca, "leave Rachel to my care."

"Rebecca, shall I send for a physician?"

"Rachel needs none, Isaac Ben Ammon. 'Tis the heart that is sick. Quick, leave me alone with the child. Renewed agitation, caused by your presence, might be her death."

"Alas! alas!" moaned the venerable Hebrew, as he left the chamber, "the comfort of Israel has departed from my house again."

The foster-brother was the first to leave the chamber of Terese as he had been the first to enter at her cry. The remark of Rebecca, that his foster-sister was returning to consciousness, had driven him at once away. He would not have met her first reproachful glance for the world. Seizing his hat, he rushed wildly from the house of the Jew to meet in the street Donna Clara Garcia. The prima donna could not have encountered Farinelli in a more ungracious mood. He would have passed her, but the lady would not permit it, for she had been anxious for an interview with the young man. It was the first time that she had met him since his recovery.

"Ah! my dear Farinelli!" exclaimed the prima donna. "I am delighted to see you around again. It is unkind of you to have kept so long away from your friends, when you know how anxious some are concerning you," she added with a wistful look and a tender reproach in her tone.

"Donna Clara, I am quite recovered. There needs no anxiety on my account."

"I see you are recovered, Farinelli. But you are cruel."

"I design it not so, lady."

"Yet, you are very cruel. But let that pass. Will you not sing with me, to-morrow night. Come, Farinelli, consent. The management will double the terms of your engagement. I have made that point a condition of my own. You will consent, will you not?"

"I thank you, Donna Clara; but I cannot sing to-morrow night. I know not, if I shall ever sing in Rome again. Pardon me, now. My foster-sister has been taken suddenly ill. I fear she is dying."

And Farinelli hurried abruptly away.

"May she die and quickly rot in her grave, so that she crosses not my path again," hissed the prima donna to herself, as she drew her veil over her face and also hurried away.

"Aye, may she die; it may save me from the crime of killing her, unfeeling man," she added, as she turned and caught a look at Farinelli, as he passed out of sight.

In the meantime, Terese had returned to consciousness. She uttered no word of reproach; moaned not a vent of her troubled heart; uttered not a remark in reference to the letter of her lover which she hid in her bosom. She listlessly allowed old Rebecca to undress her and put her to bed. She, moreover took from the kind nurse a sleeping-potion with the docility of a dutiful child. Her grandfather came in and, bending over her, his tears fell upon her cheeks. She spoke not; but, throwing her gentle arms around his neck, kissed him affectionately. Soon afterwards, she fell into a deep sleep, for a heavy resignation sat upon her heart, upon which lay also Walter Templar's letter.

In the morning, Terese seemed much better for she had slept profoundly during the night, and her grandfather was in much better spirits in consequence. He visited his grandchild; and, at her request, explained all the circumstances that immediately touched them. He told her how her uncle Judah had gone to England with a mission from himself to consult with Sir Walter Templar's family. He dwelt upon his own hopes to see her embrace the religion of her race, and how dreadful would be to him the stroke to realize that the only living offspring of his loins was lost to her tribe forever as the wife of a Christian nobleman. He confirmed the informationof her lover that Sir Richard Courtney equally with himself agreed that no proper alliance could take place between the Jewess and the Christian; but he was warm in his encominms upon the noble conduct of Sir Walter Templar. This part pleased the maiden. The grandfather also informed her of the proposed marriage of herself with Farinelli, and of his consent to become a Jew for her sake. He urged the young man's deep love for her, and plead tenderly with her to be true to the antecedents of her Jewish race. The maiden listened reverently to her venerable grandsire, acquiesced in nearly all he said; and it was only at the proposed marriage of herself with her foster-brother that she manifested some little impatience, but she gave no further sign of disapproval.

Isaac Ben Ammon was more than satisfied with the gentle submission of his granddaughter; and he left the chamber of the maiden hopeful of the future. But he was somewhat self-deceived. Terese was once more upon the altar, but her heart could not consent to all the sacrifice which her grandfather proposed. Her love for Walter Templar was deathless. Not quite parted even yet!

IT'S THE EARLY BIRD THAT CATCHES THE WORM.

BY A LIE-A-BED.

More than one has shown how hollow
Is this proverb, and absurd:
For the worm, it sure must follow,
Got up earlier than the bird.

Doubtless too the bird in question,
Eating with too great a zeal,
Suffered much from indigestion,
Owing to that morning meal.

And it would not be surprising
If that birdie fell a prey
To some sportsman—early rising
Makes the aim so sure they say.

Perhaps its young too—had it any—
By their parent left forlorn,
Caught catarrhal ailments many
From the keen, cold air of morn.

Other birds—for birds will chatter—
When they saw the bird alight,
Might have chirped with scornful patter—
"Ah! the rake's been out all night!"

Summing up the case concisely,
This decidedly I say,
Early birds don't get on nicely.
Early rising does not pay!

"Who Should Fret and Pine in Sorrow?"

Words by E. L. Sloan. Music by Prof. G. Careless.

Treble. Moderato.

4. Winter's frown, and Springs caressing,
Summer's garland, bright and gay,
Only herald Autumn's blessings—
Glorious eve to changeful day.
Fiercest storms bring calms serenest,
Sultri'st days the richest dews,
Drearest Winters Springs the greenest.
Bright with varigated hues.

5. Who should pine in grief and sadness,
Troubles come and troubles go,
Sorrows yield to joyous gladness,
Weal attends on fading woe.
Mourn not at each bursting bubble,
Passing shadows swiftly fly;
Stoutly climb the hills of trouble,
Pleasure's vales beyond them lie.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS STRENGTHENING PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Scheent, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

A. F. STERLING, Sec. Singer Mfg. Co.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES

—OF THE—

POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Douloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Since Mr. Waters gave up publishing sheet music, he has devoted his whole capital and attention to the manufacture and sale of Pianos and Melodeons. He has just issued a catalogue of his new instruments, giving a new scale of prices, which shows a marked reduction from former rates, and his Pianos have recently been awarded the First Premium at several Fairs. Many people of the present day, who are attracted, if not confused, with the flaming advertisements of rival piano houses, probably overlook the modest manufacturer like Mr. Waters; but we happen to know that his instruments earned him a good reputation long before Expositions and "honors" connected therewith were ever thought of; indeed, we have one of Mr. Waters' Piano-fortes now in our residence, (where it has stood for years,) of which any manufacturer in the world might be proud. We have always been delighted with it as a sweet-toned and powerful instrument, and there is no doubt of its durability; more than this, some of the best amateur players in the city, and several celebrated pianists, have performed on the said piano, and all pronounce it a superior and first-class Instrument. Stronger indorsement we could not give.—Home Journal,

PATENT
ARION PIANOFORTE

GRANDS AND GRAND SQUARES.

7⅓ OCTAVES.

The "ARION" is the very best Piano for the Great West, because it stands in tune longer than any other Piano. It requires no repairing or regulating; shipping any distance, or dampness does not affect them.

WHY?

It commences where the "First Premium" Makers stop, and upon the most improved Modern scale makes four patented improvements; which make the Arion more simple, yet stronger; increasing its volume and beauty of tone, while rendering the instrument more enduring.

WHAT THEY ARE.

First. The patent Arion Reversed Wooden Agraffe Bridge, which retains all the purity of tone only found in a wooden bridge (the rest whereon the strings lay), and obtains all the solid prolonged strength of tone of the metal Agraffe, without that acute metalic noise which the metal Agraffe develops by use.

Secondly. The Patent Arion Compound Wrest-Plank, which holds the tuning pins, is six thicknesses of hard maple, the grain of each layer runs in a different direction. The advantages are, the 20 tons strain of the strings cannot split our Arion wrest-plank, as frequently happens in other Pianos, and when people say "My Piano won't stand in tune," all other makers must use the single wrest plank with the grain running only one way.

The Arion Tuning-Pins have end wood to hold them on every side, while all other makers can have it only upon two sides of their pins.

Thirdly. The Patent Arion Diagonal Sustaining Bar, extending parellel with the steel strings under the over strung Bass strings. The Arion is the only Piano wherein the enormous strain of the large steel strings is resisted in the natural place and direction. Using this bar renders the weakest part in all other over strung Pianos the

STRONGEST IN THE ARION.

Fourthly. The Patent Arion Iron Frame concentrates all the metal in front of the tuning pin line, and its frame is let into (butted) the front edge of the wooden wrest plank, thereby preventing the great strain of the strings upon it from splitting or moving it one particle. All other "Full Iron Frames" cover the entire wrest plank, and when it is split it cannot be seen, the wood of the Arion wrest plank is seen.

THE ARION STANDS UPON ITS OWN MERITS.

unsupported by either buncome, weak facts, or useless or complicated Patents. We append a few unbought opinions of those who

KNOW THE ARION.

The Musical Director of the New York Conservatory of Music, Edward Mollenhauer, says: "The Arion I bought of you is the best Piano I ever played on: that rolling bass and silvery treble, etc."

John H. Woods, Piano Dealer, Oswego, N. Y., says: "The tone is truly immense, and surpasses anything in the shape of a Piano we ever saw or heard of, etc."

Horace Greely said: "The Arion is the best Square Piano, superior for its clearness and brilliancy of tone," &c.

Louis Wagner, Fort Leaverworth, says: "My Piano arrived here in splendid order. Its tone fills my parlor with melody—it is the wonder and admiration of all who hear it. Miss ——, who is teaching the Piano desires me to order one for her," &c.

It has been thoroughly tested, and has not failed in a single instance. Several of the most obstinate cases have been thoroughly cured by this remedy, after every other known medicine had failed. Every one who has tried it will testify to the truth of the above statement.

Every one afflicted with Catarrh should give it a trial and find out for himself whether it is a humbug.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

THE OTHER WORLD.

BY MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

It lies around us like a cloud
A world we do not see;
Yet the sweet closing of an eye
May bring us there to be.

Its gentle breezes fan our cheek;
Amid our worldly cares
Its gentle voices whisper love
And mingle with our prayers.

Sweet hearts around us throb and beat,
Sweet helping hands are stirred,
And palpitates the veil between,
With breathings almost heard.

The silence, awful, sweet and calm,
They have no power to break;
For mortal words are not for them
To utter or partake.

So thin, so soft, so sweet they glide,
So near to press they seem,
They lull us gently to our rest,
They melt into our dream.

And in the hush of rest they bring,
'Tis easy now to see
How lovely and how sweet a pass
The hour of death may be.

To close the eye and close the ear,
Wrapped in a trance of bliss,
And, gently wrapped in loving arms,
To swoon to that—from this—

Scarce knowing if we wake or sleep,
Scarce asking where we are,
To feel all evil sink away,
All sorrow and all care.

Sweet sounds around us! watch us still;
Press nearer to our side,
Into our thoughts, into our prayers,
With gentle helpings glide.

Let death between us be as naught,
A dried and vanished stream:
Your joy be the reality,
Our suffering life—the dream.

A TALE OF MY DRY NURSE;

OR LOVE AND WHISKEY.

BY JOHN LYON.

In the year 1814, when the French and Spanish wars were in their hottest rage, and many of our most gifted youths allured by the gilded prospect of fame and reward, offered by the British government, who were enlisting in Glasgow, were as quickly drafted away to the continent to reap their day-dream of glory—there were few to be seen among the lower classes of society but old men and apprentice boys, with the addition of a great many old veterans, newly returned from the wars, who were scattered here and there throughout the city, hanging about the taverns, boasting over their past career by flood and field, or staggering home in the evening upon the precarious stump of a wooden leg, linked with the arm a winged associate, who might be anything but fitted to balance the up and down with which war had marked her veteran sons.

It is an old proverb that "birds of a feather flock together" and the propriety of this adage could nowhere be exemplified to the letter more than it was at the sign of the old Boar's Head, an old antiquated tavern opposite the Barrack yard. This place might have been designated the return dépôt for half the pensioners and invalids about the east side of the city. The host, having been in the army himself, had considerable faith in his noble comrades who, night and day, kept his tavern in one continuous uproar. There was no lack of chalk upon his part nor credit-asking on theirs, till the next quarter's pension, for all that Bacchus required to cheer his disabled votaries with; and, should any doubt arise in his mind, in respect to their honesty as newly made customers, their pension papers often supplied the place of a cautioner.

To form a correct idea of this elysium of Mars, you must lay common-place conjectures aside and conceive, not a palace of ornament and grandeur, such as the hells of England, but a large, dingy room divided into eight compartments or boxes, set with forms and tables, around which are seated groups of invalids, varying from twenty-six to seventy years of age, and, on the table before them, intermingled newspapers, broken tobacco-pipes, pewter quart-tankards, and above their heads an atmosphere as thick as the fogs of Kent, issuing from the mouths of fifty patented sucking-valves, sending forth their steam as the piston of their lungs forced out the exhaled smoke, to squirt out a stream of saliva or tell an anecdote of daring adventure, connected with Warren Hastings at the Nile or of the retreat of Corunna, where the brave Moore lost his life through the neglect of his country; or of the mortality of the West Indies where whole regiments perished of yellow fever, new rum and green fruit. In another box might be seen, in slab dress the heroes of Beonna, Salamanca and Toulous, just returned from the continent, vaunting over the progress of Wellington and the British army; while they, to encore a hymn of valor, drew their tubes from their reeking mouths, sent forth smoky volumes, like the opening of artillery, to the opposite box, which were accompanied with loud, cursing yells and hoarse growling laughs from this toothless, eyeless, armless, legless mass. From this picture you may have a distant idea of the motley survivors of their country's wars who kept up the every day's conviviality of the Boar's Head tavern.

Among these valiant heroes none were so conspicuous as Willie King, whose stories seemed to have gained an ascendancy over those of his associates in versatility of incident, daring adventure and hair-breadth 'scapes, which he had experienced during nineteen years servitude in the East Indies. It would have touched the most obdurate feelings in human nature to have heard him recite the parting from his Brämin wife at Calcutta, on his embarkation for England. Many a time, when half-seas over, the parting tale was told. And old affection, softened by the embrace of Bacchus, melted into big tears and hopped over his furrowed cheek, as he imitated, with outstretched arm, broken voice and frantic cries, the agony of his disconsolate wife as the ship steered away from the land of her nativity, carrying with it all that her heart held dear.

But, although Willie's heart was as soft as wax in point of severed affection, he could not resist female attachment; he held that the cruelty of military law was no reason why he should be denied the pleasures of matrimony, he therefore, in obedience to rules of hymenial direction, as soon as discharged, had himself joined to a little woman whose husband had been slain at Seringapatam, and, as Willie had fought in the same engagement, there was a kind of a reciprocal feeling between them for the far East, and especially on the score of blasted affection. As often as Willie recited and finished his sorrowful tale, he would always receive a kind response from his lesser half, who would, in stirring strains, lament her loss, in the person of her beloved husband, Bob Lawson, who died far from his native land in the lawful defence of his king and country.

Willie and Bell (which was her Christian name) were loving beyond description, it mattered not whether drinking, telling tales or working—for work he did at times though minus an arm. In his younger years he had learned the art of weaving, and, by the aid of an iron cleek fastened on his elbow, with which, when fixed in the upper shell of his lay, he made the shuttle fly like Jehu when remorse and an empty pocket brought him to a sober calculation, or the deep line of figures chalked against him at the Boar's Head tavern.

The place where they dwelt at the time we referred to in the commencement of this story, was an entire clay field with the exception of a row of two-story houses built on the outskirts of the city; the scenery of this place was no ways inviting, it bore the features of a late volcanic eruption, where the torn earth lay in heaps of loam, gravel and rough stones, huddled together in large mounds, and deep holes alternately scattered over two or three hundred acres. In this place Willie and Bell had lived for four years and were beloved by their neighbors, indeed nothing could be said against them, except their drunken orgies, which continued, at least, six weeks in the quarter. Bell was a clean, tidy little woman, when sober, both in person and in her house, and, having no children, she occupied her time in spooling yarn for her husband, and, had it not been for the surplus pension, they might have passed through life without one incident to commemorate their existence.

The circumstances which gave birth to this simple story happened in 1816. It was a beautiful morning in the midsummer of that year, between the hours of nine and ten in the morning, that Bell tapped on Willie's shop window to call him to breakfast, which call he obeyed a short time afterwards. The little arrangements for breakfast were all in order, an old chair minus a back supplied the place of a table, and on it were placed the cups, sugar-bowl, butter, etc.; before the fire was a plate with the remains of a Scotch haggis that sang, in unison with the simpering tones of the tea-kettle, a kind of Dead March, as Willie paced a sentinel step for nearly fifteen minutes, stopping alternately for a second on his heel, looking wistfully through the window at the clay holes or turning his ear to the sound of every step he heard, ready to open a battery on his half-marrow the moment she entered, for detaining him so long from breakfast. It had been a point with both from the first that if either were absent no eating was thought of, and so religiously was this observed that each felt a sacred pride in observing it, and often boasted of their family fasting, as if the one operated on the other as a digestive tonic.

The mill bells tolled their warning notes for labor in that part of the city, and the streets were thinned of their pedestrian population, when Willie, tired out of all patience waiting on Belle, crossed with hasty steps the uneven surface of the brick-ground, to his old comrade in arms.

But a short time elapsed till back he came double-quick march to his own domicile; then leaving it, he went inquiring among the neighbors if they had seen his wife, which was generally answered by a shake of the head or the careless monosyllable, No! From one place to another, he sought her diligently, with a face marked with the deepest anxiety, and in inexpressive grief, he turned to his own house, having got no clue to the discovery of his lost partner.

The last rays of the evening sun receded in dim shadows from the window panes, reflecting the stained glass on the wall in many a fairy form. The fire had burned down to white ashes, and was out. Every thing remained in its place, as if time had forgotten to move, twelve hours before; and Willie, as life and appetite only lay in the power of Bell to confer, had not tasted one morsel, so lost was he, in her unaccountable disappearance. His wandering eyes passed from one object to another, as if the mind, restless and without determination, sought relief from the burning fever of disappointment. There the bed neatly made and the blankets and pillows gave an invitation to repose. But there were other thoughts in his head; strange, unaccountable thoughts, which he sought to drown, in the insipid Lethe of alcohol. The Boar's Head lane being but a few minutes' walk over the clay-ground, Willie was soon placed in the midst of his boon companions, all of whom had previously become acquainted with the singular disappearance of his wife, and who felt interested and anxious to soothe his disordered mind. There might be a dozen of them gathered together, in conclave, and each one seemingly more interested than another, rehearsed their fears and gave their advice. One story gave place to another, and each gave warm demonstrations of attachment, and praised the warm, generous heart of the subject of his solicitude. The landlord was no less mindful in condoling his princely customer, between the hurried calls of his avocation. To have seen his divided attention, when making some grave remarks, and his startled attention as the bell was rung from some other part of the house; with the quick shake of the hand, and the familiar nod of his head, as he made his exit, were tokens of friendship and sympathy which called forth the admiration and praise of the whole squad.

One quart succeeded another, and tale succeeded tale, and all in perfect keeping with the myterious catastrophy of the eloped unknown. One recited a story of a providential escape and discovery of a lieutenant's wife, who was supposed to have been carried away a by Singalee chief, on her way to Berout, which ended in the carriage having been broken down, and the lady being taken to some neighboring village, and kindly entertained by the natives. This and similar anecdotes, tending to soothe the forlorn condition of their comrade, were told, when mine host of the Boar's Head entered and finally put a stop to their speculations by informing them that a friend in the bar had just intimated to him that a person, answering the description of his wife, had been seen wandering on the banks of the Clyde, near the Dominies hole, in a seemingly distracted state! This piece of intelligence was received with open-mouthed consternation, by the whole company, which had considerably increased from the time of Willie's arrival; and which, for a moment, seemed to baffle their soothing endeavors and tippling propensities.

Plans, however, were immediately concocted to search the Clyde, on the following morning, with a proposition that they should assemble early for the purpose.

Willie, almost overwhelmed with grief and whisky, sang the double dirge of his two wives to the tune of another half pint, by the way of drowning his sorrows in the sea of forgetfulness, when nigh to midnight he returned to his deserted home, rather in a zig-zag manner, his legs often running off with his body against the dictates of his best mental calculations. Had it not been for a watchman, he might have staggered into one of the clay-pits, and been drowned before his own door. Home he got however, but not being capacitated to undress, he tumbled into bed wholesale, and was soon beyond the reach of thought, dreams, or sorrowful reflection.

His physical system suffering from the effects of debauchery, in a few hours broke the spell; and Willie feeling himself cold, awoke from the confusion of drunkenness with the doubtful recollections of his own identity, till his reason gradually dawning upon veterans in the Boar's Head, clay-pits, watchmen, and a thousand and one crude ideas of the past brought the remembrance of Bell faintly before him, and all the realities of her mysterious disappearance. Turning himself round to search out his whereabouts and to ascertain the truth of being in his own domicile, which his bewildered imagination faintly recognized, he there beheld betwixt him and the window, the form of his beloved wife, standing erect before him, reaching up her hands as if in the act of saving herself from a watery grave, with a countenance frightfully distorted. Willie had seen many a strange sight, and had been one of the forlorn hope at the siege of Gusnee, who first gained the ramparts of that citidal. Yet, his courage entirely failed him, and falling before the influence of his debauched and otherwise confused energies, he swooned insensibly into a fit of delirium tremens.

The bright rays of the morning sun shed its invigorating beams throughout his dwelling, e'er he recovered from the stupefaction of his specter-vision, in which, with his wife and a thousand blue-devils, he had been arrested, tried for murder, and was about to expiate his crime, when, in the horrors of death, he awoke from a world of tormentors, to gaze on the old chair, the tea arrangements, all as they stood twenty four hours before.

The first thing he did, when he got out of bed, was to examine the fastening of the door. Finding it bolted, as he imagined he had left it the previous evening, and glancing over the question of the correctness of the apparition he determined in his own mind to keep the secret to himself, until he was satisfied as to the certainty of his wife's decease.

His associates, true to their promise, called upon him about noon, and, after partaking of a jolly bumper of whisky each, they set off for the Clyde.

Glasgow Green, during the summer months, is a beautifully decorated public ground, comprising more than five hundred acres, along the borders of which, the river Clyde winds its majestic waters. Intersecting are finely graveled walks, shaded on each side with tall beech and elm trees, and beautified with a large monument erected to the memorable Nelson of Trafalgar-notoriety. There are, also, beautifully enclosed mineral springs, known by the name of Aaron's Wells; and, on the margin of the river stands a stately, solemn-looking building, called the Dead-house, where boats, creepers, baths, and other apparatus are always in readiness in case of accident, with attendants to look after the unfortunate. Rewards are also given to any person who may, in time of danger, save a life, or otherwise secure the body afterwards. To this place, Willie and his friends were approaching, augmented considerably in number by the love of reward as well as sympathy on the part of the bereaved friends. When the superintendent got notice, the boats were manned and soon fitted-out with creepers and harpoons for the search, and as quickly plied around the turn of the peat-bog, to the fatal hole where Dominie Sampson ended his last struggle with a weary, worthless world. Creeper after creeper was thrown in the water and drawn to the surface, and many a tree root was raised from its sand-bed, and as quickly dropped in disappointment. From Rutherglen bridge to the jail, no place was left unsearched; but no body could be found, except the carcass of a dog, which not coming within the precincts of the mortality-reward bill, was left a prey to the devouring fishes.

Weary with fatigue, and the day being pretty far spent, they gave up the search as fruitless; and poor, forlorn, heart-broken Willie returned to his cheerless home, more disconsolate than ever; and with all his senses to think over what might be his best course to pursue. In the multitude of his thoughts, he knew not one to whom he could unbosom his mind, particularly so, as it was burdened with a piece of intelligence which the credulous would sport with. Calculating on his own former infidelity respecting the unseen and spiritual world, he knew that his secret, though true to a certainty, would submit him to the derision of all his acquaintances, except Jamie Strange. To him he repaired and told him his wonderful tale of the apparition, the previous evening.

Jamie heard it with open mouth, and corroborated the truthfulness of the declaration, by a number of strange circumstances which had come under his own observation, and which none but himself knew to be true.

Mrs. Strange having observed something strange in her husband's appearance after Willie had left, inquired if there was any intelligence of Bell being found, Jamie looking as profound as Newton, when he discovered the Georgium Sidus, waived his wife into the room, and after securing the door, told her the tale, with due emphasis imitating the figure of the apparition, as it stretched and yawned before Willie, in such a ghostly way, that had Mrs. Strange been a weakly minded woman, she certainly would have felt the same sensations physically by representation as Willie did from reality.

The strange revelation being ended, she raised her eyes to the ceiling, by no means reverentially, conveying one of those looks to her husband, which indicated surprise and discovery, and without making a reply, lost no time in paying a visit to her old friend, whom she found stretched on his bed of sorrow.

The description of his dwelling, was what is called a mid room, having a concealed bed-place, and one sleeping apartment. which was so constructed, as to connect with the adjoining house, by a small partition, leaving little more room than for a bed. In this recess Mrs. Strange looked. when to her utter consternation she beheld the body of the much lamented Bell, lying in the corner behind the door. Horror and suspicion seized her mind, and the evil genii of the dwelling whispered in her ear, that Willie had taken away her life by an unlucky hit of his iron hand.

Passing away from the scene of her discovery unobserved, and making a few evasive remarks to Willie, whom she viewed as a murderer. she quitted the house trembling as if she had the ague, and hastening over to her husband, communicated the direful intelligence, with all that feeling, which a good heart could show, for the fate of the one, and the death of the other.

Jamie, after hearing the discovery of his wife, stood musing like a statue, on the circumstances of the past day upon the water; and calling to remembrance the anxiety of Willie, when the dog was entangled in the creeper ere it was drawn to the surface, when it was thought to be Bell, could not let himself believe that such expressions of mental agony could have been dissembled so far, without betraying something very different than that which he had observed in his countenance, had Willie been the murderer as supposed; and particularly, when he thought of the story of the apparition which appeared to him so palpable, when narrated by Willie, which was told with so much appearance of serenity, he concluded if Bell was dead, she must have died by her own hand.

To end the doubt, however, Jamie was determined to find it out, and, in rapid haste, made off to Willie's house, where looking into the recess, he perceived what his wife had described. Armed with more fortitude, he reached his hand over upon her body and found it warm, and her pulse beating.

Willie, unconscious of suspicion, raised his head to see who had entered, when Jamie, in regular pantomimic gesture, pointed to the recess. Up he started, and both, as if struck with electricity, surveyed the sleeping beauty in her retirement. Willie, overjoyed at such an unexpected discovery, soon broke on his wife's slumbers, by his expressions of surprise and gladness, who, drawing herself up to a sitting posture, and rubbing her red eyes, soon stood before them, making the inquiries why he had not taken his breakfast and how the fire came to be burnt out? Willie could wait for no further interrogations, but wrapped in the feeling of her restoration, clasped her in his arms, perfectly overjoyed, and kissed her scorched mouth, which smelt like the bung-hole of an old whisky keg. In the meanwhile, Jamie searched the recess and found an empty bottle below the pillow, and some bread and cheese, which he laid on the table.

The first expression of thankfulness being over, Bell, anxious to relieve Willie's mind concerning her disappearance the day before, made her apology to the following effect:

"You see, Willie," said she, "when I tapped on your window to come to breakfast, I had an errand down to Balaam's Pass, and as you were not very startling, I thought I might be back by the time you got up to the house. So you see, on the road I fell in with your old comrade and shopmate, Pete Lawson, my ain Bob's brother, who would have me, very much against my will, right or wrong, go and see his wife, who had brought home a gallant braw son that morning. So we had a good dram on the head of the concern, and I could not come home, and Pete, poor lad, could not leave his wife to come for you,—for I am sure he would have loved to have had you with us. So home I come, last night, to my own house with a half-mutchin to give you a glass, when there you lay drunk on the bed, so I just took a sup myself, and crept into the empty bed, not to disturb your lordship.

"So Willie, that's the whole affair, just as it happened. Indeed, I thought you were angry at me, and for that reason I did not speak."

Willie, well pleased with the explanation, frankly forgave her all she had done, and Bell kissed Willie and praised him, as one of the best men round all the clay-holes.

The discovery of her ladyship soon got wing; and those who had toiled hard to find her in the river, dropped in, one by one, until the house was filled, each one more hearty than another in their congratulations on the happy event. The whisky went merrily round, and every one present told their feelings, and expressed their sympathies for the lost one! Bell hearing how much she was thought of and extolled when dead, joined heartily in the glowing affections of her well-wishers. And Willie, overjoyed, feeling the warmth of connubial love, kindling his old frame with youthful vigor, declared that the present misunderstanding was just another beginning of new feelings and friendship—never to be forgotten—with gratitude on his part.

The sun set on their carnival at the shrine of Bacchus, and next day, to the admiration of the sons of Mars, Willie and Bell went arm in arm to the Boar's Head tavern, followed by a lengthy train of old veterans, stumping along on their wooden legs, and waving their iron arms in joyful expression of the happy pair whom fate had joined with a double tie.

A BUNCH OF DAISIES.

"Come then, come in quickly, Ernest," said Madame de Breuil to her nephew, three months afterwards; "come and assist me to do the honors of my humble manor-house to my brilliant visitors. I hope you will be rewarded for your kindness in giving me the time you would otherwise have spent at the German spas, or in Switzerland. But now go and dress yourself, for it is eleven o'clock, and we will breakfast at twelve. Come down armed at all points, my nephew, for you will find people worth exerting yourself for, I can assure you."

"Whom have you with you, aunt?" he inquired.

"First and formost, then," she replied, "my old and faithful knight, M. de Marvel, then Le Prangy, the young poet Lucien d'Ervilliers, who writes those beautiful verses, of which I can never understand the meaning, but I only admire them the more for that reason; La Countess de Sauvray, that amiable canoness, who is so agreeable that one forgives her for being a little blue, and acknowledging to having reached her thirty-second year. And then—and then, who else? My god-daughter, Louise, Madame d'Aubrielle, a charming woman of six-and-twenty, with whom you are not acquainted, though I have often spoken to you about her, and with whom you must take care not to fall in love, as you would only loose your time and pains. I think that this is a fortunate circumstance for you, as you can continue to sigh in peace for your unknown, your heroine of the diligence; you are quite safe from the charms of our handsome widow."

"Ah, then she is a widow!" exclaimed Ernest.

"Yes, it is quite a romance," replied the countess. "M. de Charny, her father, who was a friend of my family, lost everything during his emigration. Returning to France at the time of the Empire, he committed the folly of marrying a young girl, who, though handsome and well-born, had no fortune; he died two years afterwards, leaving the poor thing to weep for him, and her baby in the cradle. When he was dying he commended these dear objects of his affection to his friend, the Marquis d'Aubrielle, who had emigrated as well as M. de Charny, but who had before him returned to France, and, more fortunate, had become one of the richest landed proprietors in Normandy.

"M. d'Aubrielle did not fail in the mission confided to him by his dying friend. He surrounded the orphan and widow, with most delicate attentions, performed all his acts of kindness in such a manner as to disguise the obligation, and found means of assisting, without humiliating them by his bounty. The little Louise grew up under this devoted, affectionate patronage, and learned to feel almost a daughter's love for her benefactor. Perhaps the marquis had expected to have awakened a warmer feeling in the heart of Madame de Charny. She was young and still fair, but she remained faithful to the memory of him who had first won her; and M. d'Aubrielle knew how to conceal what mingled with the generous care of the widow of his friend.

"However, the health of the poor lady continued to decline. Towards 1823 she felt herself seriously ill. One evening M. d'Aubrielle came to spend some hours with her. She was suffering from fever, and a dry, nervous cough racked her chest. Her eyes shone with unnatural lustre, and rested with a melancholy earnestness on her daughter Louise, whose whole mind seemed occupied by a piece of embroidery on which she was employed. Louise soon went to bed. M. d'Aubrielle, who had discovered and understood the mother's feelings, drew his chair close to the couch of the invalid, and taking one of her burning hands in his, asked her permission to espouse her daughter. She thanked him with one of those looks that belong only to a mother; but the marquis was past fifty, and although he had still a fine figure and a noble air, Madame de Charny felt alarmed at such a wide difference in age, and whilst she expressed her gratitude for the offer, she asked for time, spoke of the youth of Louise, promised to consult her—in short, gave but evasive answers.

"Louise, whose little room was close to the saloon, had overheard the offer made by M. d'Aubrielle. Although scarcely past her childhood, misfortune had ripened her mind and formed her heart. She understood it all—the state of her mother's health, her wish to see her child married, the scruples which withheld her cordial assent to the proposal of the marquis—and she settled in her own mind the line of conduct she intended to pursue. From this moment she showed so much anxiety to please the marquis, so warm a friendship for him, and always appeared so delighted to see him, was grieved when he allowed a few days to elapse between his visits, spoke of him with so much enthusiasm, praised his good qualities so judiciously, his art of making every one near him happy, that her mother was deceived; and the following year, when she was unable to leave her bed, and had only a few days to live, she could, without scruple or misgiving, place the hand of her daughter in that of M. d'Aubrielle, bless them both with her latest breath, and die content with the prospects of her child.

"Louise and the marquis wept their loss together, and this community of grief completed the union of their hearts and of their destinies; so that, although some time afterwards there was a change in the situation of Mademoiselle de Charny (as the act of indemnity restored to her part of her father's fortune), and M. d'Aubrielle, true to his character of self-abnegation and devotion, offered to give her back her promise, and to leave her free, she looked at him with a face of blank astonishment, and demanded if in his eyes a miserable question of money matters could change their feelings towards each other, and the wish of her dying mother?

"Too happy to be convinced of the unalterable attachment of Louise, M. d'Aubrielle did not insist in restoring her her liberty, and some months later led to the altar, not a portionless orphan, but an heiress.

"The conduct of Louise as a married woman was admirable. Although their united fortunes would have enabled them to live in splendor in Paris, she, believing that a gay, dissipated life would ill suit the marquis, who was now approaching his sixtieth year, installed herself in his old château, declaring that she preferred the country.

"She made a most amiable lady of the manor, for she was religious, and her charity was unbounded; so she was adored and blessed by the peasantry for thirty miles around the château, which she only left to visit the relations of M. d'Aubrielle in Normandy, or occasionally to spend a few weeks in Paris.

"It is now two years since the marquis died, leaving her his whole fortune. She mourned his loss sincerely as her best and truest friend; and it is only in answer to my urgent entreaties that she has now consented to pay me a visit, as I think she requires a little variety. You will be introduced to her in another hour, Ernest, and I pray you to put your affability into its Sunday dress, to meet her."

"And you say that her name is Louise?" mused Ernest; "that her husband was old?—that they sometimes went to visit relations in Normandy?"

"Oh, I see where you are!" exclaimed his aunt. "Your imagination has already set out on a wild-goose chase. But spare it this useless journey. In the first place, as far as I can remember, Louise and her husband did not stir from their château in the year you are thinking of; and even if there was any foundation for your conjecture, if the lady you are going to be introduced to is your mysterious traveling companion, you are much to be pitied, for, to speak plainly to you, I am sure my poor god-daughter has some love affair on her mind, a romantic, secret, unhappy attachment, which is crossed by some terrible impediment. She has never uttered a syllable to me on the subject, but I am, nevertheless, convinced that it is so. She is low-spirited, dreamy, and often restless. When I advise her to marry again, she replies, 'Never!' and sigh as if her heart were breaking. So you see, you and Louise will meet on equal terms, and that you will find her as insensible to your affability as you can possibly be to her beauty."

"Well, that will suit admirably," said Ernest, who felt rather piqued already, without knowing why. "But you, who are so kind, and know so well what to say, must do her the same good office that you have just done for me. She must be made aware, vaguely, that my heart is not free; there will be less restraint then upon our intimacy."

"And your self-love will be properly protected," laughed the amused dowager. "It would indeed be a shocking affair if a pretty woman should suspect you of sighing for her, without being sure that she adored you!"

Ernest colored, stammered, and took instant refuge in his dressing-room. Whilst occupied with the business of the toilet, he could not help thinking more than he cared to do about the lady to whom he would so shortly be introduced.

"A sentimental prude!" thought he; "and my poor aunt imagines that I am going to tumble all at once in love with her. In love! Can I ever be so again? How happy should I be if I could, even at the risk of some suffering! Who knows, however, but that she may be the same person? Who if I may not find some trace, some trait, by which I can recall to my mind my unknown? It is three years since we met. Should I hope, or should I fear it?"

Ye, who have said that this world has no pleasure.
Gaze on the father who weeps o'er his boy,
Gaze on the mother who smiles on her treasure,
And own that on earth there is fullness of joy.

REVELATIONS TO SUIT THE TIMES.

OR THE QUESTION OF APPEALING "TO THE LAW AND TO THE TESTIMONY."

What we particularly desire to demonstrate in this article, is, that it is part of the policy and programme of the Heavens to raise up leaders of Religions amongst mankind, and inspire them with truths more or less freed from error, in exact proportion to the condition of the age or the race to whom they are sent. Which truths are necessarily anything but "the way, the truth and the light" to later and more advanced times.

In this light we view all the great founders of national faiths as inspired and raised up for their work, and though far from being equally illuminated with divine truth, yet equally sent by divine providence for the good of the class to which they belonged. Among these, we may enumerate Zoroaster the Persian reformer, Confucius the great Chinese, and the great founders or chief promoters of Hindooism, Mohammedism, and even Roman Catholicism itself.

God, we say, has raised up these men for the sake of humanity: raised them up and supported them and their creed, by a propitious providence, which is clearly to be seen in the history of their lives,—not that God has desired to impart to mankind the false and ignorant conceptions of sacred matters with which these faiths have abounded; but He has had to take mankind where He found them, and give them the highest kind of truths that they could, in their ignorant condition, appreciate and believe in. In this light, we believe that God has not merely permitted old religions to exist, but that they have been intentionally designed and imparted for the world's best good. As these religions have contained more or less falsehood intermixed with a portion of truth, the question will arise, how can God designedly have favored the promulgation of that which is not all truth. We reply on the same principle that we can sometimes permit the teaching of that which is untrue ourselves, and not only be justified but praise-worthy. We tell our children that they were "dug up out of a parsley bed" or something equally untrue; in doing this all admit we act, wisely and righteously, because common sense demands the withholding from children the facts of procreation. So we hold that God has had to act, for to Him mankind are but earth's little children. To reveal to them in a semi-civilized condition, truths which it requires the highest spiritual culture to understand, would, indeed be a perversion of all wisdom, and throwing pearls before swine; hence religious leaders each just a little ahead of their time, have been inspired with truth sufficient, to suit their age. Commencing with some, whose religious ideas were very materialized and degraded. But as ages have rolled along and civilization has progressed, men have successively been raised up, whose souls have been fired with higher and still higher truths, each throwing away something of the falsehood of the past, and each coming nearer to the naked, unadulterated truth

Mankind, on the road to their present state of civilization have passed through every condition, from the most bloody-minded, filthy and degraded, to that where they can sense some of the highest and divinest truths. In all these stages, they have been equally, as to their origin, God's children. Deity has been equally bound to protect and lead them along at one time as another. There has been no period when God could say, "they are too low for my love and help." Hence, they have had to be taken just where they were, and as they were, and made the best of; consequently an order of revelations have had to be given to them at each period, spiritually speaking, just a little ahead of where they then stood. This has necessitated the interblending of truth and error.

The highest wisdom teaches that the best way to educate any race or people is through their own traditions. Taking men of their own class, whose conceptions are a little ahead of their times, and inspiring them to promulgate their ideas associated with such traditions as are natural for the people to believe. Thus educating them through themselves and leading them on a step further.

Take for instance the principles taught by Jesus Christ. He came just as soon as the world could understand a little of the power and beauty of his doctrines. He would have been fearfully out of place in Moses' times. In rude and barbarian periods, the human heart is always revengeful. It cannot possibly conceive of the loftiness and superiority of such principles as forgiveness and mercy; or the divine power of love. Indeed, they are hardly realized to-day. In such times, the utmost men can sense, is justice, because there is something stern and unrelenting about justice. Talk to a Red Indian about forgiving an enemy. Tell him that Jesus Christ taught it, and he will stare at you open-mouthed, and conclude in his own mind that Jesus Christ was a great coward, and you, too, for believing in such womanish doctrines. He will think you are afraid. "Why else do do you forgive?" He can only explain forgiveness on the principle of fear. Now, let God desire to elevate the race when in this condition, and of necessity, He must do as He did to untutored Israel in the wilderness, reveal Himself as a God of wrath and justice—a God taking bloody vengeance upon His foes. Such a God they can understand and appreciate, because He is akin to their own low nature. In this way, a hold can be obtained upon their minds, while a few divine and nobler principles are intermixed. And thus a lower form of religion—like that of the Law given by Moses, becomes "a school-master to bring them to Christ."

How much the low natures of mankind have been studied and propitiated in the impartation of Divine Revelation, is seen in Moses' bloody rule of "an eye" torn out of the head "for an eye," "a tooth" dragged out of the mouth "for a tooth." And a life for a life. What is more revolting to a refined spirit than such doctrines? and yet these principles—absolutely brutal, compared to those of Christ—were the highest and holiest that people could appreciate; and being the highest they could obey understandingly, the divinest wisdom was manifested in framing them no better than they were.

On this principle, we hold that Revelations have always been given. No matter how great the prophet, he is never a vehicle for greater light than his age can receive. Hence the shortsightedness of eternally appealing "to the law and to the testimony" as we are now being urged by our friends who have come to set us right; but who, certainly, will yet understand the sublime expansiveness of their great father's doctrines better. What is "the law and the testimony" of any past period, but a compound of some additional light that was given to suit the new times, with just as much of the old leaven wisely left in as the people's condition demanded?

It was appealing to the law and to the testimony that made the world for two thousand years believe, in spite of their senses, that the sun went round the earth, and that God made the light first and the sun afterwards—just because the Bible said so. And this same appealing "to the law and to the testimony" makes men believe, to-day, that death was never introduced till Adam fell; when the very rocks that were created for Adam to walk upon, were composed of the bodies of millions of little creatures, swept by the hand of death itself into their position. When the bowels of the earth over which he and all his descendents have roamed, is packed every layer with the dead bodies of the innumerable species that preceded him; filled, we say, with tokens of death, death! DEATH! from the earth's surface to its core.

It is appealing to the "law and to the testimony" that enables one man, so cleverly, to prove that Utah is accursed of God, because Jeremiah spoke of some people who should be led to "a SALT LAND not inhabited;" and it is appealing to the "law and to the testimony" that enables another to prove Utah is God's own place, because Isaiah spoke of those for whom "the DESERT and the solitary places should rejoice and blossom as the rose:" while the bewildered listener comes to the conclusion that the "law and the testimony" is very much like a fiddle upon which a man can play any tune that suits him. Here, Joseph Smith not dead thirty years, and already men commence to argue in the same wearying sickening way about what he said and what he did not say, as they have done for ages over the meaning of Jesus's words, until the earth has been one dark scene of hate and contention crimsoned with blood. And, so it would be again and again, but for the fact that we are living in an age that will set aside forever these endless sources of contention, by throwing men off "The Books" on to the diviner and far surer testimony of their own souls—that intellectual and spiritual light that grows forever in every man's nature, while Sacred Books are stationary.

For one moment let us ask from whence do all sacred Books and revelations of this or any other age obtain their authority over our individual minds? How, in a word, did we come to accept them as true and divine in the first place; but by submitting them to the light of truth in our own bosoms? It was only so far as they agreed with that inward testimony and intelligence that they were worth anything to us. They then, obtained their authority after all FROM OURSELVES, or from the light of deity within us. If so, that light must be greater than all Books, and Revelations, because it is the touchstone by which we try them, and before which all have to come to be judged. We do not believe in prophets because they say they are divine; neither do we believe in them because of the correctness of their predictions, or their miracles. All this sort of thing can, and has been done by natural gifts without any special divine calling. There is but one infallible way by which the world can judge the divinity of a message, and that is by its tendency to raise us to a higher and a diviner life; by its lifting us out of our earthliness and our selfishness on to a more Heavenly plane. How, for instance, do we know that Jesus is divine? Certainly not because the Books say he was; but, simply, because his principles touch our souls and we feel their loveliness and beauty. Thus, immediately we are taken off the Books on to the testimony of our own hearts. And so with all past revelations, it is only so far as they present truths in harmony with the highest instincts of our natures that they can be true to us. This is the highest evidence that God can give to man, and by which all Apostles, all Prophets and all Sacred Books stand or fall. Why then be manacled forever by Books which get all their authority to us from our very selves? If we began by testing Books and Revelators by the light of Deity enshrined within our souls, why not leave an opening for unlimited inspiration, and go on testing all by the same light? And if, in the growth of our spirits, new and higher light is developed within us on any subject, why not accept it, and leave the books to take care of themselves, and go on, trusting to the same immortal guide within the soul which we accepted in the first place? It is all the test we shall ever need throughout an ever progressive immortality.

Mankind are destined to grow beyond the iron bondage of Sacred Books. They have served a useful purpose in the past, and were adapted to the world's childhood. It was well enough before men had learned that God dwelt in their souls, ready to answer any call for light, to steady poor weak humanity, by chaining it down to the law and the testimony, just as we tie little children to a bed-post for fear they should crawl into danger. That saying of scripture, "To the law and to the testimony" was wisely enough applied then. But men have found out since then that, that wondrous thing, the human soul bears testimony to every divine truth, and can always be relied upon.

We stand upon the threshold of a new age, which will emancipate men from the thraldom of creeds and texts, and teach them to rely upon their own inward perceptions of truth. A blind adherence to past Revelations has ever been in the way of human progress. The doctrine which bases men upon themselves instead of upon cast-iron sayings of Sacred Books, is the only one which can open an illimitable road for truth, and it must prevail. It will be useless to talk to men about the law and the testimony when their souls have soared to higher truths—to inspirations nigher to God than any "law and testimony" ever contained.

In the former part of this article, we endeavored to show that revelations of divine truth have been wisely given, associated with such lower ideas that would give them sufficient hold upon mankind in the period for which they were designed. We will say in addition, that there is no exception to this rule. The reflective mind that goes fearlessly before its God and dares to accept all the truth that He will pour into the soul—no matter what idol of doctrine it may destroy, will see that somethings, given even by God's own Apostles and Prophets, and upon which a great deal of importance has been placed, are only so many pure principles overlaid with something of an earthly nature for the human mind to grasp, till it is strong enough to walk by the pure truth alone. What is, therefore, true of the past, can be true again. We have not yet got further than to the merest beginnings of divine revelation. With greater times, therefore, will come greater conceptions of truth. Old ideas, almost worshipped now, have yet to be stripped of their glory, and "thrown to the moles and to the bats." For truth must go on, revelation and inspirations of heavenly light must increase. They are the natural property of every human spirit. All past Books and Revelations in the way of the grandest, highest and widest conceptions of the human soul must be left on one side, and the intelligence of man uncurbed by anything but pure and unadulterated truth press onward to its destiny.

RETURN OF THE SALT LAKE TELGRAPH.

We draw attention to Mr. Stenhouse's announcement of his intention to publish the Salt Lake Daily Telegraph as a morning paper in this city.

The Telegraph was the first daily paper published in the interest of our community in Utah, and has, from the first, been conducted with praiseworthy energy. When the Ogden movement was started, Mr. Stenhouse threw himself into it with considerable force. Circumstances now rendering the return of the paper advisable, it is proposed to resume its publication in our city—this time as a morning paper.

The Daily and Semi-Weekly Telegraph, as well as the Programme, are excellent advertising mediums. Success to them, as well as to their cotemporaries—there is room for us all.

PEPIN OF FRANCE AND ST. PETER.

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

We come now to the history of the family of Charlemagne. The first dynasty of France, founded by Clovis, dwindled to the possession of mere nominal sovereignty, while the chief power of the realm was wielded by the Mayor of the Palace. This officer stood at the head of the nobility—and he was also the prime minister of the land Among the most renowned of these Mayors of the Merovignian dynasty, as the first kings of France are denominated, was Pepin d' Hersital, Duke of Austrasia. He ruled France for thirty years with great ability. After him came his son Charles Martel, whose glorious victory over the Saracens in 732, checked the career of the Mohammedan empire in Europe. After him came his son Pepin le Bref, who was the father of Charlemagne. Pepin le Bref held dominion in France just at that period, when the Popes of Rome defied the power of the emperors of the East, and in turn were menaced by the Lombards, whose armies threatened to subjugate all Italy. This crisis afforded one of those great opportunities which give birth to new dynasties. It made Pepin king of France, and his son Charlemagne Emperor of the West. Pepin le Bref was a necessity to the church, and as he possessed the power of the king, the Pope conferred upon him the title which put an end to the reign of the descendants of Clovis as kings of France.

In the critical juncture of the world's affairs, upon which we have dwelt in our former illustrations, the rising of the family of Charlemagne was deemed by the successors of St. Peter, a special providence. The "star of empire" of this family, not only brought them up to be kings of France, but also to succeed the descendants of Constantine the Great, striking entirely out of the West, the old dominion of the Cæsars. From their advent the injunction, "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's" become obsolete. The form became, convertible to, Render unto Charlemagne, etc.

A very curious illustration of the views of St. Peter upon this subject, was given by his medium, the Pope of Rome, after the ascension of Pepin le Bref, which deserves consideration, as something more important than a mere deception of the Priesthood. Pope Stephen the Third, acting very much in the character of a medium, addressed to King Pepin and his sons, letters which he said were written by the Virgin, Angels, Saints, Martyrs and Apostles. The chief of the Apostles wrote thus:

"I Peter, called to the Apostleship by Jesus Christ, the Son of the Living God, beseech you, Pepin Charles Charlemagne, and you lords, clerical and lay, of the kingdom of France, not to permit my city of Rome, and my people to be longer rent by the Lombards, if you wish to shun the tearing of your bodies and souls in eternal fire, by the forks of Satan.

"I command you to prevent the residue of the flock which the Lord has confided to me, from being dispersed, if you do not wish he should reject and disperse you, as he did the children of Israel.

"Do not abandon yourselves to a criminal indifference, but obey me promptly. Thus you will surmount all your enemies in this world; you shall live many years, eating the good things of the earth, and after your death you shall obtain eternal life. Otherwise, know that by the authority of the Holy Trinity—in the name of my Apostleship, you shall be deprived for ever of the kingdom of God."

Considered as a mere literal fragment of history, this curious document sent down from heaven by the Apostle Peter, to Charlemagne and his father, is about of the same value as the sacred scroll brought to Mohammed by the Angel Gabriel. But these marvellous documents, Korans and Testaments have so wonderfully influenced the affairs of the world, that it is not philosophical to treat them with a cramped infidelity, for even the superstitions of people, and the tricks of Priesthoods, must be treated with historical wisdom. Moreover it is very difficult to say how much we ought to consider, in these matters, as mere tricks, and how much to be genuine superstition of the times, and the mediumistic inspirations of Priesthoods, who, believing themselves the mouthpieces of heaven, speak as from the invisible, hiding from the vulgar the modus operandi of their operations, which perhaps, originated in their own minds. Nor can we say how much had merely that origin, or how much these mouthpieces gave the expressions of a providential will. The curious letter of St. Peter is as a literal document worth nothing, but its prophecies were fulfilled; Pepin and Charlemagne were rewarded with empire for coming to the aid of St. Peter, and a long reign followed, especially that of Charlemagne, while it aroused all France to fly to the rescue of the Pope. The relics of the Saints were only dry bones, which the Priest Lanfranc caused to be borne before the army of William the Conqueror, when he invaded England, but there was more than a trick—there was practical wisdom, and much genuine faith which conceived that solemn pageantry. It helped the priest to the primateship, and William to the conquest of England: so now the epistle of St. Peter helped Pepin and his son Charlemagne to empire. Moreover the pageantries of the bones of Saints, and miraculous writings, while they will somewhat expose to our readers the craft, as they may deem of Priests, will also show how vastly they have influenced human affairs, and to illustrate history is our design.

The sympathy of the family of Charlemagne for the Church, and consequently their fitness for its purposes, is to be explained by their identity with the Priesthood.

The head of this family was Arnulf, Bishop of Metz, and his son Chlodulf succeeded him to that See. Arnulf's brother was abbot of Bobbio, his grandson, St. Wandril, and his whole family closely allied with St. Ledger. Charloman, Pepin le Bref's brother, became a monk, his other brothers are, one Archbishop of Rouen, the other abbot of St. Dennis; Charlemagne's cousin was St. Gulielmus, the great Saint of the South, and other members of the family were also in the Priesthood. In the rising therefore, of the dynasty of Pepin and Charlemagne, the Church had a vast power thrown directly over to its side, which more than made up for the loss of the successors of Constantine.

There were other advantages in the rise of the house of Arnulf, Bishop of Metz, for while on the one hand, it was so identified with the Church, the members of the family were settled in the most Germanized country of Gaul. The armies of Charles Martel, Pepin, and Charlemagne were chiefly of German element, and they made their armies Christians, who were before Pagans. Indeed the great emperor not only established a French dynasty, but also created a Germany, which till his day had no political existence.

Charloman, the brother of Pepin le Bref, was Duke of the Franks, and during his reign he not only sought to establish in Gaul the authority of the Church, but to reform the clergy. Though a great prince he possessed more of the bias of the priest, and at length he resolved on his retirement into holy orders. Having made a pilgrimage to Rome and enriched the See of St. Peter, he received of the Pope the frock of St. Benedict, and shut himself up in a monastry, which he built in a vast forest. It was the famous abbey of Fulda. To humble his earthly pride, and "save his soul from the flames of hell" he served in the kitchen, took care of the stables and labored in the garden.

After the retirement of Duke Charloman, his brother Pepin became absolute master of France, and Pope Zachary encouraging his ambition, authorized him to assume the title of King, and dispossess the family of Clovis. Soon after this the King of the Lombards invaded the territory of Rome and forced the inhabitants to recognize him as sovereign. Stephen the Third, who had succeeded Pope Zachary, in his strait, called upon Pepin, King of the Franks. The Pope also, to better accomplish the deliverance of Rome, took a journey into France, the safety of which was secured through the territory of the Lombards by the presence of the ambassadors of Pepin. On the road he was taken sick, and carried to the Church of St. Dennis, where he is said to have been healed by a miracle wrought in person by St. Dennis himself. After this, Pope Stephen, in a solemn festival consecrated Pepin, his two sons Charlemagne and Charloman, and his wife Bertrade. Having laid hands upon them, the Pope declared in the name of God, that the Franks and their descendants were prohibited under pain of eternal damnation from choosing Kings of another race.

The war of Italy was now resolved upon by the French parliament, and the King crossed the Alps at the head of numerous troops, and forced Astolphus, King of the Lombards, to render the Holy See entire satisfaction. But no sooner had the French army returned to their own country, than Astolphus broke his faith and besieged Rome. It was at this critical period that the miraculous letters of the Saints, and the Apostle Peter, from which we have extracted, were addressed to King Pepin. The French armies flew to obey the chief of the Apostles, and beneath their conquering arms the Lombard power fell. Ravenna Rimini, and twenty other cities gave their keys to the abbot of Fulrad, counselor of the King of the Franks, who deposited them with a deed of gift from Pepin, upon the confession of St. Peter. This was the origin of the temporal power of the Church of Rome. King Pepin had thus fulfilled his part; St. Peter kept his promise and Charlemagne the son of Pepin became the founder of a new empire of the West.

The biography of this mighty prince—the most illustrious man of the middle ages, will follow in our next chapter.

A UTAH WOMAN'S THOUGHTS.

ON WOMANLY EMPLOYMENTS, MARRIAGE ETC.

CONCLUDED.

In our last we gave our correspondent's ideas upon womanly employments, in this we present her thoughts upon marriage, etc.

Marriage is not the grand ultimatum of woman's existence. In cases where she is truly wedded, her usefulness is greatly increased by being united with a co-worker in a good cause, but let marriage be the aim to a worthy object, and not the object aimed at.

The relationship existing between husband and wife should not be one of dependence, or independence, but of "inter-dependence," mutually looking to the other for strength and encouragement, for happiness in its truest sense—a united desire to accomplish good.

Where, then, the room for superiority or inferiority? Their object is one.

The Revolution seems to think, that women will only win by battling for their rights. The battle-axe is good, in extreme cases; but have not women "tools of a sharper edge and not so massive a form," which can be wielded with grace and dexterity.

Where women are oppressed, or patronized, is it not in a great degree their own fault?

The Lords of Creation grow supercilious sometimes; then again they sympathize so tenderly with the weaker sex. Could women only be strong enough to prove they need no sympathy on account of weakness, and that to be patronized was an injustice to them, men, whole-souled men, would eagerly respond to their sentiment, for they would plainly see they then had helpers and co-workers, not dependents, who looked to them for every thought, but free agents who could think for themselves, and if necessary, for them too. Woman's natural instincts are to assist man, not to raise a battery against him. Hence, as a free agent, she would naturally become an auxiliary, not an opponent of man.

Let woman qualify herself to fill any position in life. Let her aim be to excel in moral excellence, be devotional, seek unremittingly spiritual guidance; then indeed is she strong to battle for the right, for she does not lean upon the arm of flesh, her "feet are upon earth, but her head is among the stars." A halo of light surrounds her, and with her presence comes joy and sunshine. Superiority rests with Godliness, and he or she who approaches nearest the Godlike is the superior.

Here we have some noble sentiments, and here has our correspondent truly hit the question, which is the superior sex?—neither are superior, but as they approach nigher to divinity of character.

It will be seen that the writer believes that "marriage is not the ultimatum of a woman's existence." This is true, but no woman can be a perfect woman until the wifely and motherly qualities are developed in her nature; and the same, in an opposite way, can be said of man. He is not a complete man till the instincts of a husband and father are developed within him. Marriage is, indeed, not the ultimatum of either man or woman's existence; but neither can know a fullness of happiness, nor can they have all the qualities of their natures brought out but by it. And, therefore, according to our sublime theology no one can be saved without marriage or until these powers are developed within them; because a portion of their being is asleep and dormant, and they are, necessarilly imperfect, and, being imperfect, can neither know Heaven themselves nor create it around them. Thus, although marriage is not the ultimatum of our existence, we cannot reach that ultimatum without it, and it is, therfore, pretty much the same thing.

In reference to our correspondent's remarks on "patronizing" women, we must admit that we have seen some of it done in our time. We have heard some talk as though women were creatures especially created for men's glory—creatures upon whom he would condescendingly put down his hand, to lift them up and save them. Save them, indeed, as if man could be saved himself into a fullness of happiness either here or hereafter without a woman's aid. For the matter of eternal happiness and progress—which we take to be salvation—it takes fathers, mothers and children all to aid one another. "The head cannot say to the foot: 'I have no need of thee.'" It has often said it, by-the-by, but then, of course, it has been foolish enough for so doing. Up the ladder of life we all go together or we never go at all. Husbands, wives and children, "all pulling on the same rope." In our estimation, the wife is as much needed to refine, to sanctify and to ennoble the husband, as the husband the wife. He brings his qualities of strength and energy, and she her soul of love, devotion and grace, to make a strong and perfect circle in which Heaven may dwell; and the Heaven then made is just as much of her creating as his, or it is a spurious heaven anyway. Man's place is undoubtedly to lead; he is, in a sense, the head; but there never was a head upon earth yet intended by God to lead without the aid of the wisdom and light invested in the other members of the body. So we view the husband's position, while his is the deciding power, he needs the intelligence and experience garnered up by his wife to enable him properly to steer the family bark.

Husbands and wives will all have to confess yet that they are mutually dependent on each other's influences, for perfection of character and actual growth of soul. In which sense, while it is clear that the wife is "saved" by the husband, it is no less evident that the husband is "saved" by the wife—and patronizing, or "looking-down" on either side is simply absurd.

MY VISIT TO NAUVOO.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

Three years ago, on the last day of April, I left Salt Lake City to take a professional tour through the Eastern States.

I had resolved before my return to visit Nauvoo; for that sacred city of the Saints possessed so many historical reminiscences that any author on the lookout for subject connected with the "peculiar people" of modern times, would have marked outi n his programme "A visit to Nauvoo," as a unique item. But I was more than an author who had long designed to write the history of the great "Latter-day work" and the Mormon Commonwealth. I was also, as a disciple of Joseph Smith, interested by a thousand tender thoughts, in the past, the present, and the future of Nauvoo.

I had, moreover, resolved to see the Prophet's first wife and his sons, especially David, the youngest, for whom this people have in times pastparticularly manifested remarkable affection. I have never sought to hide my semi-idolatry for "Joseph the Martyr." Nor is this wonderful, for a poet and a seer are very much akin by nature, and the old proverb has it, "Birds of a feather flock together." It might, therefore, be expected that I should be, as I have been, somewhat a fanatic on the subject of Joseph Smith. Towards his family I entertained a similar reverence by association; and, I have no doubt, had I found on my landing at Nauvoo a dog that Joseph's hand had fed, we should forthwith have taken our breakfast together on the banks of the river, and I should have experienced a dreamer's fancy of honor in the companionship, especially had the dog been a noble creature. The reader can imagine, then, what reverence filled my mind in connection with the proposed visit to Nauvoo. Indeed, thousands in Utah can consult their own hearts and fancies of years to find what an interesting and sanctified subject Nauvoo and its beautiful temple set upon a hill, has been. The feelings of the Saints upon the matter have been much like the reverence of the Jews for Jerusalem and the temple of Solomon, which even eighteen hundred years of exile has not crushed out of their hearts. So away with me, companions of the old days, to Nauvoo, the ancient city of the Saints.

I was on my way for a visit to Nauvoo. Pleasant reveries occupied my mind; tender emotions were in my heart towards the family of the Martyr. Keokuk was reached, and there I stayed for the night. The next morning I started for Nauvoo. As the train dashed along I felt an eager suspense; as I drew near to the city, on the opposite side, a solemn feeling overwhelmed me, such as we experience when approaching the graves of our revered dead. Montrose was reached; on the other side of the river was Nauvoo. I waited awhile for the starting of the ferryboat, which was a primitive concern, very much like the barge on Green River. Ah! I felt then, if never before, that it was the Saints who had created a Nauvoo. They gone, and Nauvoo was no more. That primitive barge told enough! Nauvoo was extinct! But those who had built it up had since founded on the Pacific a little nation.

I landed on the site of the sacred city, but there was no city there. I walked up the banks of the river towards the Historical Mansion House, but on my way met no busy, intelligent citizens. There is, however, a remembrance dimly in my mind of having met on the way near "Sister Emma's," an urchin or two, who were characterized by a very purposeless stare at seeing a stranger; and by the river's side a few miserable hovels, uninhabited. Where then was Nauvoo? When Col. Kane visited it at the time of the exodus, there was a city, though forsaken. He has most graphically described that forsaken city, and had not the traveler been informed of its history since that date, he might still have expected not to have found less nor worse than a city forsaken. True, I was prepared for changes, yet I expected to find Nauvoo. I found not Nauvoo! Not even as much as a city forsaken, not even as much as a small untoombed Ninevah is there to-day where once stood Nauvoo (the beautiful). One, only, palpable relic of the past remains—the Mansion House.

At the Mansion House I put up for the day as a traveler, not a visitor, though I informed the host that I was from Salt Lake City. Mr. Bideman—the present husband of "Sister Emma"—was familiar and communicative. He talked of the sons of the Prophet and spoke of "Old Joe," as he called him, as a remarkable man; and notwithstanding he "Joe'd" him, he professed as much reverence for him as for Moses. Of course I saw the Prophet's widow. She has been, undoubtedly, a remarkable woman. There are not many of her sex of such native strength of character and intellectual keenness. I met her with reverence. I addressed her through the day in the same spirit, and in the same spirit parted from her the next morning. It is a point of honor with me to make Joseph's family a sacred subject My pen shall never touch them with disrespect, even though I have the assurance that they are on the other side of that on which the Prophet stands, and to which I pray that his sons may yet be brought.

But Nauvoo is a different subject. I view that as a conscientious historian, and aim to treat God's records in history concerning the dead cities of the past and the living cities of Utah as a philosopher would treat the great social facts of the age. Historical examples are ever to me of more weight than sectional controversies, and the logic of facts infinitely beyond the logic of books in reaching sound conclusions.

To the hill where once stood the beautiful temple of Nauvoo, on the afternoon of my visit to the dead city, I wended my way in solemn melancholy. There, of that temple, stood not one stone left upon another, and of its foundations there remained not one stone. They were all rooted up, and of the rock of the Nauvoo temple the mansion of the stranger was built close by. It was the finest relic of the dead city. There were some other passable buildings, but the insignificant Nauvoo of the present belongs to the strangers of another faith. Is not that uprooted temple and that dead city a divine record to-day? To me they spoke in infallible language of the direction in which divine providence was exerting itself. Can that record of a dead city and an uprooted temple be twisted? If so, place them by the side of another divine record—the book of great social and national facts—Utah and her hundred and twenty or thirty cities and settlements. I write as a historian; I will not condescend to argue the question on sectional grounds. A legion of angels could not change the direct witness of these facts—a library of books would lie if twisted to prove that God has not been manifested in the history of the exodus from Nauvoo and the growth of the Saints on the Pacific Coast. God has written a daily living record of Himself in the unfolding of our little nationality of Zion in the Rocky Mountains, with its cities and settlements, and that record will be found in a hundred generations to come. Brethren, would you believe it then? Will you see the hand of God in our history then? Will you say that He has cut us off with our dead, then! If you believe not then, looking down, as at this time you will be, upon the great facts of a growing Zion, the future ages will bear record that Joseph Smith is on the Pacific, and nations own that from the Mountains Zion has spread over all the earth. The testimony of a living history as written in the facts of the age will then prove this or disprove it, besides which, all other testimony will be as rags. Could I believe that the God and mission of Joseph Smith have not been perpetuated in the growth of Utah and history of the Saints since their exodus from Nauvoo, I would make short work of Joseph Smith and his testimony, as Luther did of the Bull of the Pope.

INHABITED WORLDS;

OR, PLAIN TALKS ON THE SCIENCES.
No. 3.

In our last talk we referred to the fact that some of our sister planets which journey with us around the sun, had moons to light their nights; and the question arises what is the use of moonlight or, indeed, any kind of light to earths which have nobody upon their surfaces to enjoy it. What would we think of a kitchen with a saucepan on the fire, with a leg of mutton in it about a quarter of million miles from everybody? It would be rather a singular idea, as curious a notion as that of a world with beautiful moonlight nights, and nobody upon it to "meet me by moonlight alone."

It is a well known and very simple fact, that our change of seasons is caused by our earth's revolving around the sun in an oblong circle, its northern end tilted a little on one side, and always pointing to the same part of the heavens. This curious arrangement brings different parts of the earth at regular periods more or less under the influence of the sun; and causes us at some periods of the year to be scorched with heat and at others frozen to death. Now it is an interesting fact that all the planets—except it may be Jupiter—revolve just in this identical way; each a little tilted on one side and in just the same kind of a circle that we do. So that what causes Summer and Winter to our planet must cause the same to them. We also observe that these worlds have days and nights, for they revolve on their axis—or turn their whole surface round to the sun, just as we do once every 24 hours, or thereabouts. And the reflection will arise as with regard to the moonlight,—what do earths that are empty and tenantless want with spring showers, May days or July heat, unless it is to bring up vegetation, produce flowers and ripen food? And what could such things grow for, unless there was somebody upon these worlds to enjoy them? And again what are such beautiful arrangements as successive days and nights, but for the comfort and convenience of such beings as ourselves who need these intervals for work and repose?

In this way we argue that the planets are inhabited, and if them why not the fixed stars, which are so much more beautiful shining in their glory in the upper deep. They are so far away that telescopes which will magnify a score of thousands of times will not make them one particle larger. They are too far off for a magnifying power of that kind to have any effect upon them. Then stretch out the mind to think of those masses of stars which are so far away that they look to powerful telescopes, only like small luminous clouds scattered throughout the universe called nebulæ. Think, if we can, of that great mass of fleecy white which stretches across the heavens at night, called the Milky Way; which is said to be composed entirely of stars in such innumerable myriads, and so far off that they look to our sight like masses of pale white clouds. Think of the whole of these lights as shining and immortalized worlds filled with deathless intelligences; and then let us ask ourselves what a universe do we live in?

When trying to grasp the universe thus, think of that great doctrine of Joseph Smith's which declares that these are, indeed, worlds filled with but one class of intelligent beings, and that species—man, but in varying degrees of progress and intelligence. Oh, what a brotherhood stretching from world to world. What a mighty chain of beings all progressing for ever in civilization, light and truth, and each bringing their quota to make this a universe of light and joy.

MORE ORIGINAL MATTER.

In this number, we present a humorous story by John Lyon, the Poet, which we think will especially please his fellow-countrymen by its graphic reference to Auld Scotland.

We have an entirely new and original composition from Professor O. Pratt, jun., entitled Gertrude Mazurka, for No. 15. We have also just received, from the musical Editor, a composition which he has revised, and pronounces a very fair effort indeed. It is entitled "Do they Pray for me at home?" by Bro. Smyth, of Logan. It will appear after Prof. Pratt's.

THE TWO KINDS OF IMMORTALITY OFFRED TO MAN.

In our last article on "The necessity of an intelligible view of a future life," we presented man with all his beautifying, producing, operative and controlling energies, and asked for a religion whose promise of a future life would call the whole of these powers endlessly into requisition; without which we showed that there could be no immortality of the man—no endless continuance of his being. Let us now present "Christian" and "Mormon" theology on this subject side by side, and ask how far each offers a practical, tangible immortality to man.

With respect to Christian theology, first we reply, that modern religious teachers offer no immortality to that combination of powers and activities that make up our present selves. They only offer it to so much of us as could be employed in contemplating, praising, and adoring the great faculties and works of the Creator. Modern Christianity offers no future existence for the life and development of the faculties, attributes, and creative powers of man. The immortality of our good Christian friends, as painted by themselves, would consist of investigation, wonder, and adoration of the great qualities of Jehovah, but a total disuse and complete oblivion of our own.

A little reflection will make it manifest that a heaven of praise, prayer, and contemplation (to which some, considered rather daring, have added a study of the works of nature), could only employ a very small portion of our energies. Two-thirds of the very elements of our being are of such a character that they could not be employed at such work. If active at all, they must be employed in producing, doing, or bringing about something worthy of praise and admiration themselves. For instance, we could not use our constructive, planning, plotting, or designing powers in prayer or praise. What use would these powers be where Jehovah is henceforth the only worker? What could our decorative, contriving, and arranging faculties employ themselves upon in a prepared and finished heaven, where there is no disorder from beginning to end? What use can we have for our judging and deciding powers where all is considered determined and fixed forever? What shall calculating, proportioning, and adjusting tact be doing there? Where shall our ruling, controlling, and managing desires find their place? Where shall we gratify our propensities for seeking objects for our benevolence, protection, and guidance, where none need anything, and circumstances never change? (The Almighty certainly would not want any benevolence or patronage expended on Him!) Where shall we find difficulties to engage our energies?—where that endless variety so necessary in all objects that engage our minds, without which they clog, sicken, and destroy? Where shall the creations of a humorous and mirthful fancy find its vent? Where shall parental impulses find their room? In fact, where shall the dearest and largest part of our nature (our most pleasurable and life-giving) find play? the deepest cravings of our identical nature their gratification? or our necessities the food? Clearly, in such a heaven they must be dead, dumb, unsatisfied, and unsupplied, or torn out of our natures; or, if they remain, silenced. To man who regards these enriching, satisfying, and life-developing faculties as so much of himself, the immortality offered by modern religious creeds would no more be his immortality than the resurrection of his mere hand or foot could be considered his resurrection from the grave. A host of throbbing impulses ignored and passed over declare this creed no promiser of eternal or continuing life to them. By it heaven is peopled with a set of creatures that cannot be men, for they are without their sources of delight, intelligence, and activity; and men and women (the real men and women we know and feel ourselves to be), are buried for ever in the grave.

Immediately and without hesitation we are compelled to say this species of a future life does not meet our test. It does not tend to nourish, encourage, or develop the faculties and abilities implanted within us. There is nothing life-giving in the prospect. They that believe in it have to run off to poor, earthly, speculative science to fill up the void left within their souls—a want which a loving God, in his religion, would surely have supplied as readily as he would provide a delicate fringe to merely keep dust and excessive light from our tender eyes! It does not meet or fit that impulse given to us by our Creator, which makes our whole being crave for a continuance. They that endeavor to believe in it have to fight the voice of God declaring immortality in every power they set aside. They have to work against a tide of impressions, longings, and aspirations running through their whole beings, and force down upon themselves a belief which no inborn consciousness declares to be true, and for which no craving necessity or love exists within their nature, demonstrating that whoever prepared such principles for man, it is clearly and decisively manifest that it was not that God who has caused in nature such an affinity and suitability to exist between us and everything really intended for our use

But what says "Mormonism" on immortality? It tells us that when God made man and woman, he made them to be identically man and woman throughout eternity; that when God endowed their natures with their peculiar characteristics, he prepared and adapted those qualities for endless expansion and eternal growth.

It teaches us that the relationships of husband and wife are necessarily eternal—that men and women are introduced upon this earth to lay a foundation for that eternal association for which they are suited and intended. They come here to learn themselves and to understand each other; but here they are only acting out on the smallest scale the characteristics of their nature. It teaches that such impulses are implanted within them, with an eye to a boundless future, where they will find their fullest range.

It shows us that the holy Gospel is nothing more nor less than a science how men and women can train their present every-day powers so as to suit that great eternal period. It teaches them to develop the brilliant germs of constructive, designing, or controlling powers, so that eternally as they move along they can surround themselves with all that will bring comfort and delight. It teaches how they can train their souls in Godlike attributes, so that they can create, in that society in which they are destined to move, peace, harmony, and joy.

It informs us that man will recommence his career after death with just as much intelligence, and that he will be surrounded with just as much splendor, refinement, or beauty as he knows by previous efforts how to create. He will have just as much influence, love, and respect as he has knowledge and wisdom to secure; but he will have it then as now; and he will have it eternally open to him, to possess himself of additional intelligence, additional virtue or power. If the virtues of the Gospel are developed in his soul, he will find them an engine of power, influence and dignity. If he has allowed the weeds of corruption, selfishness, or meanness to live unchecked within him, they will be there to hamper and harrass him, and create his daily hell.

It tells us that when the eternal government of heaven is established below, the great race of man will be ruled upon the patriarchal principle, the general law of which is that every man who obeys the principles of celestial life shall preside as a king or priest over his own offspring eternally. But no man will control more that he can attract and retain by the power of love. Consequently, it exhibits a prospect which man can look forward to and understand as the true and natural field, in the eternal future, for the employ of the governmental faculties and great ambitions implanted within him.

"Mormonism," then, presents an intelligible future for the mind to rest upon. It opens out a field where every power and quality of our nature can find its full employ. It says to every artistic or constructive power, "You shall live for ever," and thus it stimulates it into life. It urges on man's finer feelings and sensibilities into progress by opening out an immortality of which they are to be the basework and support. It glorifies the great "moral" principles taught by Jesus, by showing that they are not simply temporal, short-lived principles, suited only to keep us in order in this little state; but that they are eternal truths, and will always be applicable and necessary to us, and will have a bearing on our destiny as long as eternity endures.

Thus, at one stroke, we find it marking out a doctrine in harmony with the unbounded character and great abilities of the human mind; and, at the same time, opening out a future that carries on in endless life the very beings of this world—ourselves, with the whole train of powers and characteristics belonging to us in endless perpetuity.

We find it teaching that every power, passion, or ability is a natural property of the spirit—born with it, part and parcel of its organization, and endlessly its characteristics. That the body is merely an organism through which the spirit manifests and develops its native qualities—qualities it possesses as much out of the body as in it. Hence the same being goes out of the body, carrying with it all its capabilities, tastes, judgments, and designing skill. And the same being, without the lack of a single characteristic that now composes the present man or woman, continues endlessly, only turning these producing energies, these fashioning powers, these managing and governing characteristics into a higher channel of operation, a wider field for skill and enterprise; and thus the immortal man blooms endlessly down the long vista of eternal ages, ever producing the fruits and glories of the great qualities now unfolding within his soul.

And now, reader, as to which of the two kinds of immortality we have referred to, most meets our test—as to which gives the greater promise of eternal continuance—of "eternal life;" in fact—to all the powers and forces, the abilities and activities, that live and glow within our being, judge ye.

TERESE, THE HEBREW MAIDEN;

OR,

NOT ALL DROSS.

BY EDWARD W. TULLIDGE.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE FLIGHT OF TERESE FROM ROME.

On the third day after the arrival of her lover's letter Terese was around seemingly herself again, but she left not her chamber. She had the day before written a letter to Donna Clara Garcia, and this morning had received an answer which had decided her in a resolve which she had formed. The nature of that resolve will be gathered from the correspondence between the ladies. Here is one from Terese:

ROME, June 16th 1823.

DONNA CLARA:

You will, I hope, pardon me for appealing to you for assistance in executing a design which I have formed in leaving Rome to join my master Spontini who is now in Paris. I have reasons for believing that it would not be distasteful to you to accomplish a separation between myself and Farinelli. In confiding to you the secret of my flight from Rome, and requesting your assistance, it will be sufficiently manifest to you how little I am your rival. A marriage has been proposed by my grandfather, between myself and Farinelli, which has also my uncle Judah's sanction. This union can never be effected between us, while on the other hand, I am exceedingly desirous to see my foster-brother the husband of Donna Clara Garcia.

I have written to you Donna Clara to aid my flight in preference to appealing to any other person. I trust you as a sister, that you might not look upon me any longer as a rival, and because your own interest in the matter will ensure the secrecy and security of my flight.

I remain, Donna Clara,
Yours sincerely,
TERESE BEN AMMON.

The note of our heroine brought immediately, from the Spanish Lady, the following answer:

GARCIA VILLA, ROME, June 16th 1823.

SIGNORINA TERESE:

I will aid your flight from Rome. To-morrow night at twelve o'clock my private carriage shall be at the Church of St. John, near the house of your grandfather. I shall myself be in it returning from the opera. At my villa there shall be in waiting at one o'clock a carriage with two postillions in their saddles to bear you with all speed from Rome. Before your escape can be discovered, you will be fifty miles from the city.

I am, Signorina Terese,
Yours sincerely,
CLARA GARCIA.

As soon as our heroine had received the answer to her note she locked herself in her chamber with the excuse of writing to Walter Templar. She then packed a few necessary articles of dress in a small portmanteau with her jewelry and money, of which she possessed a considerable sum, reaped from her successful engagements, including some valuable presents of jewels and bank notes received from her grandfather and uncle. Altogether it made a moderate fortune for her for several years to come. At first she thought of returning her grandfather's gifts, but upon reconsideration she retained them, being assured that the return of his gifts would deeply wound the old man whom she was leaving in sorrow, not in anger, which could not enter her gentle heart for her venerable relative.

Terese had resolved to return to the stage and to devote her life to art. She had given to Spontini a pledge that should her union with Walter Templar not be accomplished she would seek out her kind master and return to her profession. That profession she loved as a true artiste, and nothing but her union with Walter could have won her from its beautiful enchantments. Trained by Spontini, she had been imbued with his adoration for art, and her profession was highly dignified in her mind. The circumstances had now come to induce her to redeem her pledge to the illustrious composer. Her resolve was wise. The devotion of her life to the delightful worship of the musical profession would occupy her mind and render her maiden life not disconsolate, while her love for Walter would still survive, beautified in its innocent romance. As we have seen from the first, she was in her character pious, not passionate, and though she loved as deeply and more self-sacrificingly, she loved not as fiercely as Donna Clara Garcia. Her affection was rather spiritual than passionate—less of earth, and more of heaven. She had, in their trouble concerning the betrothal with Eleanor Courtney, impressed upon Walter the certainty of their happy union in the life to come. To the hope of that she now alone looked forward, and its realization was to the pious Hebrew Maiden more than a beautiful fancy of the mind.

After the receipt of Sir Walter Templar's first letter, bringing joyful news of the cancelling of the betrothal and the consent of Sir Richard Courtney to the union of his nephew with Terese, Spontini had left Italy to visit Paris. It was the city of his early triumphs. There he had been, in the great Napoleon's time, highly honored and patronized by the magnificent Josephine, and there his immortal opera, La Vestala, was first produced. There also now Terese resolved to go, certain that in Paris she would be warmly welcomed, and by none so cordially as the illustrious Spontini.

Night sat in. A beautiful June day expired. The moon came out, an Italian sky was glorious with gleaming stars, the Eternal City was wrapped in peaceful repose. The old Jewess, Rebecca, came into the chamber of Terese to bid her good night, and then came Isaac Ben Ammon. He tenderly kissed her.

"May the God of Abraham bless you, my child!"

"Bless me again. Oh bless me again to-night, grandfather Isaac. Bless me in your own name."

"Bless you, daughter of my Benjamin. Bless you, daughter of my Rachel. Bless you to-night—to-morrow—every night be you blessed, my darling grandchild," said the venerable patriarch, laying his hands upon the maiden's head.

Once more Terese was alone, and then she threw herself upon her knees and remained awhile in prayer.

It was half-past eleven, and the Hebrew Maiden dressed herself for her midnight flight from Rome. Upon her table she laid two letters. One was for her grandfather, in which she explained all the reasons for the step she was about to take, and the necessity for her consolation that she should seek Spontini, and return to her artiste life. In one of the passages she wrote:

"I cannot dear grandfather fulfill all your desires, but I will never betray my Jewish race. I could not without your sanction and blessing, be united to Walter Templar."

The other letter was to her foster-brother, in which she wrote with tender sympathy, but conjured him, for his own happiness, to extinguish his hopeless love for her, and favor the affection of Donna Clara.

The clock was upon the stroke of midnight. Terese left her chamber. All in the dwelling of Isaac Ben Ammon were in peaceful sleep. From a small door at the back, which led into a garden, she escaped from her grandfather's house, and in a few minutes was seated in the carriage of Donna Clara Garcia.

"Home!" said the prima donna to her coachman, and the carriage flew away through the streets of Rome.

In twenty minutes Donna Clara's carriage arrived at Garcia Villa. The two ladies had not exchanged a word, for each one was occupied with her own thoughts. Terese was reflecting upon her flight—Donna Clara of the opportunity which it would give to her to win the love of Farinelli. In the absence of her rival, for she still deemed our heroine such, she doubted not that she should be able to throw her enchantments around the foster-brother. She was a superb woman, whom but few men could resist, and, as we have observed, the fact that Farinelli had been so indifferent to her, was the first cause of the wild passion which had sprung up in her heart towards him.

"Signorina Terese, will you alight and enter my house?" said Donna Clara, as the carriage stopped at her door.

"Yes, Donna Clara; I am for the present in your charge," was the answer; and the ladies alighted and entered the house.

"Signorina Terese," began the rival prima donna, when the servant had withdrawn, and they were alone together, "we have not much time for words, and we will be at once frank with each other."

"It is as I would wish, Donna Clara. I have trusted you that there may be confidence between us."

"And I have helped you because you have come to me as a friend, and not a rival."

"I am not your rival, Donna Clara."

"I think you are not," was the reply. "So to mutual confidence. You have discovered my secret, Signorina Terese."

The Jewess inclined her head in the affimative.

"You have discovered my love for your foster-brother," continued the Spanish lady. "I will admit it—for it is to a woman, now answer me truly: Do you love Farinelli?"

"I do not," was the firm answer.

"'Tis well; for if you did—— but never mind that, for you do not, and that is sufficient for me to know," said the passionate woman.

"I have said, Donna Clara, that I am not your rival."

"You will never wed him?"

"I will never wed him; but, on the other hand, sincerely desire to see my foster-brother your husband."

"I will believe you, Signorina Terese."

"When I have left Rome, Donna Clara, my foster-brother will see his error, and be more conscious of your merits. I am not your equal, lady, neither as a singer nor in that facination to win a man's heart."

Donna Clara was evidently gratified with this generous admission, which she realized was also just. Her manner, which had been haughty, was now gracious.

"Have you written any explanations to Farinelli?"

"I have, Donna Clara, written him that which will, I doubt not, convince him I never can become his wife."

"You have done well. But have you informed him that you are going to Paris?"

"I have not."

"I am glad of that. But will your grandfather know?"

"Not yet; but I have informed him that in six months he will learn all. He will, in the meantime, only know that I am under the guardianship of Spontini."

"And knows he not that Spontini is in Paris?"

"No; for I received my master's letter, informing me of the fact, two days ago, and then I resolved to fly to him."

"I must not let it be known, then, that Spontini is in Paris."

"I beseech you not to, Donna Clara."

"Oh, be assured I shall not. And now take a glass of wine to help you on your journey, for I hear the carriage at the door, to bear you from Rome."

"Thank you, Donna Clara."

Ten minutes later, Terese was in the carriage, and the fresh steeds pawing the ground in impatience

"Adieu, Donna Clara; may you be as happy as I pray you will be with him," and our heroine kissed the prima donna affectionately.

"Adieu, Signorina Terese, and a safe journey to you."

And away flew the impatient steeds, bearing the Hebrew Maiden from Rome. Donna Clara watched the carriage out of sight, and then she entered her villa.

When the Spanish lady was again in her room, she also took a glass of wine, and then observed to herself, with passionate emphasis:

"Had she entered my house as a rival, and not as a friend, that glass of wine which she drank should have been her last. But it is best as it is; and now, Farinelli you shall be mine, or woe be to you—woe be to me!"

CHAPTER XL.

CONSTERNATION AT THE FLIGHT OF TERESE.

There was consternation in the house of Isaac Ben Ammon on the morning following the flight of Terese from Rome. The family, which, since the discovery of the Jewess by her grandfather, had also included Farinelli, waited for our heroine an hour at breakfast time, when old Rebecca made bold to enter the chamber of Terese, to find it deserted. At first, she wondered that her young mistress had arisen and gone abroad without the knowledge of the household, but next, she noticed that the bed had not been slept in during the night. She was about to give an alarm at once, but she paused, and sat down by the table to consider what she had better do, for she desired not to give unnecessary agitation to her aged master. Suddenly she saw the letters which our heroine had placed upon the table, and taking them up she read the superscription, and recognized the hand-writing of her young mistress. There was now no alternative left but to convey the letters to Isaac Ben Ammon for the explanation of the mystery.

"Aileth my granddaughter aught this morning, Rebecca?" questioned the Hebrew, as the old woman entered the breakfast room.

"Be not alarmed, master Isaac," the old woman replied, and then remained silent.

"Speak, good Rebecca; what troubleth thee. Thy face beareth evil news. Rachel is not sick. Speak, good Rebecca. Nay? Then I will go myself and see what aileth my grandchild!" and Isaac Ben Ammon, in much concern, rose from the table to leave the room.

"Good master, be calm. Your grandchild is safe. She has sent you these letters to explain her absence. All is well, Isaac. Read."

Isaac Ben Ammon took the letters, and returning to his seat and laying one on the table, he broke the seal of that addressed to himself, for it was the one presented to his eye by Rebecca, who designedly somewhat concealed the letter for the foster-brother. The old man read the epistle with trembling hands, while those present looked on in silent agitation, feeling as though the stroke of death had fallen upon the house. At length, Isaac Ben Ammon broke forth with sobs that found an echo in the hearts of his household.

"Oh, Rachel, thou hast broken my heart! Oh, Rachel, my child, where art thou?" And he buried his face in his hands and wept aloud. After a few moments the old man was more calm, but none as yet had dared to break the silence; but Farinelli could restrain himself no longer.

"My God!" he exclaimed, in distraction. "What has happened?"

"Rachel my grandchild, has fled!—the comfort of my house has departed," wailed the venerable man.

"Terese fled? My foster-sister missing? This is Walter Templar's work. The lightnings of heaven blast him! But I will follow to the ends of the earth!"

"Peace, peace! Let no curses be uttered in my dwelling. But oh, Rachel my child, you have broken my heart!"

"The other letter is for you, young man. Read," here observed Rebecca, who was scarcely less agitated than her master.

"For me!" exclaimed Farinelli, as he eagerly seized and then read the other letter aloud. His heart, rather than his education, taught him his duty, to conceal nothing from Terese's grandsire.

"We are the undesigning causes of this, sir," he said, as he finished reading the epistle. The foster-brother spoke calmly but sadly, for a deep resolve had taken possession of his heart, out of which all hope of wedding Terese forever fled.

"Alas, alas! my son; but the stroke has fallen heavily upon me. Oh, Rachel, my child, where art thou?"

"Grandfather—for you are that—at least I am her brother still—Grandfather, be comforted. I will find Terese."

"Find her, my son—oh, find my grandchild," moaned the old man in his great trouble.

"I will, sir, and tell her how wrong we have been. She shall marry Sir Walter Templar. My foster-sister shall not be sacrificed. I would have given my soul for her, but I would not be the cause of her broken heart. He shall wed her if he means her well."

There was something sublime in Farinelli's devotion, as we have seen from the first. His jealous passion was the dross, not his love—not his heart. These were gold. He would sacrifice himself, not her he so truly loved.

"My son, you have taught me my duty," said Isaac Ben Ammon, solemnly. "Rachel shall marry Sir Walter Templar. Father Abraham, pardon me if I err in this. But neither can I sacrifice my grandchild even to my religious scruples. Perchance, Heaven's will is above my wisdom. He, too, may adopt the faith of our race for her sake."

Farinelli thought differently, but said nothing, and it was a certain consolation to him that Terese was more likely to become a Christian. His own designed apostacy had sat heavily upon his conscience. It was now relieved, and he felt himself in form of faith a Christian again. As for Rebecca, she seemed dissatisfied; she, also, said nothing in reply to her master's hopes that Sir Walter Templar would change his religion for Terese's sake. Had Judah Nathans been present, he would have swept all barriers of religious differences away by his universalian views, for if he possessed any religion, it was the religion of universal kindred; if he respected any god, it was the God of all humanity. But then the very largeness of his views grew out of his daring intellect, not out of a reverent faith.

"Eat, eat my son; I will to my chamber to pray," said Isaac Ben Ammon, breaking the reverie into which Farinelli had fallen.

"And I to find my foster-sister," returned the young man, starting to his feet.

"But first break your fast, my son."

"I will not eat nor sleep until I have gained some intelligence of Terese. So adieu, sir. I will find your grandchild."

"Haste not my son. You will need money."

"I have money."

"But take this purse of gold. Nay, refuse me not. It is to find my grandchild. Spare not the gold. Stay, here is my check, also, for thrice the amount that purse contains. There is not a banker in Europe but will honor Isaac Ben Ammon's name."

"I will take the gold and the draft. If I need them I will use freely; if not, I will return them both. And now adieu. I will find my foster-sister."

"The God of Abraham be with you, my son."

"I will find my foster-sister; and oh, may she not curse me when we meet."

And with these words the young man hurried from the house of Isaac Ben Ammon.

CHAPTER XLI.

AT THE GRAVE OF RACHEL BEN AMMON.

Farinelli followed Terese, sometimes finding traces of her, and losing them again. One morning, obeying his impulse, he resolved to visit his native village. Indeed, when his mind was turned in that direction, he deemed it quite probable that Terese had sought retirement in the beautiful Sicilian vale, where she had first seen the light of heaven, and had passed the happy days of her early girlhood. He knew the little nook in that vale where rested in sweet repose her father and mother, after the tragic close of their mortal life, was a sacred spot to our heroine, sanctified by many tender reminiscences. What more likely than that the daughter, under the painful circumstances of a seemingly blighted life, should select that same beautiful valley of Sicily for retirement which her parents had sought before her when they fled from Russia, in their dire trouble, as she had now fled from Rome in hers. The more Farinelli thought of the matter, the more he became convinced that Terese had gone to hide herself and her heart-griefs in the pretty little valley where they both were born.

A week later, a traveler might have been seen climbing the very hill that a few years before we saw Walter Templar and Frederick De Lacy ascend; and when he reached the summit, he, too, as they had done before, threw himself fatigued upon the mountain's brow to rest. That traveler was Farinelli. The scene before him was one which he well remembered; and there in the distance was the peaceful little nook, the burial place of the parents of Terese Ben Ammon. After a few minute's rest, Farinelli struck towards the sacred spot.

The foster-brother had entered the enclosure of the family graveyard of the two Hebrew refugees, his hat was in his hand, and his manner was very reverent. He approached the two graves that lay side by side. He remembered the spot well, for he had often been there before, but there was one object which struck his gaze which was not there in the days gone by. It was an elegant monument which was evidently newly erected. Eagerly he bounded towards it and read—

SACRED

TO THE MEMORY OF BENJAMIN AND RACHEL.

There were other appropriate inscriptions upon the chaste marble; but that which his eye next sought was the inscription which revealed the hand that had caused this tribute of love to be planted.

"Erected July the 24th, 1823, by their daughter, Terese Ben Ammon."

The inscriptions were all very simple in their wording; but they gave a synopsis of the affecting history of the Hebrew refugees.

"I have found her!" exclaimed Farinelli; when he had read the signature and date on the elegant little monument which Terese had erected in memory of her parents.

"It is as I expected," he continued musing, "She has retreated to her native village. And now to meet her. But, Oh, may she not curse me when we meet!"

It was a repetition of the devoted fellow's words when he left her grandfather to commence the search, and the repetition now showed how much his mind had since been burdened by the fear that Terese would reproach him with the part which he had taken to work up her afflictions. But there was no need for fear that our gentle heroine would curse her foster-brother; for she felt pity—not anger—towards him.

"Ha! brother Beppo, is it you?" asked a buxom Italian peasant woman of the singer, as he entered her cottage, which rang with the merry voices of a group of interesting urchins. It was Beppo's eldest sister who spoke.

"Ah! I knew you would come, Beppo, for Terese has been here!"

"Sister Agnes, where is she. Quick, Agnes. tell me where is Terese?"

"She has left us again, brother Beppo."

"When, when? No, she cannot have departed so soon!"

"She has departed, brother Beppo. Two weeks ago, she left."

"Holy Virgin! then I am too late!" replied the foster-brother, and he fell into a chair overwhelmed by the intelligence, and hid his face in his hands. The re-action from his newly awakened hope paralysed him for awhile from further action, but he recovered himself soon, and then he almost frightened his sister with his eager enquiries and wild self-reproaches. In answer to his questions concerning where Terese had gone his sister replied:

"I know not brother Beppo. She would not tell me where she was going, though I found out that she was flying from her grandfather. She talked of her meeting with her grandfather and her uncle Judah and then she would interrupt herself, as though she wished not to reproach them. There must have been something dreadful which they wished her to do."

"Did she curse me? Oh, sister Agnes, did she curse me?"

"Curse you, brother Beppo! What should she curse you for? She spoke kindly of you, and said you had ever been to her a dear good brother, as of old."

"Bless her, bless her for that! Then Terese did not curse me!"

"Not she, indeed, you silly fellow."

Farinelli gathered from his sister all that she knew of the recent movements of our heroine, whom she believed had fled to Russia, but for this opinion she simply had the reason that Terese spoke most of Russia. But Farinelli resolved to return to Rome before continuing his search. He was led to this resolve by the reference which Terese made in her letter to him, advising him to transfer his affections to Donna Clara Garcia. He doubted not that the Spanish lady could supply the clue of Terese's retreat, and he resolved, if possible, to wring it from her.

But when Farinelli returned to Rome, after nearly two months' absence, he discovered that Isaac Ben Ammon impatient to seek his grandchild himself, had left Italy for England, where his nephew Judah still tarried. In Judah, the old man had great confidence, and he deemed that in the native hand of Walter Templar, he was most likely to find the maiden; but, as our readers know, she had fled to France to Spontini.

CHAPTER XLII.

HUNTING FOR THE CLUE.

Donna Clara Garcia held a brilliant revel at her house, after one of her great triumphs. She had been of late singing with more than her usual power, acting with a passion beyond her former self. Last night, she had reached the very culmination of her efforts. Rome was enchanted: more than ever she held the fashionable world at her feet.

There were present at the supper which she had given to a select circle of noblemen at the close of her engagement, a party of the most brilliant men of the city. Orsini, Baglioni, Cariati and Sir Herbert Blakely were of the number. The "Management," and the principal ladies and gentleman of the Opera were also present.

Donna Clara had received her noble guests, that night, as a queen would her court at a royal levee There was a haughty condescension manifested by the lady, her face wore a calm majesty, her eye bespoke a cold severity, her manner the untroubled dignity of a soul at ease, but proud in her conscious triumph. There was nothing seen in her of that terrible passion and tumultuous emotion which the night before had moved her in her performance upon the stage, and carried away the vast audience which had witnessed her triumph into a very delirium of applause, yet there was a fire in her heart that consumed her—a fire like that of a furnace seven times heated.

But there was a secret cause of the increase of passion and absolute abandon in the tragic impersonations of Donna Clara which had of late created a new interest in her. It was her love for Farinelli and her rage at his absence, mixed with her intense concern. She had hoped that ere this he would have been at her feet; instead of this she discovered that he, too, as well as Terese, had quitted Rome, and no one knew whither he had gone. Her jealousy was at its height. Hence, Donna Clara's increase of tragic power. Our fits of agony are ever the most real, when we most feel the internal torture; our shrieks never so telling as when they are wrung from our heart; our acting never so much like nature as when it is the very expositions of our own sufferings or passions. How much of that which pass for splendid acting upon the stage have secret causes in the performers' own martyrdoms. That which we often see in actors and actresses are more real than assumed. So with Donna Garcia. She was more effective, because she was upon the rack. Her fierce love and her terrible jealousy inspired her upon the stage. She felt the demoniac ecstasies of her parts.

"Donna Clara," said Count Orsini, "never in my life did I witness such a performance as that last night."

"Indeed, my dear Orsini," replied the lady with an icy smile, "not even when Terese, my rival, enchanted you?"

"She bears no comparison with yourself, Donna Clara."

"Yet, you once deemed her my superior, Count."

"Pardon my passing infidelity, lady. It has but made me more your worshipper."

"What says Cariati?"

"Nothing, Donna Clara. I have been dumb with amazement since your first scene. I know not that I should have found a tongue again, had you not charmed it into speech."

"Very pretty. Your compliment is, I confess, very nicely turned, Cariati," bantered the prima donna, whose passionate yearning for Farinelli rendered her almost insensible to the flattery which she had once so highly prized.

Every tongue of the brilliant party sent forth some meed of praise, excepting that of the Marquis Baglioni. As for the obsequicus Management, he was profusely eloquent, because amid such adulatien, he dared net be otherwise, but at each compliment, he mentally calculated the probable terms of the next engagement of the successful prima donna.

Marquis, yeu alone are silent," observed the lady to Baglioni, with a slight pique in her tene.

"Oh the Marquis is ever ungallant," said Orsini.

"And therefere, my silence has nought of offence in its intentions. But I will confess, Donna Clara, on my honor as a soldier, you did net sing badly last night."

"Shame, Marquis, shame!" rang round the room.

"If my noble friends mean that seriously"—Baglioni began with a frown, but breaking off suddenly, he continued—"Bah, I am a feol. Your pardon, lady."

"Certainly, Marquis; and, believe me, I am more flattered with your negative compliment, that I did not sing badly, than with all the rest of the evening."

"No, you certainly did not sing badly," was the affirmative again made by the Marquis.

"By the way, Signer," observed the lady to the Management, "have you heard eught of late of Farinelli?"

"Not a word, Donna Clara"

At this moment, a knock was heard at the door.

"Another guest I presume," said Orsini. "But whoever he is, he is late."

The lady reflected that she had given invitation to but one more, and that was Farinelli, for whom she had left a special note at the Opera House, bidding him come at any hour that night, should he return to Rome, fer she was net certain that his absence had any reference to Terese. Whether or not her inquiry for him was one of those unexplainable instances of people speaking of those seeking for them, we cannot say; but, in a moment after the knock at the doer, a servant entered with a note, which ran thus:

DONNA CLARA:

I recieved your invitation to be present to-night. I am indisposed for company from the fatigne of a recent journey, but beseech you to grant me a short interview.

Yours obediently,

FARINELLI.

"Ladies and gentlemen, pardon me for a while. It is a private call from an unexpected friend."

And Donna Clara hurried from the room to meet her visiter. But first having directed the servant aside to show Farinelli into her private room, where no conversation could reach her company, she flew for a moment to her chamber with that instinct which woman feels to prepare to meet the one in whom she is most interested.

"At last! at last!" exclaimed the lady, as she entered her chamber. "He is here; he will be at my feet. Oh! how my heart has ached fer his coming, but I knew that he must yield at last, for, as Terese said she is net my equal neither as an artiste nor as a woman to enchant the heart of a man. He has been chagrined with her repulse, for however gentle her explanatiens of refusal might have been, a repulse it was, and he has been also thoroughly checkmated by her flight; and so he has been rusticating for a few weeks to recever his serenity and hide his disappointment. Yet it must he so: this explains all. I did well te aid Terese's flight. Had she remained near him, his passion would have been influenced by her presence; but her flight from him has both offended his pride and brought him te reason. So he is come at last: he will be mine at last! Now, did I not so truly love him, and did I not fear to plague my own heart, I would humble Farinelli as he has humbled me. But no, I will not. I do leve him; and am only too happy to have him at last at my feet. Now to meet him."

Donna Clara Garcia entered the room into which Farinelli had been showed by the servant, with a heart which throbbed with almost audible voice, so great was her agitation of expectancy, but she strove to be calm. Farinelli was pacing the fleor with impatient strides, for his blood was in a fever, yet he, toe, strove to be calm as the lady appreached. She was, when he turned te her, startled and troubled by his appearance. His clothes were soiled and dusty with his journey, for he had not changed his apparel; his countenance was haggard; his eyes wild and bloodshot; his hair disordered. It was not altogether the plight in which the prima donna expected to meet him, fer he looked too much the distracted lover; and the lady at once felt that his distraction could net be from any passion for her. She was, therefore, embarrassed; and, instead of giving him the warm and tender welcome which she designed, she awaited for Farinelli to open the subject of this interview.

"Donna Clara, pray pardon the unseemly state in which I have presented myself."

"Name it not, Farinelli. Yeu knew that I am glad to see you. Be seated. You look fatigued."

"Nay, lady; a sentence can relieve you of my presence. Where is my fester-sister?"

"Sir?" returned the lady, while from her face fled every particle of color, leaving her as pale as a cerpse.

"Where is my fester-sister, I repeat, Denna Clara?"

"Am I then her keeper? I thought yeu came te see me, not her. This is my house, net Terese Ben Ammon's"

"My foster-sister has fled from Rome. You know whither she has fled. Answer me, lady: where is my foster-sister?"

"Farinelli, you presume upen my patience. Were it another than yourself, I should be angry."

"Denna Clara, you aided her flight?"

"What reason, sir, have you fer saying se" asked the lady, somewhat embarrassed by the young man's abrupt directness which she did not dare te resent by her usual cold hauteur.

"On the night of her flight, your carriage stopped for a while at the Church of St. John's, near the house of Isaac Ben Ammon; ten minutes afterwards, a lady entered it, and the carriage dashed away towards yeur villa; soon upon this, another carriage with four horses and two postillions drove up te your doer, and the same lady entered it and immediately left the city. This I have discevered from the police at a handsome price, as you may expect."

"Well, Farinelli, granting all this, which I will net deny, do you held me responsible for the actions of Terese?"

"No, Donna Clara, I simply ask—where is my fester-sister?"

"Your foster-sister!" returned the lady, bitterly "why net insult me, sir, by a tenderer name than foster-sister?"

"I received a letter from her," continued Farinelli. "Read it, Signorina. It gave te me the clue that you were in her entire confidence, and acted in cencert with her."

Denna Clara read it, and when she came to the passage advising the foster-brother to transfer his love te herself, the Spanish lady blushed and bit her lip with vexation till the blood came.

"Signorina Terese took upon herself too much to plead for me," she observed haughtily, returning the letter; but, in a moment, she added gently:

"But that letter manifests a sister's regard for me, and gives you ne cause te insult me with questions of Terese's movements, when she herself has concealed them from you. All which she desired fer you te knew she has explained. That should suffice you, Farinelli."

"But it does not. Yet I appeal to you as my foster-sister's friend. Donna Clara, I beseech you tell me where she is now."

"I will net!" was the passionate answer.

"Then I charge you with having betrayed her—urged her into this flight—used your woman's sophistry to tempt her into this ceurse."

"'Tis false, sir! Leave my house. This moment, sir, leave my house."

"I will obey you, Denna Clara," said the young man, taking his hat to leave the room

THE BRIDAL.

BY A DECIDEDLY CONFIRMED BACHELOR.

Not a laugh was heard, nor a joyous note,
As our friend to the bridal we hurried;
Not a wit discharged his farewell shot
As the bachelor went to be married.

We married him quietly to save his fright,
Our heads from the sad sight turning;
And we sighed as we stood by the lamp's dim light,
To think he was not more discerning.

To thing of a bachelor free and bright,
And shy of the sex as we found him,
Should there at the altar, at dead of night,
Be caught in the snare that bound him.

Few and short were the words we said,
Though of wine and cake partaking;
We escorted him home from the scene of dread,
While his knees were awfully shaking.

Slowly and sadly we marched him down
From the first to the lowermost story;
And we never have heard or seen the poor man
Whom we left alone in his glory.

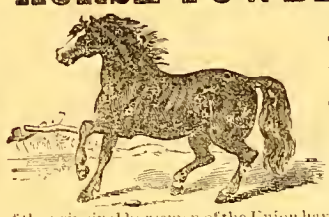
HARVELL'S
HORSE POWDERS.



These celebrated and renowned powders for horses and cattle have been tested by an intelligent public for sixteen years. Hundreds of the principal horsemen of the Union have pronounced them the only Condition Powders safe to use and work the horse. There is nothing in them to expose the animal, but, on the contrary, everything to improve them. The proprietors of horse railroads, omnibusses, and stage owners in all the principal cities use them; and their combined testimony stamps them one of the wonders of medical science. Letters sufficient to fill a small book are in our possession, testifying to their goodness. Merchants are requested to warrant them, and refund the purchase money should they fail to give satisfaction.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS
STRENGTHENING
PLASTERS.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are the results of studies and experiments of Dr. Schecut, of South Carolina; of Dr. Wm. Wagstaff, now Baron Wagstaff, of Horace H. Day, the distinguished manufacturer of rubber goods; and of Thomas Allcock, Chemist and member of the College of Pharmacy of New York, now General Allcock, etc., etc.

Step by step this commodity has attained its unprecedented fame. They are universally approved. They support, strengthen, and aid the growth of muscles. They appear to have a peculiar effect upon the nerves, allaying irritability, while supplying warmth. They seem to accumulate electricity, and aid the circulation of the blood through the part where applied, by which healthy actions are induced.

Even in paralysis, where articulation was suspended, the use of the Porous Plasters to the spine restored the articulation, and materially reduced the paralysis. In fact, the patient could help herself, while before the Porous plaster was applied she was as helpless as a baby. We refer to Mrs. Sally Elliot, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Myer, of Savannah, Ga., says they are the best mechanical supporters for weak muscles ever discovered; that by their warming properties they bring power and health, until the strength of the muscles are entirely restored. That he knows a case where Allcock's Plasters cured a gentleman of a weak spine. That he daily prescribes them in his practice with the happiest results, and desires us to refer to him.

Dr. Henderson, of Farnsville, Louisiana, says: "The counter-irritant effect of Allcock's Porous Plasters is produced in such a mild and gradual way, they so invigorate the circulation around the parts to which they are applied, and exert upon all nervous diseases such a great sedative influence, that I place them confidently at the head of every plaster now in use."

Dr. Johnson, of Hartford, says: "My daily experience confirms the very superior excellence of your Porous Plasters. At this moment of writing, a man applies for one, who, by entanglement in a shaft of machinery, had both his legs broken, spine severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay five dollars for a single plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. Surgeons should make use of these perforated plasters, to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the plasters to be so useful, I have no scruples that my sentiments should be known.

J. W. JOHNSON, M. D."

Dr. Sterling's testimony: "For two years, I have been a great sufferer from neuralgia in the head, and found only temporary relief from all the various remedies that I have tried, until I applied one of Allcock's Porous Plasters. I cut it into three strips, placing one under each shoulder blade, and the other over the small of the back; and for the past three months, I have had scarcely a twinge of the old pain.

I advise all who suffer from nervous diseases to lose no time in making a trial of the wonderful Porous Plaster.

MEDICINAL QUALITIES

—OF THE—

POROUS PLASTERS.

The Porous Plasters possess the soothing, warming and sustaining qualities of the combined plasters of the dispensatories. An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in Local Rheumatism, in Tic Doloreux, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative and pain-relieving effects to their ELECTRIC qualities. He asserts that they restore the healthy electric condition (equilibrium) of the part, and that being restored pain and morbid action cease. He was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these plasters. He affirms that Head-ache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics, as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

"A SLIGHT COLD," COUGH, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat which might be checked with a simple remedy, if neglected often terminates seriously. Few are aware of the importance of stopping a Cough or "slight cold" in its first stage; that which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if not attended to, soon attacks the lungs.

The efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches is demonstrated by testimonials from Physicians, Surgeons in the Army, and eminent men wherever they have been used.

They were introduced in 1850. It has been proved that they are the best article before the public for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, the Hacking Cough in Consumption, and numerous affections of the Throat, giving immediate relief.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS & SINGERS will find them effectual for clearing and strengthening the voice.

Your Troches are too well and favorably known to need commendation.

HON. CHAS. A. PHELAS, Pres. Mass. Senate.

My communication with the world has been very much enlarged by the Lozenge which now I carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my Throat (for which Throches are a specific) having made me often a mere whisperer.

N. P. WILLIS.

I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, excepting to think yet better of that which I began thinking well of,

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Saratoga A WATER.

The Saratoga "A" Spring Water is probably the most effective mineral water found on either continent. It has ten per cent. greater mineral properties than the celebrated Congress Spring; four times that of Baden Baden of Austria; five times that of Aix La Chapelle in Prussia; twice that of Vichy in France; nearly three times greater than the renowned Seltzer of Germany; and equally over the Spas of Bath, England, and Kissengen in Bavaria.

The reputation of this water is based upon its effects in diseases of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys and spleen. It acts with wonderful benefit in cases of chronic dyspepsia, constipation, gravel, gout, Scrofula, cutaneous affections, general lethargy, soreness and prostration of the system.

I'VE SELDOM HAD MUCKLE.

I've seldom had muckle, I never had mair,
It's but little in this life that's fa'en to my share;
An' night after night I've gane weary to bed,
To dream o' the morrow's fresh cravings for bread.

An' those whose high duty it was to assist,
Ha'e turn'd on their heel, an' ha'e faulded their fist;
But time's passing on, an' it winna be lang
Till I'm call'd on to finish both journey an' sang.

Oh, the beautiful earth, wi' its music an' flowers
Wi' its green spreading valleys, an' sweet shady bowers,
Has been like a charm to my grief-burden'd heart;
For the friendship o' Nature will never depart.

An' when I'm at rest, and I care na how soon,
For come when it may, I'll bid welcome the boon,
Let me sleep where the wild flowers peacefully wave,
For what gladdens my life, I'd have hallow my grave.

TWICE BLIND;

OR,

THE MAID OF MALINES.

BY SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON.

It was noonday in the town of Malines, or Mechlin, as the English usually term it; the Sabbath bell had summoned the inhabitants to divine worship; and the crowd that had loitered round the church of St. Rembauld had gradually emptied itself within the spacious aisles of the sacred edifice.

A young man was standing in the street, with his eyes bent on the ground, and apparently listening for some sound; for, without raising his looks from the rude pavement, he turned to every corner of it with an intent and anxious expression of countenance; he held in one hand a staff, in the other a long slender cord, the end of which trailed on the ground; every now and then he called, with a plaintive voice, "Fido, Fido, come back! Why hast thou deserted me?" Fido returned not; the dog, wearied of confinement, had slipped from the string, and was at play with his kind in a distant quarter of the town, leaving the blind man to seek his way as he might to his solitary inn.

By-and-by a light step passed through the street, and the young stranger's face brightened—

"Pardon me," said he, turning to the spot where his quick ear had caught the sound, "and direct me, if you are not by chance much pressed for a few moments' time, to the hotel Mortier d'Or."

It was a young woman, whose dress betokened that she belonged to the middling classes of life, whom he thus addressed. "It is some distance hence, sir," said she, "but if you continue your way straight on for about a hundred yards, and then take the second turn to your right hand—"

"Alas!" interrupted the stranger, with a melancholy smile, "your direction will avail me little; my dog has deserted me,—and I am blind!"

There was something in these words, and in the stranger's voice, which went irresistibly to the heart of the young woman. "Pray forgive me," she said, almost with tears in her eyes, "I did not perceive your—" misfortune, she was about to say, but she checked herself with an instinctive delicacy. "Lean upon me. I will conduct you to the door; nay, sir," observing that he hesitated, "I have time enough to spare, I assure you."

The stranger placed his hand on the young woman's arm, and though Lucille was naturally so bashful that even her mother would laughingly reproach her for the excess of a maiden virtue, she felt not the least pang of shame, as she found herself thus suddenly walking through the streets of Malines, alone with a young stranger, whose dress and air betokened him of a rank superior to her own.

"Your voice is very gentle," said he, after a pause, "and that," he added, with a slight sigh, "is the criterion by which I only know the young and the beautiful." Lucille now blushed, and with a slight mixture of pain in the blush, for she knew well that to beauty she had no pretension. "Are you a native of this town?" continued he. "Yes, sir; my father holds a small office in the customs, and my mother and I eke out his salary by making lace. We are called poor, but we do not feel it, sir."

"You are fortunate: there is no wealth like the heart's wealth, content," answered the blind man, mournfully.

"And monsieur," said Lucille, feeling angry with herself that she had awakened a natural envy in the stranger's mind, and anxious to change the subject—"and monsieur, has he been long at Malines?"

"But yesterday. I am passing through the Low Countries on a tour; perhaps you smile at the tour of a blind man—but it is wearisome even to the blind to rest always in the same place. I thought during church time, when the streets were empty, that I might, by the help of my dog, enjoy safely at least the air, if not the sight of the town; but there are some persons, methinks, who cannot even have a dog for a friend."

The blind man spoke bitterly,—the desertion of his dog had touched him to the core. Lucille wiped her eyes.

"And does monsieur travel then alone?" said she; and looking at his face more attentively than she had yet ventured to do, she saw that he was scarcely above two-and-twenty. "His father, his mother," she added, with an emphasis on the last word, "are they not with him?"

"I am an orphan," answered the stranger; "and I have neither brother nor sister."

The desolate condition of the blind man quite melted Lucille; never had she been so strongly affected. She felt a strange flutter at the heart—a secret and earnest sympathy, that attracted her at once towards him. She wished that Heaven had suffered her to be his sister.

The contrast between the youth and the form of the stranger, and the affliction which took hope from the one, and activity from the other, increased the compassion he excited. His features were remarkably regular, and had a certain nobleness in their outline; and his frame was gracefully and firmly knit, though he moved cautiously and with no cheerful step.

They had now passed into a narrow street leading toward the hotel, when they heard behind them the clatter of hoofs; and Lucille, looking hastily back, saw that a troop of Belgian horse was passing through the town.

She drew her charge close by the wall, and trembling with fear for him, she stationed herself by his side. The troop passed at a full trot through the street; and at the sound of their clanging arms, and the ringing hoofs of their heavy chargers, Lucille might have seen, had she looked at the blind man's face, that its sad features kindled with enthusiasm, and his head was raised proudly from its wonted and melancholy bend. "Thank Heaven," she said, as the troop had nearly passed them, "the danger is over!" Not so. One of the last two soldiers who rode abreast, was unfortunately mounted on a young and unmanageable horse. The rider's oaths and digging spur only increased the fire and impatience of the charger; he plunged from side to side of the narrow street.

"Gardez vous," cried the horseman, as he was borne to the place where Lucille and the stranger stood against the wall; "are ye mad—why do you not run?"

"For heaven's sake, for mercy's sake, he is blind!" cried Lucille, clinging to the stranger's side.

"Save yourself, my kind guide!" said the stranger. But Lucille dreamt not of such desertion. The trooper wrested the horse's head from the spot where they stood; with a snort, as he felt the spur, the enraged animal lashed out with its hind-legs; and Lucille, unable to save both, threw herself before the blind man, and received the shock directed against him; her slight and delicate arm fell shattered by her side—the horseman was borne onward. "Thank God, you are saved!" was poor Lucille's exclamation; and she fell, overcome with pain and terror, into the arms which the stranger mechanically opened to receive her.

"My guide, my friend!" cried he, "you are hurt, you—"

"No, sir," interrupted Lucille, faintly, "I am better—I am well. This arm, if you please—we are not far from your hotel now."

But the stranger's ear, tutored to every inflection of voice, told him at once of the pain she suffered; he drew from her by degrees the confession of the injury she had sustained; but the generous girl did not tell him it had been incurred solely in his protection. He now insisted on reversing their duties, and accompanying her to her home; and Lucille, almost fainting with pain, and hardly able to move, was forced to consent. But a few steps down the next turning stood the humble mansion of her father—they reached it—and Lucille scarcely crossed the threshold, before she sank down and for some minutes was insensible to pain. It was left to the stranger to explain, and to beseech them immediately to send for a surgeon, "the most skillful—the most practised in the town," said he. "See, I am rich, and this is the least I can do to atone to your generous daughter for not forsaking even a stranger in peril."

He held out his purse as he spoke, but the father refused the offer; and it saved the blind man some shame that he could not see the blush of honest resentment with which so poor a species of remuneration was put aside.

The young man stayed till the surgeon arrived, till the arm was set; nor did he depart until he had obtained a promise from the mother, that he should learn the next morning how the sufferer had passed the night.

The next morning, indeed, he had intended to quit a town that offers but little temptation to the traveler; but he tarried day after day, until Lucille herself accompanied her mother to assure him of her recovery.

The darkness to which he was condemned did not shut from his mind's eye the haunting images of ideal beauty; rather, on the contrary, in his perpetual and unoccupied solitude, he fed the reveries of an imagination naturally warm, and a heart eager for sympathy and commune.

He had said rightly that his only test of beauty was in the melody of voice; and never had a softer or a more thrilling tone than that of the young maiden touched upon his ear. Her exclamation, so beautifully denying self, so devoted in its charity, "Thank God, you are saved!" uttered, too, in the moment of her own suffering, rang constantly upon his soul, and he yielded, without precisely defining their nature, to vague and delicious sentiments, that his youth had never awakened to till then. And Lucille—the very accident that had happened to her on his behalf, only deepened the interest she had already conceived for one, who, in the first flush of youth, was thus cut off from the dear objects of life, and left to a night of years, desolate and alone. There is, to your beautiful and kindly sex, a perpetual and gushing forwardness to protect. This makes them the angels of sickness, the comforters of age, the fosterers of childhood; and this feeling, in Lucille peculiarly developed, had already inexpressibly linked her compassionate nature to the lot of the unfortunate traveler. With ardent affections, and with thoughts beyond her station and her years, she was not without that modest vanity which made her painfully susceptible to her own deficiencies in beauty. Instinctively conscious of how deeply she herself could love, she believed it impossible that she could ever be so loved in return. This stranger, so superior in her eyes to all she had yet seen, was the first out of her own household, who had ever addressed her in that voice which by tones, not words, speaks that admiration most dear to a woman's heart. To him she was beautiful, and her lovely mind spoke out undimmed by the imperfections of her face. Not, indeed, that Lucille was wholly without personal attractions; her light step and graceful form were elastic with the freshness of youth, and her mouth and smile had so gentle and tender an expression, that there were moments when it would not have been the blind only who would have mistaken her to be beautiful. Her early childhood had indeed given the promise of attractions, which the small pox, that then fearful malady, had inexorably marred. It had not only seared the smooth skin and the brilliant hues, but utterly changed even the character of the features. It so happened that Lucille's family were celebrated for beauty, and vain of that celebrity; and so bitterly had the parents deplored the effects of the cruel malady, that poor Lucille had been early taught to consider them far more grievous than they really were, and to exaggerate the advantages of that beauty, the loss of which was considered by her parents so heavy a misfortune. Lucille, too, had a cousin named Julie, who was the wonder of all Malines for her personal perfections; and as the cousins were much together, the contrast was too striking not to occasion frequent mortification to Lucille. But every misfortune has something of a counterpoise; and the consciousness of personal inferiority had meekened, without souring her temper, had given a gentleness to a spirit that otherwise might have been too high, and humility to a mind that was naturally strong, impassioned, and energetic.

And yet Lucille had long conquered the one disadvantage she most dreaded in the want of beauty. Lucille was never known but to be loved. Wherever came her presence, her bright and soft mind diffused a certain inexpressible charm; and where she was not, a something was missing from the scene which not even Julie's beauty could replace.

"I propose," said St. Amand to Madame le Tisseur, Lucille's mother, as he sat in her little salon—for he had already contracted that acquaintance with the family which permitted him to be led to their house, to return the visits Madame le Tisseur had made him, and his dog, once more returned a penitent to his master, always conducted his steps to the humble abode, and stopped instinctively at the door—"I propose," said St. Amand, after a pause, and with some embarrassment, "to stay a little while longer at Malines; the air agrees with me, and I like the quiet of the place; but you are aware, madame, that in a hotel among strangers, I feel my situation somewhat cheerless. I have been thinking,"—St. Amand paused again—"I have been thinking that if I could persuade some agreeable family to receive me as a lodger, I would fix myself here for some weeks. I am easily pleased."

"Doubtless there are many in Malines who would be too happy to receive such a lodger."

"Will you receive me?" said St. Amand, abruptly. "It was of your family I thought."

"Of us? Monsieur is too flattering, but we have scarcely a room good enough for you."

"What difference between one room and another can there be to me? That is the best apartment to my choice in which the human voice sounds most kindly."

The arrangement was made, and St. Amand came now to reside beneath the same roof as Lucille. And was she not happy that he wanted so constant an attendance? was she not happy that she was ever of use? St. Amand was passionately fond of music: he played himself with a skill that was only surpassed by the exquisite melody of his voice; and was not Lucille happy when she sat mute and listening to such sounds as at Malines were never heard before? Was she not happy in gazing on a face to whose melancholy aspect her voice instantly summoned the smile? Was she not happy when the music ceased and St. Amand called "Lucille?" Did not her own name uttered by that voice seem to her even sweeter than the music? Was she not happy when they walked out in the still evenings of summer, and her arm thrilled beneath the light touch of one to whom she was so necessary? Was she not proud in her happiness, and was there not something like worship in the gratitude she felt to him, for raising her humble spirit to the luxury of feeling herself loved?

St. Amand's parents were French; they had resided in the neighborhood of Amiens, where they had inherited a competent property, to which he had succeeded about two years previous to the date of my story.

He had been blind from the age of three years. "I know not," said he, as he related these particulars to Lucille one evening when they were alone. "I know not what the earth may be like, or the heaven, or the rivers whose voice at least I can hear, for I have no recollection beyond that of a confused, but delicious blending of a thousand glorious colors—a bright and quick sense of joy—A VISIBLE MUSIC. But it is only since my childhood closed that I have mourned, as I now unceasingly mourn, for the light of day. My boyhood passed in a quiet cheerfulness; the least trifle then could please and occupy the vacancies of my mind; but it was as I took delight in being read to—as I listened to the vivid descriptions of poetry, as I glowed at the recital of great deeds, as I was made acquainted by books, with the energy, the action, the heat, the fervor, the pomp the enthusiasm of life, that gradually opened to the sense of all I was for ever denied. I felt that I existed, not lived; and that, in the midst of the universal liberty, I was sentenced to a prison, from whose blank walls there was no escape. Still however, while my parents lived, I had something of consolation; at least I was not alone. They died, and a sudden and dread solitude, a vast and empty dreariness settled upon my dungeon. One old servant only, who had nursed me from my childhood, who had known me in my short privilege of light, by whose recollections my mind could grope its way back through the dark and narrow passages of memory to faint glimpses of the sun, was all that remained to me of human sympathies. It did not suffice, however, to content me with a home where my father and my mother's kind voice were not. A restless impatience, an anxiety to move possessed me, and I set out from home, journeying whither I cared not, so that, at least, I could change an air which weighed upon me like a palpable burden. I took only this old attendant as my companion; he too died three months since at Bruxelles, worn out with years. Alas! I had forgotten that he was old, for I saw not his progress to decay; and now, save my faithless dog, I was utterly alone, till I came hither and found thee."

Lucille stooped to caress the dog; she blest the desertion that had led to a friend who never could desert.

But however much, and however gratefully St. Amand loved Lucille, her power availed not to chase the melancholy from his brow, and to reconcile him to his forlorn condition.

"Ah, would that I could see thee! Would that I could look upon a face that my heart vainly endeavors to delineate."

"If thou couldst," sighed Lucille, "thou wouldst cease to love me."

"Impossible!" cried St. Amand, passionately: "however the world may find thee, thou wouldst become my standard of beauty, and I should judge not of thee by others, but of others by thee."

He loved to hear Lucille read to him, and mostly he loved to hear the descriptions of war, of travel, of wild adventure, and yet they occasioned him the most pain. Often she paused from the page as she heard him sigh, and felt that she would even have renounced the bliss of being loved by him, if she could have restored to him that blessing, the desire for which haunted him as a specter.

Lucille's family were catholic, and, like most in their station, they possessed the superstitions, as well as the devotion of the faith. Sometimes they amused themselves of an evening by the various legends and imaginary miracles of their calender: and once, as they were thus conversing with two or three of their neighbors, "The Tomb of the three Kings of Cologne" became the main topic of their wandering recitals. However strong was the sense of Lucille, she was, as you will readily conceive, naturally influenced by the belief of those with whom she had been brought up from her cradle, and she listened to tale after tale of the miracles wrought at the consecrated tomb, as earnestly and undoubtingly as the rest.

And the Kings of the East were no ordinary saints; to the relics of the Three Magi, who followed the Star of Bethlehem, and were the first potentates of the earth who adored its Savior, well might the pious Catholic suppose that a peculiar power and a healing sanctity would belong. Each of the circle—(St. Amand, who had been more than usually silent, and even gloomy during the day, had retired to his apartment, for there were some moments when, in the sadness of his thoughts, he sought that solitude which he so impatiently fled from at others)—each of the circle had some story to relate, equally veracious and indisputable, of infirmity cured, or a prayer accorded, or a sin atoned for at the foot of the holy tomb. One story particularly affected Lucille; the narrator, a venerable old man with gray locks, solemnly declared himself a witness of its truth.

It was a story of a mother who, making a pilgrimage barefoot to the holy shrine at Cologne, had her dumb child restored to speech.

A misfortune so nearly akin to that of St. Amand, removed by the prayer of another, filled her with devoted thoughts, and a beautiful hope. "Is not the tomb still standing?" thought she, "is not God still in heaven?—he who heard the guilty, may he not hear the guiltless? Is he not the God of love! Are not the affections, the offerings that please him best? and what, though the child's mediator was his mother, can even a mother love her child more tenderly than I love Eugene? But if, Lucille, thy prayer be granted, if he recoved his sight, thy charm is gone, he will love thee no longer. No matter! be it so—I shall at least have made him happy!"

Such were the thoughts that filled the mind of Lucille; she cherished them till they settled into resolution, and she secretly vowed to perform her pilgrimage of love. She told neither St. Amand nor her parents of her intention; she knew the obstacles such an annunciation would create. Fortunately she had an aunt settled at Bruxelles, to whom she had been accustomed, once in every year, to pay a month's visit, and at that time she generally took with her the work of a twelvemonth's industry, which found a readier sale at Bruxelles than Malines. Lucille and St. Amand were already betrothed; their wedding was shortly to take place; and the custom of the country leading parents, however poor, to nourish the honorable ambitition of giving some dowery to their daughters, Lucille found it easy to hide the object of her departure, under the pretence of taking the lace to Bruxelles, which had been the year's labor of her mother and herself—it would sell for sufficient, at least to defray the preparations for the wedding.

"Thou art ever right, child," said Madame le Tisseur; "the richer St. Amand is, why the less oughtest thou to go a beggar to his house."

St. Amand alone was not to be won by her departure; he chafed at the notion of a dowery: he was not appeased even by Lucille's representation, that it was only to gratify and not to impoverish her parents. "And thou, too, canst leave me!" he said, in that plaintive voice which had made his first charm to Lucille's heart. "It is a second blindness."

"But for a few days; a fortnight at most, dearest Eugene."

"A fortnight! you do not reckon time as the blind do," said St. Amand, bitterly.

"But listen, listen, dear Eugene," said Lucille, weeping. The sound of her sobs restored him to a sense of his ingratitude. Alas, he knew not how much he had to be grateful for. He held out his arms to her; "Forgive me," said he. "Those who can see nature know not how terrible it is to be alone."

"But my mother will not leave you."

"She is not you!"

"And Julie," said Lucille, hesitatingly.

"What is Julie to me?"

"Ah, you are the only one, save my parents, who could think of me in her presence."

"And why, Lucille?"

"Why! She is more beautiful than a dream."

"Say not so. Would I could see, that I might prove to the world how much more beautiful thou art. There is no music in her voice."

The evening before Lucille departed, she sat up late with St. Amand and her mother. They conversed on the future; they made plans; in the wide sterility of the world they laid out the garden of household love, and filled it with flowers, forgetful of the wind that scatters, and the frost that kills. And when, leaning on Lucille's arm, St. Amand sought his chamber, and they parted at his door, which closed upon her, she fell down on her knees at the threshold, and poured out the fullness of her heart in a prayer for his safety, and the fulfillment of her timid hope.

At daybreak she was consigned to the conveyance that performed the short journey from Malines to Bruxelles. When she entered the town, instead of seeking her aunt, she rested at an auberge in the suburbs, and confiding her little basket of lace to the care of its hostess, she set out alone, and on foot, upon the errand of her heart's lovely superstition. And erring though it was, her faith redeemed its weakness—her affection made it even sacred. And well may we believe, that the Eye which reads all secrets scarce looked reprovingly on that fanaticism, whose only infirmity was love.

So fearful was she, least, by rendering the task too easy, she might impair the effect, that she scarcely allowed herself rest or food. Sometimes, in the heat of noon, she wandered a little from the road-side, and under the spreading lime tree surrendered her mind to its sweet and bitter thoughts; but ever the restlessness of her enterprise urged her on, and faint, weary, and with bleeding feet, she started up and continued her way. At length she reached the ancient city, where a holier age has scarce worn from the habits and aspects of men the Roman trace. She prostrated herself at the tomb of the Magi: she proffered her ardent but humble prayer to Him before whose Son those fleshless heads (yet to faith at least preserved) had, nearly eighteen centuries ago, bowed in adoration. Twice every day for a whole week, she sought the same spot, and poured forth the same prayer. The last day an old priest, who, hovering in the church, had observed her constantly at devotion, with that fatherly interest which the better ministers of the Catholic sect (that sect which has covered the earth with the mansions of charity) feel for the unhappy, approached her as she was retiring with moist and downcast eyes, and saluting her, assumed the privilege of his order, to inquire if there was aught in which his advice or aid could serve. There was something in the venerable air of the old man which encouraged Lucille; she opened her heart to him; she told him all. The good priest was much moved by her simplicity and earnestness. He questioned her minutely as to the peculiar species of blindness with which St. Amand was afflicted; and after musing a little while, he said, "Daughter, God is great and merciful; we must trust in his power, but we must not forget that he mostly works by mortal agents. As you pass through Louvain in your way home, fail not to see there a certain physician, named Le Kain. He is celebrated through Flanders for the cures he has wrought among the blind, and his advice is sought by all classes from far and near. He lives hard by the Hôtel de Ville, but any one will inform you of his residence. Stay, my child, you shall take him a note from me; he is a benevolent and kindly man, and you shall tell him exactly the same story (and with the same voice) you have told to me."

So saying, the old priest made Lucille accompany him to his home, and forcing her to refresh herself less sparingly than she had yet done since she had left Malines, he gave her his blessing, and a letter to Le Kain, which he rightly judged would ensure her a patient hearing from the physician. Well-known among all men of science was the name of the priest, and a word of recommendation from him went farther; where virtue and wisdom were honored, than the longest letter from the haughtiest sieur in Flanders.

With a patient and hopeful spirit, the young pilgrim turned her back on the Roman Cologne, and now about to rejoin St. Amand, she felt neither the heat of the sun nor the weariness of the road. It was one day at noon that she again passed through Louvain, and she soon found herself by the noble edifice of the Hôtel de Ville. Proud rose its Gothic spires against the sky, and the sun shone bright on its rich tracery and Gothic casements; the broad open street was crowded with persons of all classes, and it was with some modest alarm that Lucille lowered her veil and mingled with the throng. It was easy, as the priest had said to find the house of Le Kain; she bade the servant to take the priests letter to his master, and she was not long kept waiting before she was admitted to the physician's presence. He was a spare, tall man, with a bald front, and a calm and friendly countenance. He was not less touched than the priest had been by the manner in which she narrated her story, described the affliction of her betrothed, and the hope that had inspired the pilgrimage she had just made.

"Well," said he, encouragingly, "we must see our patient. You can bring him hither to me."

"Ah, sir, I had hoped—" Lucille stopped suddenly.

"What, my young friend?"

"That I might have the triumph of bringing you to Malines. I know, sir, what you are about to say: and I know, sir, your time must be very valuable; but I am not so poor as I seem, and Eugene, that is Monsieur St. Amand, is very rich, and—and I have at Bruxelles what I am sure is a large sum; it was to have provided for the wedding, but it is most heartily at your service, sir."

Le Kain smiled; he was one of those men who love to read the human heart when its leaves are fair and undefiled; and, in the benevolence of science, he would have gone a longer journey than from Louvain to Malines to give sight to the blind, even had St. Amand been a beggar.

"Well, well," said he, "but you forget that Monsieur St. Amand is not the only one in the world who wants me. I must look at my note book, and see if I can be spared for a day or two."

So saying he glanced at his memoranda; everything smiled on Lucille: he had no engagements that his partner could not fulfil, for some days; he consented to accompany Lucille to Malines.

Meanwhile, cheerless and dull had passed the time to St Amand; he was perpetually asking Madame le Tisseur what hour it was; it was almost his only question. There seemed to him no sun in the heavens, no freshness in the air, and he even forbore his favorite music; the instrument had lost its sweetness since Lucille was not by to listen.

During Lucille's absence Julie had been constantly in Madame le Tisseur's house—indeed Lucille had prayed her to be so. She had sought, with an industry that astonished herself, to supply Lucille's place, and among the strange contradictions of human nature, she had learned, during her efforts to please, to love the objects of those efforts,—as much at least as she was capable of loving.

She conceived a positive hatred to Lucille; she persisted in imagining that nothing but the accident of first acquaintance had deprived her of a conquest with which she persuaded herself her happiness had become connected. Had St. Amand never loved Lucille, and proposed to Julie, his misfortune would have made her reject him, despite his wealth and his youth; but to be Lucille's lover, and a conquest to be won from Lucille, raised him instantly to an importance not his own. Safe, however, in his affliction, the arts and beauty of Julie fell harmless on the fidelity of St. Amand. Nay, he liked her less than ever, for it seemed an impertinence in any one to counterfeit the anxiety and watchfulness of Lucille.

"It is time, surely it is time, Madame le Tisseur, that Lucille should return. She might have sold all the lace in Malines by this time," said St. Amand one day, peevishly.

"Patience, my dear friend; patience, perhaps she may return to-morrow."

"To-morrow! let me see, it is only six o'clock; only six, you are sure?"

"Just five, dear Eugene, shall I read to you? this is a new book from Paris, it has made a great noise," said Julie.

"You are very kind, but I will not trouble you."

"It is anything but trouble."

"In a word, then, I would rather not."

"O! that he could see," thought Julie; "would I not punish him for this!"

"I hear carriage wheels; who can be passing this way? Surely it is the voiturier from Bruxelles," said St. Amand, starting up, "it is his day, his hour, too. No, no, it is a lighter vehicle," and he sank down listlessly on his seat.

Nearer and nearer rolled the wheels; they turned the corner; they stopped at the lowly door; and—overcome—overjoyed, Lucille was clasped to the bosom of Amand.

"Stay," said she, blushing, as she recovered her self-possession, and turned to Le Kain, "pray pardon me, sir. Dear Eugene, I have brought with me one who, by God's blessing, may yet restore you to sight."

"We must not be sanguine, my child," said Le Kain; "anything is better than disappointment."

Le Kain examined St. Amand, and the result of the examination was a confident belief in the probability of a cure. St. Amand gladly consented to the experiment of an operation; it succeeded—the blind man saw! O! what were Lucille's feelings, what her emotion, what her joy, when she found the object of her pilgrimage—of her prayers—fulfiled! That joy was so intense, that in the eternal alterations of human life she might have foretold from its excess how bitter the sorrows fated to ensue.

As soon as by degrees the patient's new sense became reconciled to the light, his first, his only demand was for Lucille. "No, let me not see her alone, let me see her in the midst of you all, that I may convince you that the heart is never mistaken in its instincts." With a fearful, a sinking presentiment, Lucille yielded to the request to which the impetuous St. Amand would hear indeed no denial. The father, the mother, Julie, Lucille, Julie's younger sisters assembled in the little parlor; the door opened, and and St. Amand stood hesitating on the threshold. One look around sufficed to him; his face brightened, he uttered a cry of joy. "Lucille! Lucille!" he exclaimed, "it is you. I know it, you only!" He sprang forward, and fell at the feet of Julie!

At breakfast time, Madame de Breuil introduced her nephew to her guests. Ernest was already acquainted with M. de Marvel. Lucien, and the Marquis de Prangy, but he had never seen either Madame de Sauvray, the canoness, nor Madame d'Aubrielle; but, as he had told himself that he ought to regard the latter with the most perfect indifference, he paid no attention to any one except her. On first seeing her, he started. Undoubtedly (at least, as she still lived in his imagination) that was exactly the figure of his unknown, the same grace in her attitude, the same lightness in her movements. By a strange coincidence, Madame d'Aubrille's light summer dress, of a bright color, and the pretty boot on her fairy foot (which he thought he had recognized), agreed with his recollections of the lady of the diligence.

"'Tis she!" he said to himself, with an incredible degree of agitation; but when she spoke, it appeared to him that it was not her voice, and he was puzzled. He looked at her again, and fancied he perceived other differences. The lady before him was perhaps not quite so tall as the other; her manner of expressing herself, her ways altogether, had less of quickness about them. Decidedly it was not his Louise. Then a movement, a word, a different inflection of her voice, made him change his opinion, and relapse into a state of uncertainty.

This alternation of doubt and perplexity gave him such a strange and bewildered air, that his aunt felt obliged to sign him to gather his wits together. Then Ernest turned to Madame de Sauvray, and entered into conversation with her. She was remarkably plain, even ugly; but her figure was good, and her ugliness was an intelligent ugliness; her title of canoness, and her full thirty years, spared her the annoyances belonging to the second period of feminine celibacy, as well as the timid scruples imposed by the first.

During the first day, Ernest was horribly "out of sorts;" being under the influence of a double, a fanciful state of feeling, he had some difficulty in understanding his own mind. Madame d' Aubrielle interested him much; her face, her figure —that indescribable charm of manner which is often a woman's chief attraction, all were exactly to his taste. Was all this admiration for her—for her alone? Was it that he still connected her with the recollection so dear to him, and which still reigned supreme in his heart, or rather in his imagination? Sometimes he had discovered the lady of his love, and then he felt inclined to throw himself at her feet, and swear eternal fidelity; but a moment afterwards, when some fresh doubt arose in his mind, he felt obliged to acknowledge that, even so, Madame d' Aubrielle was most captivating. He, however, soon discovered so much nature, so much grace,—she also had some experience in affairs of the heart, and that he need not fear being misunderstood,—that he at last made up his mind to abandon himself to the charm of her society. He said to himself that it was an absurdity to take so much trouble to make his heart and his memory agree together—that it would be wiser in him to give himself up to the enjoyment of the society of a handsome woman.

After arriving at this conclusion, Ernest appeared in his real character—that is to say, he appeared like a man of sense and wit; and Louise, who had found him hitherto stiff, starched, and cold, did him more than justice.

Thus it happened, when Ernest and Louise had proved to their own satisfaction that it was impossible they should fall in love with each other, they became amiable; and on the strength of the belief of being in no danger, they became really endangered.

At the end of eight days—shall I say with pain, or shall I say with pleasure?—but whichever way it was, at the end of eight days Ernest discovered that it was absolutely necessary Madame d' Aubrielle should prove to be one and the same person as his apocryphal heroine, under pain and penalty of causing war between his feelings and his recollection. From that time, his fidelity to his ideal became only an affair of conscience—a sort of wager with himself; and every one knows that wagers of that kind are always lost.

One evening some one mentioned a sterling company who were performing in a neighboring town the principle operas of Rossini, Meyerbeer, and even of Mozart. Lucien proposed that they should make up a party to go to hear Don Juan. Every one exclaimed against this, on the supposition that the performance would be very indifferent.

"That is very likely," replied Lucien, "But what does that signify? Shall I tell you what I consider the greatest charm of these admirable operas which we know by heart?

Well, then, my imagination, impregnated by the genius of these great masters, seizes hold of their compositions, comments upon them, repeats them in a thousand forms, a hundred fashions, creates for itself a type of Don Juan, of Anna, of Arnold, of Elvira, who live to supply it with charming and poetical companions. Every time that I am present at the performance of one of these harmonious poems, my cherished type is awakened within me, and presents to my imagination those beloved though unknown faces. The merit of the singers is a very secondary consideration with me; only my ideal speaks; I answer; all the rest is the accompaniment, nothing more."

"There is in this," said Ernest, "as in all other things, a mixture of truth and falsehood; but suppose now, that an imaginative man is thrown into the company of a lady, a stranger to him, owing to some uncommon circumstances, which add to the mystery and piquancy of the adventure; he is separated from this lady, without knowing who she is, or even having been able to see her face, to enable him to recognize her if he should meet her again, though his soul is full of her; suppose that this man (a little romantic if you will!) attached himself to this lady, whom he imagines to be that type of perfection which he has long dreamed of, and sought in vain, but at the end of a certain time he is brought into contact with a lady who really unites in herself all the perfections with which his imagination has endowed the stranger; that he should have time to appreciate all the qualities of her heart, the captivation of her wit; suppose also, from a combination of out-of-the-way circumstances (this is all romance), that he does not know if this lady" (here Ernest glanced towards Louise) "is or is not the person whom he has met before; if what he loves, or fancies he loves, is the reality or the remembrance,—in a word, if he is or is not faithful to the ideal of whom we have been speaking,—would he not be, at once, the most to be pitied and the most happy of men?—doubtful whether he should wish to be undeceived or to be convinced; if he ought to remember or to forget; to speak, or to be silent."

"And he will end in talking nonsense, as we have all been doing for the last half hour," said Madame de Breuil, gaily, but not before Ernest had had time to observe the agitation of Madame d 'Aubrielle. When he had spoken of a romantic and fugitive meeting a brilliant and sudden flush had overspread her face and neck, her eyes had sparkled with more than their usual brilliancy, and (unintentionally, perhaps) met those of Ernest.

In consequence of this discovery, he retreated to his own apartment about an hour afterwards, almost wild with delight.

"'Tis she! 'tis really she!" he cried, rapturously; "I am sure of it—I wish it to be so! And yet may I not be deceived? Can the heart deceive itself? And so Louise is my unknown!

They are one and the same woman—the ideal and the reality. To me they are the same.

Then another consideration arose.

"But she did not recognize me! My aunt told me that she had an attachment, a mysterious attachment, like my own. Who knows if she was in love with me without knowing it, as I was with her without suspecting it? Oh, if this should prove to be the real state of affairs, I shall be crazed with happiness. To-morrow, to-morrow, I shall know all. To-day I only know that I love Louise."

Ernest went to bed, but passed a sleepless night; the next morning he dressed without bestowing a thought upon waistcoats or cravats.

To take advantage of the fine days in the beginning of September, the party at the Château de Breuil proposed a visit to the ruins of Cernie. There always is within two leagues of every château some classical ruin which it is quite necessary to visit.

Upon this occasion, as the country was so beautiful, the weather so fine, and so good a breakfast was to make part of the programme, no one chose to remain at home. It was settled then that Lucien, Le Prangy, and one or two new comers, who were sportsmen, should set out early in the morning, and bring to the place of common rendezvous all the partridges in the country. M. de Marvel, with Mesdames de Breuil and de Sauvray, were to travel prudently in their carriage. Ernest, who had taken care from the first to declare himself a sworn enemy to sporting in all its forms, was chosen to accompany Madame d' Aubrielle on horseback.

They set out at a slow pace, side by side, and were obliged at times, from the narrowness of the roads, to approach so near each other, that the veil of Madame d' Aubrielle brushed the face of her companion. Never had she appeared so beautiful to him. The hurry of setting out so early, a little confusion—embarrassment, perhaps,—had heightened her color, and given an expression to her countenance that might have turned a wiser head than that of her lover.

As Ernest and Louise had a great deal to say to each other, having settled beforehand the skillful manner in which they would conduct the inquiries whereby they were to discover what both were desirous of knowing, they of course remained a long time without speaking. Ernest could not find a word to say. This silence at length became so embarrassing and so significant, that to escape it, Madame d' Aubrielle suddenly started off at a smart canter. Ernest followed her example, and for some time they kept together. Louise was mounted on an English mare, a slender and graceful creature named Linda; she was a little skittish and hard to manage when she became animated by the quickness of her pace.

Ernest soon perceived that his fair companion was not mistress of her steed; in fact, that Linda was running away with her rider. He at once used his spurs, and, at the risk of his neck, succeeded in gaining on the runaway. Taking advantage of this lucky moment, and with agility that surprised himself, he sprang from his horse, with one hand seized Linda's bridle, and with the other caught Louise, who was nearly falling from her saddle, and thus saved her from what perhaps might have been a severe accident.

When the danger was over, they had time to look at each other. Ernest was the paler of the two. He did not at first discover that he had hurt the hand with which he had secured the bridle. Though it was a very slight wound, Louise insisted upon his dismounting again. She examined the burning hand which Ernest submitted to her inspection, and he would willingly have endured severe pain to have it so held.

All this could not take place without some confusion. Madame d' Aubrielle felt the look with which the young man was gazing on her, and not daring to raise her eyes, she stammered something, she knew not what, wishing to thank him for preserving her life; but fearing she would say too much she let him understand by her silence.

At last, as Ernest was really suffering considerable pain, they agreed to leave their steeds at a shooting-lodge, belonging to Madame de Breuil; they then continued their route on foot, Ernest making the most of his misfortune, in order to enjoy the happiness of the expressed pity of his beautiful companion.

It was an enchanting moment; the terror they had both felt, the devotion of Ernest in risking his life to save hers the loneliness and quietness around them, all assisted in heightening the charm.

"Never mount a horse again, unless I am with you," said Ernest, in a tender tone, his voice trembling.

"With you should I be free from danger then?" she asked whilst she felt, by the pressure of the wounded arm, that danger indeed was not over yet.

When they got out of the woods at Chayles, a delightful landscape presented itself to their eyes. Before them lay a large tract of pasture land which might have been described as a carpet of green velvet, covered with flowers, extending its gentle slopes to the foot of the hill. At the sight of the meadows, Louise clapped her hands joyously.

"Oh daisies!" she cried; "my favorite flowers! my dear friends!"

Leaving Ernest, she ran here and there, gathering the tiny blossoms where they grew thickest and looked most fresh.

"What! you love daisies?" demanded Ernest, more agitated and more happy than before.

"Indeed I do," she replied; "and I seldom lose the opportunity of obtaining a bouquet when they come in my way.

Then, all at once, a cloud appeared on her beautiful brow.

"I love them," she continued, in a slightly melancholy tone "Ought I to love them, and ought I to tell you I do so?" There is, somewhere in the world a bunch of daisies which would embarrass me not a little if presented to me to-day.

"You believe that?" said Ernest. "Well, to conjure away the remembrance, let us gather another bouquet."

This was soon done.

"Shall we question them together?" said Louise, with a pretty smile.

"Ay, lady; but first let us question these," said Ernest

He drew forth a withered bunch of flowers; some of the leaves were preserved.

"This bouquet—what is it? Mine!" she exclaimed. "Can it be possible? Three years ago—that night; it was you—you, Ernest and the memory of that night intervenes between us now!"

"Only to unite us," said Ernest. "And now, for pity's sake, Louise, not a word, not an explanation more, for if I have deceived myself—if we have both been deceived by some illusion—if we are obliged to renounce, by more certainty, our present happiness——"

"Rest satisfied. Do I wish to be undeceived?" murmured Louise, with blushing cheeks.

At this moment they heard the sound of wheels; as the carriage approached containing Madame de Breuil, who soon perceived them, and who, at the first glance, felt that her most anxious wish was about to be fulfilled. She accosted them in a sportive manner.

"Well, children, what have you asked those flowers?" she said, "and what have they replied?"

"They have confessed a secret," replied Ernest.

"And what is it about?" demanded his aunt.

"The way to be happy," said Ernest, and he raised the hand of Louise to his lips. But whether that hand was the one that gave him the bunch of daisies we have yet to see.

THE HAND OF GOD IN ALL RELIGIONS.

The noblest view we can take of this world is, undoubtedly, that it has always been under the hand of its Creator, and has never for one moment slipped from under His control. In this light we shall endeavor to show that, inferior as many religions may be, compared to the light we enjoy, the world would have been much worse without them. And that, instead of their being the work of some Arch Fiend opposed to God and progress, they have been His agencies for lifting the world a step higher, restraining its barbarism, and trimming the rough, coarse natures of their followers into something more humane.

In looking at these religions, the proper way is not to ask how much is there beautiful or true in them, but what was the condition of the people before they came. And then we shall not only see that they were as good as those people could receive, but that no wise being would, under the circumstances, have tried to force upon them any better kind.

Take, for instance, the Hindoo religion. Here we have a faith that was evidently made for its believers. It is just as much all-of-a-piece with their natures, as a negro's black skin is all-of-a-piece with his woolly head and thick lips. Like all undeveloped races, they are incapable of understanding how one God could manage all things, and their religion is adapted to this weakness by its theory of a multitude of inferior deities who attend to humanity between them. In their character they are inclined to the mystic and the unnatural, and their religion is full of fantastic revolting and impossible legends, incarnations, transmigrations and everything calculated to take hold upon and influence such half-developed minds. For their heaven, it promises them transitions through the bodies of inferior animals until they are finally swallowed up and absorbed into the great Deity itself; while its threats of punishment for evil are just as animal. To a Hindoo this is the most natural Heaven or Hell he could be charmed or frightened with.

If the inferior religions of the earth have been raised up by Providence at all, the main object must be to control and restrain mankind from gross evils by appealing to their low natures with something that charms or terrifies them. The point is, therefore, not to teach them pure truth, for that they could not understand, but to set up an ideal something that shall act as a controlling influence over their minds and keep them in check. This is attained in the Hindoo religion. It promises them for good a heaven on a level with their conceptions of progress; and holds them from evil by a class of threats calculated to strike the most fear into their natures. And this is the only way mankind can be governed in their low conditions. They must be promised fantastic and impossible heavens; just as we promise children trees and houses made of gold and silver, "when our ship comes home." On the other hand, they must be terrified from committing evil by a Devil just as we frighten little ones with "Old Bogie."

This the Hindoo religion, in effect, does. Under its influence the swarming myriads of Hindostan are kept in order and pass a comparatively peaceful existence.

Even the distinction of "caste," so horrible to higher-class minds, is to this infantile race a positive blessing.

Excepting among such as the Brahmins, they are a tame, soulless, servile, mechanical race, without ambition, that need to be handled by machinery and put into their places, and have trades, calling heavens, and hells provided for them; and this their religion does. They would be helpless as babes without that great system of religious government which Providence has prepared for them.

As an indication of what they need, and of how far it would have been wise in God to have raised up anything superior to what they have, it may be mentioned that, while they have a special trinity of gods, one of whom they consider no less than the Creator and Preserver of all things, and another, Sivia the Destroyer—the hateful and devilish "Destroyer" is more universally worshipped by them than any other power. This may be through fear; but it gives us an idea what kind of souls they possess for sensing the value of divine truth. Imagine the Almighty sending such a gospel as Christ's, with its self-abnegation, humility, and love, to such a race—and more than that, imagine Him expecting them to believe it or be damned!

By a contrast of this kind, we can see how wisely adapted is the sensual religion of Hindostan to its votaries. If any one wants to see this adaptation still more, let him study the Hindoo character, and try and imagine what kind of a religion could control the masses of India and suit them as well, was the present one to be swept out of existence. And they will come to the conclusion that the flaming zealots of Hindoism, who have arisen from time to time, and have so impressed the Hindoo mind with its divinity as to spread it over such myriads of people, with force sufficient to last through so many ages, must not only have been influenced and aided by a power superior to themselves, but by one that desired to bless that people with a system suited to their necessities.

If this is true of the Hindoo religion, how true is it of the Mohammedan faith. It found the wild tribes of the East cursed with perpetual hostilities between themselves; and sunk, moreover, in the depths of idolatry. Out of this condition, it lifted them into national unity, and made them feel as though they were of one blood. And though it did not teach them to love all the world—for they were not ready for that doctrine then, it made them at least love those who were of their own faith—previous to which time, they loved none but their special tribe or family and hated the rest of the world. So far, therefore, it extended their human sympathies, and raised them in the scale of being.

With all the imperfections of the Mohammedan faith, we are bold to say that no other religion could get as much good out of the Turkish and Arabian character. By appealing to their sensual and imaginative natures, and representing them as the only people of God, and all the rest of mankind as devilish and heretical, it inflamed their zeal and secured their zealous coöperation; and ensured, moreover, their obedience to the truth it did contain. With very much that is below our standard, the Mohammedan religion contains many excellent principles. It teaches generosity, cleanliness, temperance and prayer. It presents just the very principles that the Turkish nature can sense as divine, and omits those which are above it. If all the angelic world had set itself to devise a religion that would be acceptable to their nature—and would compel obedience to the little light they could receive—to our feeble judgment, they could not have devised a better than that presented to them by Mohammed. It lifted them out of idolatry into a belief in One God. It cemented their feelings in kinship, and extended their sympathies to humanity just as far as they had growth of soul to stretch them; and gave them just as high conceptions of sacred things as their spiritual faculties could appreciate. Without such a religion, it is evident they would certainly be twice as uncivilized as they are.

Hence, do we contend that God raised up Mohammed, and allowed him to be worked upon by certain influences which his grand imaginative nature interpreted as he did. And he came forth with a consciousness of a mission that bore all before it, and touched the rude Arabian heart. He was no imposter. He brought but a very imperfect scheme; but it was a far more saving gospel to that people than a higher one, because it taught principles within their reach.

To the ignorant and narrow mind, every other religion but its own is of the Devil. All that God has done for humanity in its babyhood, because it is not of so high a tone as it can sense itself, it traces to the same diabolical personage. All the ignorance and backwardness of mankind it ascribes to an insane desire on their part to fight God Almighty. Such people, of course, can trace God's hand in nothing but what concerns their own faith. To tell them that spiritual power was employed to give influence to any Gospel lower than that of Jesus is absurd; simply because they do not understand that God adapts his providence to the condition of the human race. To them God has but one gospel; and, choke or feed; it has to be swallowed by everybody whether they are of the same size or not. How grandly alongside of this narrowness stands the conception of Joseph Smith, that God has in a future life prepared states of happiness on a level with the aspirations and ambitions of every man's soul. If this be true of a future state, why should we not expect that the same wise and loving policy of Deity has been carried out in this life in providing religious governments adapted to the varied conditions of the world; and that He sent forth spiritual power to establish such movements on a level with the character of each work; so as to give them sufficient influence and make them permanent and lasting.

Such a view, anyway, reveals God as a grand provider for humanity; and when we discover His wisdom in the adaptation of Mohammedanism or any other system to earth's children, we are filled with hallelujahs and praise to Him whose tender mercies are as wide as humanity, deep as their necessities and lasting as all time.

HOW THE EARTH WAS BUILT.

OR, PLAIN TALKS ON THE SCIENCES.

No. 4.

It is only a few years ago that people generally believed that the earth was one great mass of rocks and earth thrown together on the same principle that one would build up a dust-heap. It is true that in boring or tunneling through the earth's crust, it was observed that the rocks were piled in layers or strata, one above another; but it was not supposed that there was any particular method in the way in which they were arranged.

In course of time, however, it was discovered that, unless the earth had been unnaturally disturbed by an eruption of some kind, these layers succeeded each other with unvarying regularity. If, for instance, we call that kind of rock nearest the surface A, the next B, and the third C, it was discovered that, wherever the earth was penetrated, A was always at the top, B below it, and C below that again And what was more remarkable, that, although in some places a layer might be missing, those layers that remained were always found in the regular order. Thus, if C was missing, A was still at the top and B below it.

This led to the question—How does this come about?—Was the earth built in layers like a large orange, with one peeling put on over the other? Men asked this question, but could get no certain answer till they got it from the rocks themselves. They examined these layers and found to their surprise that between each of them were more or less of the remains of fish, animals and plants, etc.,—many of them of a kind entirely unknown on the present suface of the globe. They found not only the remains of fish between these strata of the earth, but shells and other evidences that between the times of the piling up of each layer, the ocean had washed over the then surface of the globe.

Here comes the answer, then: The Earth was, evidently once somewhat smaller than it is now, and had had a great many surfaces. That layer which is now the farthest down in the bowels of the earth, was once the outer surface of our globe. Upon that surface, some kind of creatures existed before they were covered up by the next layer. This, in turn, had upon its surface another class of living creatures that lived and died, and after long periods were also buried up by the strata that followed it.

Thus layers or strata succeeded one another, each with its different classes of living beings, until the present surface upon which we live was produced, and the present races and classes of animal and vegetable life were placed upon it.

This, in a few words, is a rough history of how the world was built, as told by the rocks themselves; and it is more reliable than a history of any other kind; just as a house, if took carefully to pieces, would tell how it was put together better than any history of its erection found in a book.

One curious fact connected with this story of the rocks is that, while remains of almost every variety of animal, plant or fish can be found imbedded in the lower regions of our globe, no clear evidences of men having existed before the formation of the present surface of the earth can be discovered. And one of the sweetest and most harmonious revelations that these rocks bring to light is that, while every huge and extravagantly formed kind of creature flourished before man's day, the kind and loving Deity that governs us all, prepared the way for man by sweeping them all away before his advent; while He brought with man just such a class of animals and trees and plants as would be pleasant to his sight and more suitable companions for his times. Here, as in all true science, we have a revelation of God's love.

WELCOME TO SUMMER.

BY J. BURROWS.

Thrice welcome, thou fair Goddess of the year,
With all thy splendor and thy bright array,
And joys ineffable; thrice welcome here,
Ascend thy throne—resume thy peaceful sway.

The May-queen has departed with her train
Of sweet delights; but on each passing breeze
The gentle zephyrs strike their harps again,
While feathered songsters warble in the trees.

Most glorious summer! I will tune my lyre
And join the chorus Nature's self doth sing,
To bid thee welcome, for thyself inspires
Creation with the music thou dost bring.

The rivulets that leave their mountain side,
Like streams of glittering silver to the view,
Dance, and sing "Welcome," as they onward glide
To fructify, to season and renew.

Come, fill our vales, revivify and cheer
Each downcast soul, and to each mind impart
New faith and hope, and chase away all fear
From every aching, sad, desponding heart.

CHARLEMAGNE,

THE WORLD'S HISTORY ILLUSTRATED IN ITS GREAT CHARACTERS.

We now come to the greatest man of the middle ages. He was eminently of the imperial type, yet, like as some priests blend in themselves the character of the warrior and the empire-founder, so Charlemagne blended in himself the king and the priest. He came, as we have seen, of a priestly family; and hence, he had much of the priestly bias. He loved learning, was the magnificent patron of learned men, and as much a creator of popes and bishops, as of the temporal lords of his empire. He was moreover not only the founder of the new western empire to succeed that of the Constantines then in decay, but also the prophet of a new civilization. We have in our biographical encyclopedia given views of the barbaric chaos in Europe, which succeeded the decline of the Roman empire, and found that, during that night of the Christian world, the Mohammedans almost alone represented civilization. But a new family of nations had now grown up, the states of Europe had become consolidated, and France ranked as the eldest son of the Church. The time had therefore come not only for a new western empire, but also for a new civilization to spring up in Europe at once possessing the vigor of young races; and also the imperial classicality of the old Roman. This civilization was to be levened by the Christian faith, and as much of the spirit of Jesus as fierce warlike nations in primitive times could be expected to embody. Some great representative man was therefore necessary to arise at this period, representative both of Christendom as an imperial power, and Christendom as a new civilization. The man was forthcoming. Providence had him prepared: the Heavens brought up for their work of human progress, the magnificent Charlemagne, greater than whom of his type there perhaps was never born. He was not exactly a Cæsar nor a converted Constantine nor a Napoleon: he was, as we have typed him, more of an imperial prophet, yet very different to the Mohammed class. This strange blending as observed undoubtedly grew out of the priestly character and bias of his family.

And just here, we are brought to another of the providential methods manifested in human progress in the coming up of Alfred the Great from the Saxon race, so soon after the days of Charlemagne. He, too, was a prophet of the new civilization, and when England, as well as France, Germany and Italy, had become imbued with the spirit of that civilization, then the world may be said to have fairly started on its grander course, the culmination of which we are finding now in the "Latter-days." But there was one more fusion necessary: it was that remarkable blending of the two most powerful, yet somewhat opposite races in the conquest of England by the mighty William. After that period, the civilization of the world was led by the most western nations known now as Great Britain. These are the movements of Providence now before us, commencing with Charlemagne, founder of the empires of Germany and France.

After the death of Pepin le Bref, his sons Charles the Great and Charloman were crowned and, for a time, divided the sway; but Charloman dying, his brother Charles the Great, known as Charlemagne, united the empire in himself. He found his opportunity as dictator of the world in the contest between Didier, king of the Lombards, and Adrian the First, who was the ninety-ninth pope.

The ambitious Charlemagne who, from his accession, seems to have contemplated the foundation of a vast empire of the West, listened to the invitation of the Romans and engaged himself to the Pope to pass the Alps with his soldiers and redeem from the Lombards the cities which his father Pepin had conferred on St. Peter as his patrimony.

Didier, king of the Lombards, resolved to seize by force the person of the pope, which Adrian learning by intelligence from his spies, he assembled troops to defend Rome; after which he wrote to the king of the Lombards, conjuring him by the divine mysteries not to advance upon the territory of the Church, at the same time, menacing him with the thunders of St. Peter. Finding Rome in a state of defence, Didier dared not a regular siege; but ravaged the neighboring country. Charlemagne's preparations of war now alarmed the Lombard king, and he hastened to inform the mighty protector of St. Peter that he was willing to give entire satisfaction to the Holy See; but the ambassadors of France at the court of Rome rejected these propositions, and without waiting the reply of their master, solemnly declared war against Didier. The army of Charlemagne thereupon passed into Italy and blockaded Pavia, while the Lombards of Rieti, Spoletti Ossino, Ancona and Folegiri, frightened at the formidable invasion of the Franks, humbled themselves to the court of Rome.

During the siege of Pavia, Charlemagne made a journey to Rome to assist at the celebration of Easter, whereupon the magistrates of the city, the militia, the clergy and the children of the schools bearing branches of rose and olive trees, met the French monarch, and marched before him singing hymns. As soon as Charlemagne perceived the crosses and banners of the procession, he, with his lords, dismounted and advanced on foot to the church of St. Peter, where the pope, surrounded by his priests and deacons, awaited him on the sill of the temple. The conqueror bent and kissed the steps of the sacred church, and embraced the pontiff; and then, hand in hand, Charlemagne and Pope Adrian entered the church and prostrated themselves at the tomb of the chief of the Apostles.

Charlemagne, during his stay at Rome, caused a deed to be executed and deposited on the altar of St. Peter, by which the Church became possessed, as gifts from Pepin of France, and his sons, of the Isle of Carso, the cities of Barti, Reggio and Mantua, the exarchate of Ravenna, the provinces of Venice and Istria, and the duchies of Spoletto and Beneventum. Thus we see how the temporal possessions of the Romish Church originated and increased through the gifts of the magnificent family of Charlemagne who were something more than mere secular kings, who were in fact the very embodiment of the new empire of Christendom, growing out of the family of Arnulf, Bishop of Metz, which was at once famous for its Saints, its sovereign princes, and its imperial Charlemagne.

The king of the Franks, after his first visit to Rome, set out for his camp at Pavia, and completed his victory over Didier king of the Lombards whom he sent a prisoner into France; after which he made his second visit to Rome. "Then," says Mazery, "the pope, followed by one hundred and fifty bishops, whom he had called around him to render the ceremony more imposing, advanced to the front of the palace of the Lateran, and, in the presence of an immense crowd, bestowed upon the prince the title of patrician, the first dignity of the empire. He conferred upon him the right of investing bishops within his States, and even of nominating popes, in order to put an end to the cavals and disorders of the elections." Italian historians affirm that Charlemagne renounced this prerogative, reserving the right of confirming the nominations, as the Greek Church had done. The new western empire, occupying the same relations to the Church as that of the Cæsars before, was now fairly in existence.

On his second visit to Rome, Charlemagne visited all the holy places, and the priests made the sacred vaults resound with Hosannahs in honor of the conqueror of the Lombards.

Charlemagne now returned to France to commence his wars in Spain against the Saracens, and in Germany against the Saxons, to convert them to Christianity. The terrible character of his religious wars with the Saxons may be gathered from the one famous item that he caused four thousand of the Saxons to be put to death in one day for their determined refusal to submit to the ordinance of baptism.

During the year 781, Charlemagne having finished his wars with the Saracens and Saxons, paid his third visit to Rome to return thanks and have his youngest son Charloman crowned king of Italy, and the young prince was baptized with the name of Pepin.

The great controversy of the image smashing again, at about this time, occupied the chief attention of the Christian world, upon which the Greek and Latin churches were divided. Constantine, the Greek emperor, and his mother, the empress Irene, yielded to Pope Adrian, and resumed image worship, while, very singular to note, Charlemagne, the founder of the new empire of the west, threw his weight against the Christian idolatry. This grand apostle of empire and civilization, trembled not at the thunders of the pope but sought to establish among the bishops of the West an enlightened unity of the faith throughout his kingdom, and put an end to the quarrels of his bishops. He, therefore, convoked a council of prelates, presiding over his provinces, to the number of three hundred, who assembled at his residence at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, to whom were added three hundred monks besides the principal lords of the imperial court. Charlemagne presided, and astonished the Council with his eloquence and theological discussions. He next addressed a synodical epistle to the ecclesiastics of Spain, which will, in itself, illustrate Charlemagne in his character as an imperial apostle:

"We are profoundly touched, lords bishops, by the oppressions which the infidel causes you to endure; but we suffer a still greater affliction from the error which reigns among you, and which has forced us to assemble a council of all the prelates of our kingdom, to declare the orthodox faith on the adoption of the flesh of Jesus Christ.

"We have examined your writings with profound attention, and your objections have been discussed, article by article, in the synod. Each bishop, in our presence, has had full liberty to express his opinion, and, by the aid of God, this important question is finally decided.

"I conjure you, however, to embrace our confession of faith in the spirit of peace, and not to elevate your doctrines above the decision of the universal church.

"Previous to the scandal to which you have given rise by the error of the adoption, we loved you as our brethren; the uprightness of your belief consoled us in your temporal servitude, and we had resolved to free you from the oppression of the Saracens.

"Do not, then, deprive yourselves of the participation of our prayers and our aid; for if, after the admonition of the pope and the warnings of the council, you do not renounce your error, we shall regard you as heretics, and shall not dare to have further communication with you.

"As to the proposition submitted to our judgment, on the new synod held at Constantinople, in which it was ordained, under penalty of anathema, to render to the images of saints, the worship and adoration rendered to the divine Trinity, the fathers of our assembly have rejected this sacrilegious doctrine as impious, and reject the judgment of the court of Rome."
